

The Index.

12829

—A—

WEEKLY PAPER,

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

VOLUME IV.

BOSTON, MASS:
INDEX ASSOCIATION, No. 1, TREMONT PLACE.

1873.

BL
2726
I38
v.4

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	PAGE
HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES.
Ludwig Feuerbach and Modern Atheism, O. B. Frothingham	49
The Prospects and Perils of Free Thought, T. W. Higginson	61
The Rise of Unitarianism in New England: A Story of Evolution, W. C. Cunniff	73
The Rise of Unitarianism in New England: A Story of Evolution, (Concluded) W. C. Cunniff	83
Zoroaster and the Religion of the Ancient Persians, John W. Chadwick	97
A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, Francis E. Abbot	109
The Idea of a Hereafter, John W. Chadwick	121

ESSAYS AND OTHER LEADING ARTICLES.
Union in Strength, F. E. Abbot	1
The Attitude of Radicalism Towards Christianity, W. C. Chadwick	15
An Inferior for December 22, C. A. Bartol	20
The Good of Moral Evil, Charles Voysey	27
Manhood Religion, A. W. Stevens	123
Cruelties of False Belief, Prof. F. W. Newman	145
Moral Light and Darkness, Charles Voysey	157
The Controversy between Religion and Science, Prof. F. W. Newman	165
The Controversy between Religion and Science, Prof. F. W. Newman , (Continued).....	173
The Good Fight, A. W. Stevens	181
Modern Scripturalism—Faith and Free Thought, Westminster Review	189
Modern Scripturalism—Faith and Free Thought, (Continued).....	197
Modern Scripturalism—Faith and Free Thought, (Concluded).....	205
On the Bible as the Protestant Basis, Prof. F. W. Newman	213
Truth Relative, yet Absolute, A. W. Stevens	221
The True Theory of Rewards and Punishments, Rev. Charles Voysey	229
The Radical's Root, O. B. Frothingham	247
The Law of Inspiration, Samuel Johnson	245
Professor Max Müller on Darwin's "Philosophy of Language".....	253
The Idea of God, F. E. Abbot	261
On the Gail's Religion, F. W. Newman	269
Contrast between Morality and Religion, Morris Einstein	277
Seemingly and Being, A. W. Stevens	285, 293, 301
An Essay on Miracles, David Hume	293
Little by Little, A. C. Halloran	301
Nervy Politics, S. C. Halloran	317
Mental Freedom, George H. Holman	326
The Dr-um of Unity, O. B. Frothingham	334
The "Evidence of Christianity," R. M. Sherman	346
The Necessity of a Priesthood, Henry Edger	347
Gerrit Smith on "THE INDEX".....	358
Rational Religion, J. E. Sutton	358
The Victory of Thought, F. E. Abbot	370
The Bible not the Only Inspired Book, F. W. Webster	382
We See as We Are, Wm. C. Gannett	406
Old Miracles and New, London Examiner	418
The Religious Outlook in America, O. B. Frothingham	430
The Ecclesiastical Foes of Rational Faith, Wm. J. Potter	442
The Cost to Christendom of the Foreign Mission system, Francis E. Abbot	454
Taxation of Church Property, James P. Rison	468
Evangelical Alliances, John Weiss	478
God in the Constitution, Loring Moody	490
Rights of Animals, F. W. Newman	502
Woman: Her Rights and Duties, F. A. Hinckley	514, 526

NOTES AND COMMENTS.
A. W. S.
Pages 245, 327, 329, 331, 333, 405, 417, 429, 441, 453, 465, 477, 489, 501, 513, 525.....

GLIMPSES.
Pages 321, 330, 332, 374, 388, 398, 410, 422, 434, 446, 458, 470, 482, 494, 506, 518, 520.....

EDITORIALS.
Organizer.....	1
Born four 8.126.....	6
More Petitions.....	7
Credulity and Brainlessness, T. W. H.	7
Not to Destroy but to Conserve, A. W. S.	8
The Right Point, O. B. F.	8
The Relation of Free Religion to Social Reforms, E. D. C.	9
Development and Crisis.....	18
Borace Greeley's Belief.....	18
"The Struggles of a Drowning Creed," T. W. H.	19
Christmas, O. B. F.	19
Shocking, R. P. H.	19
The Relation of Free Religion to Social Reforms, II, E. D. C.	20
"Paul Gower".....	20
An Unlooked-for Ally.....	30
Children as "Unforgotten Sinners," T. W. H.	31
Practical Regeneration, W. J. P.	31
The Bible in School, E. D. C.	31
Prayer and Advertising, Charles Voysey	32
"Christian" Temperance, W. H. S.	32

Christianizing the Indians.....	42
"We, U' and Company".....	42
"Are You a Christian?" T. W. H.	43
An Autobiography, O. B. F.	43
Free Religion and Social Reforms, III, E. D. C.	43
Fear No and be Just, R. P. H.	44
A Word about the Photographs.....	54
The Viri of Bigotry.....	54
An Appeal to Liberals, F. E. A.	54
Sects and Sectarianism, W. J. P.	55
The Tear of Character, T. W. H.	55
Methods of Reform, I, R. P. H.	56
Sunday-school Teaching, W. H. S.	56
London Letter, Charles Voysey	57
The First Liberal League, A. W. S.	57
Free Religion and the Young, A. W. S.	58
An Appeal to Liberals, F. E. A.	58
Frothingham's Religion of Humanity, T. W. H.	57
Free Religion and Social Reforms, IV, E. D. C.	57
Methods of Reform, II, R. P. H.	58
Two H. d. d. Hooks, O. B. F.	58
London Letter. Where the New Year finds us in England, M. D. C.	60
"Between Two Hay-Stacks,".....	78
Culture and Orthodoxy, A. W. S.	78
"No Religious Preferences," T. W. H.	79
Beecher on Eternal Punishment, W. J. P.	79
Salvation Free, W. H. S.	80
London Letter, Charles Voysey	80
Will Free Religion have Sunday-schools? A. W. S.	80
Innab or Outside, T. W. H.	90
THE INDEX and THE F. R. A., O. B. F.	91
Games and Methods of Healing, E. D. C.	91
London Letter, M. D. C.	92
Dr. Bartol on the Liberal League.....	102
Waiting While the World Moves.....	102
The Mammon of Righteousness, T. W. H.	103
The Bible in the Public Schools, W. H. S.	103
Prey for Advertising—Which? W. J. P.	104
London Letter, Charles Voysey	104
The Counter-Petition sent to Congress.....	114
Enlighten the Women.....	114
My Me, T. W. H.	114
Things of Jesus, O. B. F.	115
The Moral Dangers of Public Schools, E. D. C.	116
London Letter, M. D. C.	116
The New York Convention.....	126
No Reason for Inaction.....	126
"A Daniel Come to Judgment".....	127
Is Radicalism Vindicated? W. J. P.	127
Arr-gant Chalmers, T. W. H.	127
Christ in the Constitution, O. B. F.	128
London Letter, Charles Voysey	129
Vindictory, F. E. Abbot	129
To the Friends of THE INDEX, A. W. Stevens	129
Special Notice, A. W. Stevens	129
The Fetish of Science, T. W. H.	129
God in the Public Schools, W. H. S.	129
Let us be Fair, O. B. F.	140
London Letter, M. D. C.	140
A Touching Letter.....	141
The True Point.....	141
Destruction and Fulfillment.....	140
The Plain Truth, F. E. Abbot	140
In moral Theology, W. J. P.	140
Libor Schools, E. D. C.	140
London Letter, Charles Voysey	140
A Card.....	140
The Worth of an Ideal.....	140
Liberal League, F. E. A.	140
A New Departure, O. B. F.	141
"Go and Sin no More," W. H. S.	141
London Letter, M. D. C.	142
Formation and Reformation.....	143
St-If-Contained, F. E. A.	143
Free and True Optimism, W. J. P.	143
Boston University, E. D. C.	143
London Letter, Charles Voysey	143
To Stockholders of the Index Association, T. W. Higginson	176
The Unbelief of Christians.....	176
Reason the Law of Life, F. E. A.	176
The Real Issue, O. B. F.	177
London Letter, M. D. C.	177
Free Religious Association, W. J. Potter	177
Plans of Decadence, O. B. F.	184
Scraps of Correspondence, F. E. A.	183
The Woman Question, E. D. C.	185
London Letter, Charles Voysey	186
Natural Religion.....	192
Definitions of Religion, T. W. H.	192
The True Story, F. E. Abbot	192
Denominational Negligence.....	200
Going and Coming, F. E. A.	200
More or Less, O. B. F.	201
London Letter, M. D. C.	201
Another Dedication of Christianity.....	208
The Use of Religion, T. W. H.	209
"The Kingship of Jesus Christ," F. E. A.	209
The Heroism of Moral Fidelity.....	216
John Stuart Mill, F. E. A.	217

PHILOSOPHICAL PAPERS.
BY F. E. ABBOT.
Psychological Analysis of the Idea of Space.....	11
A Doctrine of Infinity.....	23
Origin of the Idea of God.....	35
The "Evolution Hypothesis".....	43
The Mechanist and Vitalist Theories.....	71
Spontaneous Generation.....	83
The Two Biological Schools.....	83
Theism and Evolution.....	84
PAUL GOWER.
Pages, 26, 38, 52, 62, 76, 88, 100, 118, 122, 134, 146, 158, 167, 174, 182, 196, 210, 222, 236, 248, 262, 274, 286, 298, 310, 322, 334, 346, 358, 370, 382, 394, 406, 418, 430, 442, 454, 466, 478, 490, 502, 514, 526.....
LITERARY DEPARTMENT.
Die Entstehung der Bibel. (The Origin of the Bible). By Emil Hittler, F. V.	10
Septimius Felton. By Nathaniel Hawthorne, A. C. T.	10
Der Jesuitismus getreu nach der Natur gezeichnet von einem bekehrten Jesuiten. (Jesuitism faithfully drawn from Nature by a converted Jesuit). Beiträge zur Auf-

THE INDEX

	PAGE
Klärung über die Gemein-schädlichkeit des Jesuitenein- flusses. Zweite Auflage. Von Grafen Franz Deyn. (Con- tribution to the Enlightenment.) By Count F. de Deyn. Perfection. Charms of the Order of the Jesuits. By Count Francis Deyn. Second Edition), T. V.....	21
Pinne at the Fair, and other Poems.....	22
The Hand-Book of Christian Archaeology. Concerning the Discovery of our Jewishness Wahrheit. Ein Versuch der Traumung von Theologie und Philosophie in Mittelalter. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der scholastischen Philosophie. By Dr. Max Maywald. T. V.....	23
Religion. Attempt to separate Theology and Philosophy in the Middle Ages. A Contribution to the History of Schola- stical Philosophy. By Dr. Max Maywald, T. V.....	24
The Complete Poetical Works of John Greenleaf Whittier... The Woods and By-Ways of New England. By Wilson Flagg.....	25
Our Heritage. By Scottell.....	26
Aunt's Scrap Book. By L. M. Alcott.....	27
A Chance for Himself. By J. T. Townbridge, E. C. T.....	28
Der Alte und Der Neue Glaube. Ein Bekenntnis von David Friedrich Strauss. T. V.....	29
Faith and the New. A Con- fession by David Frederick Strauss, T. V.....	30
The Vicar's Daughter. By George MacDonald, E. C. T.....	31
Gareth and Lynette. E. C. T.....	32
The Dove in the Eagle's Nest. By C. M. Yonge, E. C. T.....	33
Major Jones' Courtship. E. C. T.....	34
Strive and Succeed. By Horatio Alger, Jr., E. C. T.....	35
Über Nationalität. Von Prof. Dr. H. Wobbe. E. C. T.....	36
Über Nationale Erziehung. Von Verfasser der "Briefe über Berliner Erziehung." (Concerning National Education. By the Author of "Letters Concerning Education in Ber- lin.") By Heinrich Wobbe, E. C. T.....	37
Seine Fehler und seine Verbesserung. Ein Mahnruf aus das deutsche Volk, seine Lenker und Lehrer. Von Fritz Schultze, Dr. Phil. (Religious Instruction in the Schools of Germany; Its Defects and its Improvement.) A con- tribution to the German People, its Rulers, and Teachers. By Fritz Schultze, Ph.D.), T. V.....	38
Thoughts for the Times. By H. K. Hewes, E. C. T.....	39
Die Juden im Volke Israel. Von Dr. Daniel Chwolson, ordentlichem Professor an der Kaiserl. St. Peters- burger Universität. (The Semitic Peoples. An Attempt At a Characteristick. By D. Chwolson, Professor Ordina- ry in Imperial University of St. Petersburg, T. V.....	40
Phyris and Politics. By Walter Bagshot, E. C. T.....	41
Oft Im Lichte der Naturwissenschaften. Studien über Gott, Welt, Unsterblichkeit. Von Philipp Spiller. (God in the Light of the Natural Sciences. Studies on God, World, Immortality. By Philipp Spiller, T. V.....	42
Bibel-Lexikon. Realwörterbuch zum Handgebrauch für Geistliche und gemeindeglieder. Herausgegeben von Karl Schmid, Prof. d. Theologie, an der Universität Basel. Laut-Früfung. (Bible Lexicon. A Cyclopaedia for the use of Clergymen and Laymen. Edited by Dr. Daniel Nienkel, Professor and Ecclesiastical Councillor. Fourth Edition. By Karl Schmid, T. V.....	43
Studien. Poetry and Philosophy. By J. G. Shairer, E. C. T.....	44
The Romance of the Harpers. By Mrs. Anna H. Leonowens, E. C. T.....	45
Geschichte der Elementaren Schulen in Deutschland. Von Carl Krieger, Dr. Phil. T. V.....	46
Protestanten-Bibel Neuen Testaments. Herausgegeben von Dr. Paul Wilhelm Schmidt und Dr. Franz von Holtzen- dorf. Dritte Hälfte. (The Bible of the New Testa- ment. Edited by Dr. Paul Wilhelm Schmidt and Dr. Franz von Holtzendorf. First Half, T. F.....	47
Möven und Mythologien. By John Flaxie, M.A., LL.D., E. C. T.....	48
Schlange in der Schule? Von Dr. Th. Mertens, Director der Städtischen-Schule, II., zu Hannover. (Blows in School? Von Dr. Th. Mertens, Director of the Second City School for Boys. Hannover. T. V.....	49
La Cité Aptique. Étude sur le Culte, le Droit, les Institutions de la Grèce et de Rome. Par Fustel de Coulanges, Profes- sor d'Histoire à la Faculté des Lettres de Strasbourg. Traduction Française. (The Ancient City. A Study of the Worship, the Law, and the Institutions of Greece and Rome. By Fustel de Coulanges, Professor of History in the Faculty of Letters at Strasbourg. Crowned by the French Academy), T. V.....	50
Lat in Wirklichkeit der Religionsunterricht der Krebschen unserer Zeit? Beleuchtung und Widerlegung der von Dr. Fritz Schultze ausgesprochenen Anschauungen. Religionsunterricht erhobenen Vorwürfe und Beschuldigungen. Von Dr. Edmund Speiser. (Is Religious Instruction in reality the Cancerous Evil of Our Time? An Exam- ination of Refutation of the Reproaches and Charges which Dr. Fritz Schultze makes against Religion, Re- ligious Teachers, and Religious Instruction. By Dr. Edmund Speiser), T. V.....	51
The Primitive Culture. B. Frothingham, F. E. A.....	52
Taylor's "Primitive Culture," II., E. C. T.....	53
Galilée, les Droits de la Science et la Méthode des Sciences Physiques. Par Th. Henri Martin. (Galileo. The Rights of Science and the Method of Physical Sciences. By Thomas Henri Martin), T. V.....	54
Taylor's "Primitive Culture," III., E. C. T.....	55
The Pilgrim and the Shrine. Herbert Ainslie, E. C. T.....	56
The Pilgrim and the Shrine. Herbert Ainslie (continued). E. C. T.....	57
Haxe Holm's Stories. X. F. Z.....	58
Reine Marie. Stories. Louise Chandler Moulton, F. E. A.....	59
Wanted—A Literary Critic. X. F. Z.....	60
Politics and Mysteries of Life Insurance. By Eliza Wright, E. C. A.....	61
Flora of the Vine-lands. By Joaquin Miller, F. E. A.....	62
8x8 in Education. Ed. H. Clarke, M. D. F. E. A.....	63
Social and Literary Judgments. By W. B. Greg, F. E. A.....	64
Philosophy of Things. Wm. Denton, F. H. Lowe, F. E. A.....	65
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol, F. E. A.....	66

POETRY.

Organise, S. A. D.	47
Standards on the HUD-Top.....	127
The Higher View, Jennie Perrier	135
Alpine Roses, Rachel Pomeroy	157
Our Little Ghost, L. M. Alcott	221
The First Problem, S. A. D.	321
In Memoriam, Asterisk	373
Inconspicuous, Amelia Williams	395
My Mother, Marion R. W.	437
Sweet Fern Leaves, M. R. W.	457
My Birthday Gift, Emily H. Leland	481
The Secret, J. H. C.	445
..... Laure	457
Runnet.....	469
The King's Picture, Helen D. Bosworth	489
At Sixty-Four.....	499
..... W. H. C.	509
Winter, and a Grave, M. R. W.	517
The Seeker, S. M.	517

COMMUNICATIONS

Recent Topics, S. C. Tomp	4
Letters From Max Mueller	7
Reading Notes, S. H. Morse	10
The Photographs Prentiss, A. K. Ralls	12
Medical Wood Time, E. S. Hutchins	12
"Squid and the Fish"	12
Recent Topics, S. C. Tomp	15
Authority and Influence, F. T. Washburn	18
Letters From H. Morse	20
Reading Notes	22
The "Porter" Argument for a Deity, H. F. C.	24
Reading Notes, S. H. Morse	26
Letter From Andrew	26
Circulating Libs., J. D. Clifford	36
Discussion of Free Thought, W. H. D.	36
Reading Notes	40
On Sympathy, K. W. A.	44
Science Radical Club	47
Calon of Drugs and State, John West	47
Reading Notes	48
The Index Amplified, A. T.	47
Examine the Documents, S. C. Tomp	48
Reading Notes and the Functions, C. T. F.	48
Reading Notes, S. H. Morse	48

A Letter from Mr. Tuttle.
Now is the Time, S. P. Putnam.
Musterling, E. M. F. Denton.
A Qualification, S. H. Holland.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
The Crime, G. C. Adams, B. R. Tucker.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
Corsets &c. Hrahus, Louise S. Hotchkiss.
Religiously Consistent & Loyal, Morse.
The Crime, G. C. Adams, B. R. Tucker.
Free Religion and Social Reform, F. A. Honeckey.
Result of Church Going, A. H.
An Evening with the Unitarians, Helen B. Boutwell.
The Crime, G. C. Adams, B. R. Tucker.
Take It Back, Brother Morse, E. C. L. B.
"The Head and the Heart," F. S. Hildings.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
The Crime, G. C. Adams, B. R. Tucker.
Spice of All Sorts, John Wetherlee.
Woman Suffrage.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
Some Reasons for Organizing, F. S. Hildings.
Spontaneous Generation, Margaret Chappell Smith.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
Who is Judge Strong? Elizur Wright.
God, the Cause of the Crime, G. C. Adams, B. R. Tucker.
Protest Against Persecution.
A Gentle Remonstrance, A. W. Kelley.
Parker Pillsbury, M. R. Robinson, Pres.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
Index Exurgatorius, W.
An Appeal for Aid.
New York Items, H. L. B. B.
Clear Denial, S. H. Morse.
Signs of Progress in China, A. H.
Voltaire's Death, B. T. M.
The Danger of Spiritualism, Hudson Tuttle.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
The Communion Table, J. W.
"How Shall We Meet the Labor Problem?" A. H.
Clerical Agitation, F. Symmes.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
Voices from the Index Constituency.
A Letter from Mr. Batta.
Voices from the Index Constituency.
The In-Breaking Light.
Voices from the Index Constituency.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
Voices from the Index Constituency.
Voices from the Index Constituency.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
Tyndall—"The Underworld," G. B. Stebbins.
Progress in South America, Eric S. Miller.
"The Fetich of Science," E. P.
Fair Play, F. R. Jones.
Emerson and His Contemporary Poets, Golden Day.
A Parallel, F. W.
Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., S. H.
The Court System, E. C. Adams.
Unbelieving English Statesmen, R. A. Skies.
The Effect of Revivals, E. D. S.
The One Cure for the Social Evil, N. E. Boyd.
A Friendly Word, L. F. C. Garin.
Information Wanted, G. E. P.
Free Speech Defended.
The Situation Accepted, Uriah Clark.
My First Preaching, Louise S. Hotchkiss.
"Come to Jesus."
The Battle Begun, Charlotte A. Barber.
The "Cost System" Again, Benj. R. Tucker.
Cruelty as a Pastime, A. A. B.
Prof. Banks and the "Cost System," J. L. H.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
Immoral Advertisements, L. F. C. Garin.
Providence, N. R. W.
Ancient Radicalism, A. S. B.
Orthodoxy and the Indiana, A. Cridge.
That Tree Cut down Again, E. L. Crane.
Too Much Cookery, Sam'l Levitt.
New Organization.
Testing Prayer by its Fruits, T. P. Wilson.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
Meek Self-Exaltation, Chas. K. Whipple.
Nepotism in the Church, Reporter.
Evening Notes, S. H. Morse.
Free Religion and Free Trade, Free Trader.
Evil Influence of Orthodoxy upon Mind and Morals, Charles K. Whipple.
The Tree Still Standing, Benj. R. Tucker.
Lourdes Grotto, J. E. H.
Experience, J. H. B.
Forsaken as a Prayer, Post, J. G.
"The Christian Cause," H.
Grote on Comte, G. R. Bishop.
Intellectual Honesty, E. D. S.
Congressional Recommendations, S. R. H.
"Good Words," F. W.
The Higher Truths of Natural Religion, A. H.
Science—Spiritualism, G. B. Stebbins.
Rational Nurture of Children, B. W.
Health and Religion, A. S. B.
A Criticism of Theism, Howard Tuttle.
"Literature and Dogma," S. P. Putnam.
"Quakers and Friends," Benj. E. Hopkins.
Is "Universal Consensus" Responsible? A.
An Increasing Public Evil, A.
Camp-Meeting Methodism: A New "Slaughter of the Innocents," M. L. H.
Freedom of the Press, Austin Kent.
Usury, Eugene Hotchkiss.
Critical Notice, C. K. W.
Ruthless "Intolerance," C. E. M.
Euthanasia, J. E. H.
Free Religions Association in Germany, Dr. Mergler.
"Reverend," Sam'l R. Huxley.
"Religion: The Name and the Thing," A. Macdonald.
Is It Jealousy? J. H. B.
"The Crime," G. C. Adams, B. R. Tucker.
Sunday-schools, W. H. E. Argument, C. K. W.

Bear Your Own Burden, Fred' R. Honey
 Beat the Ground of Theism, S. P. Putnam
 Is R. Martineau's "Practical Doctrinal"
 A Letter from Mr. Towler
 Which Shall We Believe? C. K. W.
 The Inner Light, Ben. E. Hopkins
 Defence of Orthodoxy, C. Stearns
 Are All Christians Brought to Light?
 "There's No Such Person," J. A.
 A True-Blue Sermon, Frank Purdon
 Atoneinent by Infidelity, G. W. Tennant
 "Discontinue No," J. A. Grant
 The Healthy Attitude, F. R. Hume
 "Good-Speed," Harry Hopper
 Foreign Influences, Polomac
 Theological Assumptions, C. K. W.
 Science and Faith, G. M. J.
 Concentration, J. G. H.
 Whiskey Men and Infidels, Will Harkney
 "Prest" and "Teacher," F. R. Honey
 The Woodhull, Wm. J. Austin Kent
 Dabbling in Politics, C. Coe
 Dr. Clarke on the "Religion of Humanity," Frank S. Hulings
 The Scotch Clergy, J. F.
 Dr. Lord's Sermons, T. Tunner
 Is Interest-Taking Unjust? W. J. Hoerling
 The Famous "Vision of Joseph Hoag," Thos. R. Hazard
 Thomas Paine's Argument for Theism, Thos. M. Chittenden
 Letter from Mr. Johnson
 Outside or Inside of Christianity, A. B.
 Are Perfect Men Perfect Villains? R. E. F.
 The Judicial Oath, Mrs. J. R. Walker
 Corruptors of Youth, Observer
 Judas Iscariot, C. Sexton
 Classification of Theists, S. H. Honey
 The Sin of Usury, Benj. R. Tucker
 The Future Life—"Which No one Knows Of," G. B. Stebbins
 Deism and Natural Religion, C
 Simplicity of the Gospel, W. W.
 A Question to Mr. Hoerling, C. H. Hays
 Another Definition of Religion, Religion
 Orthodox Expatriation, Mrs. Humphrey
 An Orthodox Challenge, W. W.
 THE INDEX "Found Wanting," G. G. Chittenden
 Can the Hopes of the Evangelical Alliance be Realized?
 Extracts from Plotinus, T. M. Johnson
 The Interest Question, B. R. Tucker
 The Vineland Liberal League
 What Is "Infidelity"? W. Treichel
 Euthanasia, A. W. Kelsey
 Fifty Questions for Revivalists, J. S. Thomsen
 Equal Taxation, C. K. W.
 Anglo-Bengalee, C. K. W.
 A Reply to Dr. Horach's "Question," Wm. Hoerling

	PAGE
"Outside or Inside," Carl H. Horsch	461
The Free Religious Society of New Milford, Pa., David H. Clark	467
"The Faithful Association of Clearfield County, Pa.,".....	467
A Letter by a Veteran Reformer, Sallie Holley	472
The Atonement Dogma, Henry Seeger	472
Missionaries Selling Each Other.....	473
"The Tenth," T. J. Fowler	473
Washington Letter, Vander	478
Church and State, Mrs. J. R. Walker	480
Non-Christianity Disposed Of.....	480
Manly and Womanly, H. J. Taylor	481
The "Palma's" Beliefs, O. W. Tennant	483
The Mediaville Students on Exemption, G. B.	485
Is God Subject to Law, B. F. Underwood	486
Country Agents, H. J. Taylor	486
Religious Materialism, Morris Alliman	487
Built on the Sand, C. A. W.	491
A Deep at Parle, Elizabeth L. Mason	497
The Doctrine of Necessity, J. T. I.	502
Principles of Religion, W. C. Connel	502
The "Two Yews of Free Religion," W. C. Connel	502
Julius Caesar, T. B. O.	509
An Idol's Treeing, N. Grossmayer	509
From Mr. Milroy.....	510
"Improper Advertisements," A. W. Keely	520
The Wickedness of Profits, Wm. L. Heberling	521
The Reproductiveness of Capital, E. Walker	521
Religion Defined, H. E. S.	521
Next Year's Religion, W. C. Connel	521
Anti-Fashion Convention, Mary E. Tillman, et al.	521
The Work of Prayer, C. A. W.	522
A Very Interesting Experience, J. L. Patrick	523
Seeds of Success, Madan K. Sanyal, C. H. M.	523
A Report to the Public, Reed	523

MISCELLANEOUS.

Our Platform.....	1
Duty in Essentials.....	2
The Constitution and Religion.....	4
Food for Thought.....	17
Character of Religion.....	20
Speaking the Truth.....	26
Church Authority in Extremes.....	28
A Devil Worshipping.....	49
Religious Issues for the Directors.....	64
How the Word "Boston" was Made.....	64
Sectarian Schools.....	65
Liberty of Taste.....	65
Religion is Suffered.....	65
Putting it to Vote.....	69
The Mission of Science.....	96
Christ and Beer.....	96
The Religious Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, as for a National Convention.....	110
The National Organization of Infidelity.....	120
Meditations.....	120
Business Notice by the Directors.....	129
Interesting Declon.....	149
The Southern Freedmen: Their Strange Religious Ideas.....	149
Business Notice by the Directors.....	151
The Sunday Library Question.....	161
The King is Dead.....	171
The Value of Capital Punishment.....	171
Wives and Money.....	187
Religion in Government.....	187
The Birth of Chemistry.....	195
Facts for the People.....	211
Temperance.....	218
New Technology.....	218
Joiah and the Whale.....	219
The New Educational System in Italy.....	223
The Origin of Life.....	226
United States.....	226
Progress in Japan.....	233
Staying in to Reform.....	236
Why Jews don't Proselyte.....	236
Hill.....	238
The Japanese Ambassadors in Europe, and the Christian Religion.....	239
Atheistic Superior to Free Religion.....	242
The Fate of the Earth.....	242
Children.....	243
The Garrute in Spain.....	247
Inducery in Speech.....	247
A Terrible Lie.....	247
Society for Converting the Jews.....	250
A Norwegian Tale.....	250
Hard on the Minister.....	253
A Japanese.....	253
Original King-Craft.....	259
The Bible in Our Public Schools.....	259
Rip Van Winkle.....	266
Autumn.....	276
Christian Persecutions.....	281
Lava Beds, Cal.....	291
The Greatest Lie on Record.....	295
Accident to a Venerable Statesman.....	295
The German Penal Laws.....	311
Turning the Tables.....	314
Doing Good.....	318
Fireproof Parker.....	319
To-ting Prayer.....	319
Making Money.....	319
Commentary on the Bible.....	328
How to Turn Out.....	327
Persian Laws.....	327
Clippings from the Loudon Graphic.....	330
State of Education in Persia.....	330
Heavenly Poetry.....	342
Direct Evidence.....	342
Marvels of the Insect World.....	344
The Legend of the Frozen Lake.....	360
An Argument for Public Education.....	361
The Evangelical Alliance.....	361
Drew's Orthography.....	361
The Foundation of Civil Governments.....	373
A Modern Miracle.....	373
The Outlook.....	373
The Jews.....	373
Emotional Excitement more Waating than Intellectual Labor.....	373
The Facts of the Amoy.....	377
An Extraordinary Witness.....	384
Church Exemption.....	384
The Gentiles of To-day.....	384
A Woman's Daily Sayings.....	394
Modern Methodism.....	394
The New Trials of American Democracy.....	395
The Blue Blood of Canada.....	398
The Fervent of the Three Rings.....	397
Charles Bradlaugh.....	397
Extraordinary Appeals for Prayers.....	398
White-law Reid and Anna Dickinson.....	398
The Woman's Suffrage Question.....	405
The Free Religious Association.....	405
A Challenge to Prayer.....	420
The Re-establishment of Temporal Power.....	421
John Stuart Mill's Atheism.....	425
An Explanation.....	425
To Whom It May Concern.....	444
The Fire Worshipping.....	445
The New Millford Society.....	445
The Task to be done by Millions.....	445
Old and New Missionaries.....	456
Mr. Abbott on the High Price of Souls.....	457
The Impoverishment of Christanity.....	459
Mr. Spencer on his Alleged Conversion.....	459
Poetry and Prose.....	471
Universal Liberal League.....	471
Sunday Laws of Massachusetts.....	486
Anti-Exemption Petition.....	486
John Stuart Mill.....	491
Church Property.....	491
Melting of the Boston Liberal League.....	506
Firehouse Parker.....	506
Infidelity Rampant—Religious Radicalism.....	517
Prescription in Pennsylvania.....	517
The Question of Sunday.....	521
Speech of Frederick Douglass.....	522
The Two Anti-Exemption Petitions.....	523

THE SANCTUARY OF SUPERSTITION.

Pages 5, 17, 29, 41, 65, 77, 113, 125, 137, 149, 175, 215, 283, 271, 279

F. R. A. NOTICES.

Special Notice, Wm. J. Potter, Sec'y, pages 192, 200, 206, 328, 338, 350, 447, 471, 519, 531.
F. R. A. Convention, Wm. J. Potter, Sec'y, pages 350, 362.
Convention to New York, Wm. J. Potter, Sec'y, pages 362, 363.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, JANUARY 4, 1873.

WHOLE No. 158.

HOW IS YOUR HEALTH?

If good, you are living right. If not, you should study the LAWS OF LIFE AND HEALTH by reading the

SCIENCE OF HEALTH.

A new and thoroughly practical Health Journal. Its teachings are based on Hygienic Principles, promote the best interests of the individual, the Nation, and the Race. THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH is independent of medical schools or sects, and asks only to teach the reader "how to live" so as to regain and retain Health.

A GOOD NUMBER.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH for January contains matters interesting and important to all readers. Ladies should read "What My Corsets Cost Me;" Early Marriages will interest both sexes; Holiday Hikes, What to Select and How to Cook, a timely article, looking to luxurious and healthful food; Dress of Uncivilized Women; Three Classes of American Boys, with illustrations; Popular Physiology, with illustrations; Ague and Fever, the Cause and Cure; Scarlatina; Bronchitis; Health of Teachers; Women Doctors, in answer to correspondents, we have—How to Feed the Baby; Gray Hairs; Sick Headache; Bilious Fever and Ague; Magnetic Waters, concluding with Excellent Health Laxatives, including Cold Feet; Headache; Cramps; Lumbago; Heartburn; Dyspepsia; Neuralgia; Tinnitus; Impure Blood; Corns and Bunions; Bowel Complaints; Constipation; Sleep, etc.; with remarks on "Prayer and Meditation," making a capital number with which to begin the new volume and the new year. Price 20 cents, or $2 a year.

Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THE BUTLER HEALTH LIFT.

LEWIS G. JAMES, MANAGER.

Principal Office—New York.
Park Bank Building, 214 Broadway.
ALSO,
BROOKLYN, 188 REMSEN STREET.

"This kind of exertion not only increases muscular power but refreshes exhausted nervous energy.—H. D. NOYES, M. D., Professor in Bellevue Medical College.
Apparatus for private use of the most perfect construction, and at the most reasonable prices. Refer to Rev. O. B. Frothingham, Rev. Dr. Bartol, D. S. Rogers, and many others.
Visitors Always Welcome.

THE Popular Science Monthly.

CONDUCTED BY E. L. YOUNG.

No. 9. PRICE, FIFTY CENTS.

CONTENTS OF No. 9, FOR JANUARY.

I. The Study of Sociology—Subjective Dimensions. By Herbert Spencer.
II. Spontaneous Movements in Plants. By Alfred W. Bennett, M. A., B.Sc., F. R. S. (Illustrated.)
III. Light and Life. By Fernand Papillon.
IV. A New Phase of German Thought—The Philosophy of the Unconscious. From the French of Leon Dumont.
V. Evolution and the Spectroscope. By F. W. Clark.
VI. Dr. Livingstone. By L. J. Proctor. (Portrait.)
VII. Art in the Stone Age. (Illustrated.)
VIII. Cultivating Wild Flowers. By Professor Samuel Lockwood.
IX. The Velocity of the Wind. By R. Radao.
X. Astronomical and Physical Observatories.
XI. EDWIN'S TABLE: Observation in Education—Death of Mr. Greeley—Tyndall and Froide.

LITERARY NOTICES: Tyndall's Faraday as a Discoverer—Gladstone's Michael Faraday—Freuchtwanger's Popular Treatise on Gena, etc., etc.

MISCELLANY: Experiments on Sound—A New Species of Rhinoceros—The Sun as a Borer of Mountains—Antiseptic Properties of Borax—Bulb Culture in Holland—Cinchona in Bengal—Disintegration of Tin—Opium-poppies in France—Test for Silk Goods—The Orange—Phosphoric Acid, etc.

NOTES.

THE POPULAR SCIENCE MONTHLY is published in a large octavo, handsomely printed on clear type. Terms, Five Dollars per annum; or Fifty Cents per copy.

CLUB TERMS.

Any person, remitting Twenty Dollars for four yearly subscriptions, will receive an extra copy gratis, or five yearly subscriptions for $20.00.

THE POPULAR SCIENCE MONTHLY AND APPLETON'S JOURNAL, for one year, $8.00.

D. APPLETON & CO., Pub's,
549 & 551 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE WEEK.

Most thinking people have wished that they "could read all the papers." THE WEEK enables one to do nearly as well. It quotes the important editorials of the best papers, of all parties, gives all news worth reading, and tells what is going on in Literature, Science, and Art. Cultivated persons with but little time to read, or living in out-of-the-way places, will find it just what they have been looking for. The NEW STORY, by the author of "Dorothy Fox," is now running in it.

CONTENTS OF "THE WEEK" FOR DEC. 19, 1872.

EVENTS.—The Louisiana Muddle: "The Fifth Avenue Horror;" How Railroaders may be Baited; Position of the Liberator; Republican Rewards; Edwin Forrest: The Humiliation of the North; What the Census Says; The Spanish King and his Minister.

MISCELLANY.—Miss Alcott in Rome; Flogging and Fagging; Compulsory Decoration; After the Fire; A Dredging Expedition; The German Army; Chief-Justice Tancay's Statue; Hero Carthage; A Novel, by Louise Parr, author of "Do Roby Fox," Chapter III.; The Wooling Of, a Novel, Chapter XVI.

LITERATURE.—Mr. Stanley's "How I Found Livingstone;" Mr. Froide as a Historian; More Holiday Books; Literary Gossip.

SCIENCE AND DISCOVERY.—Yeans and Photography; Science Gossip.

ART, MUSIC, AND DRAMA.—Mrs. Abbott and Amateur Acting.

Send for gratis specimen number to

HOLT & WILLIAMS,
35 Bond Street, New York.

MUSICAL GIFT BOOKS!

"Gems of Strauss."

The "Gem" of the season is having a remarkable sale. Contains all of Strauss' best music; $20 large pages.

"Musical Treasure,"

Latest collection of choicest Vocal and Piano Music.

"Wreath of Gems,"

Entirely Vocal Music. Songs, Ballads, Duets, etc.

"Piano Forte Gems,"

Entirely Piano Music, Nocturnes, Dance Music, etc.

Price of any of the above, $2.50; or, in Fall Gift, $4.

MUSICAL LITERATURE.

Mozart (by H. Rau) $1.75

Beethoven (life of) 2.00

Mendelssohn, (life of) 1.75

Chopin (life of) by Polko's Musical 1.50

Beethoven's, Mozart's, Mendelssohn's letters, each, 1.75

Ritter's History of Music, 1.50

Moore's Encyclopedia of Music, 0.00

Any one of the above sent, post-paid, for net price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

The Illustrated Phrenological

JOURNAL. This Magazine has been before the public so long and become so well established, that the Publisher hardly feels called upon to more than announce a new volume. Its name has become a household word in all parts of the country. It will as heretofore be devoted to all that will improve men Physically, Mentally, and Morally. Containing all that is new on Phrenology, or the Brain and its Functions; Ethnology, or the Natural History of Man; Phrenology, or the Signs of Character exhibited in the human Face and Form; Psychology, or the Science of the Soul; Sociology, or Man in his Private and Public Relations; History and Biography, or Man in the Past and in the Present.

TERMS.—$5.00 a year. Single Numbers, 30 cents; Ten Copies, $4.00, and an extra copy to agent.

PREMIUMS.—Besides the above Club Rates, we are offering the most liberal Premiums, a List of which will be sent on application. LOCAL AGENTS wanted everywhere and cash commissions given. Please address

S. H. WELLS Publisher,
389 Broadway, New York.

HEALTH, EXERCISE, AND

LIFTING CURE. 229 FIFTH AVENUE. "As a means of retaining and, in certain chronic cases of disease, of regaining health, I regard it as of GREAT VALUE."—F. J. DUMATEL, M. D., College of Physicians and Surgeons.

"Admirable in its results, and of the greatest benefit to those frames weakened and diseased by civil life and sedentary habits."—Edward Bayard, M. D.

Parents who have feeble children can have them placed under our care with the assurance that all we can do to make them robust will be done.

Send stamp for a circular.

M. L. HOLBROOK, M. D.,
229 Fifth Ave., New York.

Refer to Cyrus W. Field, Asa K. Butler, O. B. Frothingham, E. P. Dutton.

HARLAN P. HYDE.

REAL ESTATE AGENT,

AND

Negotiator of Mortgages.

95 1-2 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

Are You Going to New York?

If so, and you wish to stop where you can

FEEL AT HOME, and get GOOD FOOD

HEALTHFULLY PREPARED AND PLENTY

OF IT.

Go to the Hygienic Institute,

Nos. 13 & 15 Laight Street.

Horse Cars pass near the door to all parts of the city, making it a very convenient stopping place for persons visiting New York, either upon business or pleasure. Open at all hours, day and night. Board by the day or week, at reasonable rates. Rooms can be secured in advance by writing.

Address

WOOD & HOLBROOK, Prop's,

Nos. 13 and 15 Laight Street, New York.

"THE GALAXY" is about as near perfection as anything can be.—Daily Register, New Haven, Conn.

THE GALAXY

FOR 1873.

It is the best American Magazine. No family can afford to do without it. It gives more good and attractive reading matter for the money than any other periodical or book published.

THE LEADING NEWSPAPERS PRONOUNCE

THE GALAXY

The Best and most Ably Edited American Magazine.

THE GALAXY

Meets the Wants of Every Member of the family.

It contains thoughtful articles by our ablest writers.

It contains sketches of life and adventure.

It has serial stories by our best novelists.

It has short stories in each number.

The new department of SCIENTIFIC MISCELLANY appears in each number.

What the Leading Papers say.

"First of all in attractions we place 'The Galaxy.'—Standard, Chicago.

"Well sustains its reputation for vigorous and racy writing."—N. Y. Tribune.

"The Galaxy" is always more a magazine than any, and more varied in its range than any other."—Independent.

"A model periodical; a credit to American periodical literature."—Philadelphia Press.

"There is not a dull page between its covers."—N. Y. Times.

"The variety of its contents, their solid worth, their brilliancy, and their great interest make up a general character of great excellence for every number."—Post, Boston.

"Always ably edited, and remarkable for the good judgment displayed in the selection of current topics for discussion. In this way quite eclipses the more conservative periodicals of the day."—Boston Journal, Mass.

"We are inclined to believe that more down-right good literature is crowded between the covers of 'The Galaxy' than any other American magazine can boast of."—Chicago Times.

"Sheldon & Company have opened a mine of interest in their magazine, 'The Galaxy,' by drawing to it the communications of prominent public men upon questions of general interest."—Age, Philadelphia.

"The reported increase in the circulation of 'The Galaxy' is hardly to be wondered at, for it is certainly the best of American magazines."—Express, Buffalo, N. Y.

"The Galaxy" is one of the fullest, and, taken altogether, richest, of the many monthlies which have given such an enviable name to our American magazine literature."—Sunday-School Times, Philadelphia, Pa.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

PRICE 35 CTS. PER NUMBER.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $4.00 per year.

CLUBBING TERMS.

THE GALAXY will be sent for the year 1873 with any one of the following Periodicals at the price named: With "Harper's Weekly," or "Harper's Bazar," or Appleton's Journal, $7; the regular price is $8. With "Every Saturday," $8; regular price $9. With "Our Young Folks," $5.00; regular price $6. With "Littell's Living Age," $10; regular price, $12. Address

SHELDON & COMPANY,

677 Broadway, New York.

New England Thought!

JOURNAL OF PROGRESS AND REFORM,

"THE COMMONWEALTH,"

OF BOSTON, MASS.

Now in its ELEVENTH YEAR, gives a cordial recognition to all the progressive movements of the age, and with its attention mainly upon

POLITICS,

LITERATURE,

ART AND NEWS,

has free and unbiased columns for their elucidation. $3.00 to Boston subscribers; $4.00 to mail subscribers. Send for specimen copies.

CHAS. W. SLACK & SON, Publishers.

25 Bromfield St., Boston.

A SWEET, PURE BREATH DEPENDS ON CERTAIN BODILY CONDITIONS, which are explained in THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH, a new independent Health monthly, at $3 a year. Published by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THE (ORIGINAL) CONTINENTAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.,

of Hartford, Conn. Incorporated May, 1863.

SAM'L E. KIMORE, President,

JOHN S. RICE, Vice President,

FRANCIS D. DOUGLASS, Secretary,

U. K. MOSELEY, Actuary.

THE CONTINENTAL especially commends itself by its past experience and present management, to those who desire to place their insurance in a conservative company, conducted on the principle of furnishing reliable and absolute insurance at as reasonable cost as is consistent with perfect security.

Let a few first-class Agents be wanted for unoccupied fields.

BABCOCK FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against fire."

USED BY

RAILROADS,

STEAMBOATS,

HOTELS,

FACTORIES,

ASYLUMS,

FIRE DEPARTMENTS, ETC.

F. W. FARWELL, Sec'y,

407 Broadway, New York.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

he Science of a New Life.

JOHN COWAN, M. D. A radical work on Physiology and the laws necessary to the Union of the Human Race. Recommended and endorsed by O. B. Frothingham, Dr. Dia

Robert Dale Owen, THE INDEX, and other most eminent ministers, physicians, religious and star papers. Every copy sold helps in the cause of the coming "millennium." Agents desired everywhere. Send for circulars. Sold by subscription and by the Publishers.

WATSON & CO., 120 Eighth St., New York.

3REAT OFFER! HOLIDAYS!

LACE WATERS, 481 BROADWAY, N. Y.,

dispose of 100 Pianos, Melodeons,

Organs, of three first-class makers, Including Water, at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES

FOR CASH, during the HOLIDAYS. Now the first-class Pianos, modern improvements, for $275 cash. The Concerto Parlor is the most beautiful in style and performance ever made. Price, for 5 stops, $185.

For $225 and $250 cash. Other Organs and for $45 and upwards for cash.

Send Catalogues mailed.

F. HUGGLES, BIBLIOPOL.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dealer in English and American Free Thought Literature.

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

Published by the Index Association at No. 142, St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio, with Branch Office at No. 36, Day Street, New York City.

EDITOR:
FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:
ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.
M. D. CONWAY, England.

THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A new LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MONSIE, late editor of the Radical, whose EVENING NOTES will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 36, Day Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. P. DIMON, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post office money order.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

Address THE INDEX,
DRAWER 23, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A UNIQUE PREMIUM.

Photographs and Autographs

OF

LEADING WRITERS

OF

THE INDEX.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

W. J. POTTER.

W. H. SPENCER.

F. W. NEWMAN.

CHAS. VOYSEY.

A. W. STEVENS.

F. E. ABBOT.

To the PHOTOGRAPH of any ONE of the above-named persons will be mailed post-paid to any NEW subscriber who shall remit $3.00 for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

To any one who shall send a list of names of from one to eight NEW subscribers and $3.00 for each, a corresponding number of Photographs shall be mailed post-paid, to be given to these subscribers; and the same number of Photographs shall also be mailed, post paid, as premium to the sender himself.

To any one who shall send $9.00 for three years' subscription to THE INDEX in advance, a full set of the Photographs shall be mailed post-paid.

The Autograph of each of the above American writers will in all cases accompany the corresponding Photograph; but no Autograph can be sent with the Photograph of the English writers.

These Photographs are well executed, are not on sale anywhere, and can be obtained in no other way. In offering them as premiums, the INDEX ASSOCIATION rely on the good will and active co-operation of all friends of THE INDEX.

All orders for Photographs and remittances of money should be addressed to

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 23, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations," and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—8 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution", by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath", by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education", by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Third Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 23, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA," by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alsolt, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 25 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, JANUARY 4, 1873.

WHOLE No. 158.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

ORGANIZE!

LIBERALS OF AMERICA!

The hour for action has arrived. The cause of freedom calls upon us to combine our strength, our zeal, our efforts. These are

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempted from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Let us boldly and with high purpose meet the duty of the hour. I submit to you the following

FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The objects of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues, when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

Liberals! I pledge to you my undivided sympathies and most vigorous co-operation, both in THE INDEX and out of it, in this work of local and national organization. Let us begin at once to lay the foundations of a great national party of freedom, which shall demand the entire secularization of our municipal, state, and national government. Send to me promptly the list of officers of every Liberal League that may be formed, and a standing list of all such Leagues shall be kept in THE INDEX. Rouse, then, to the great work of freeing America from the usurpations of the Church! Make this continent from ocean to ocean sacred to human liberty! Prove that you are worthy descendants of those whose wisdom and patriotism gave us a Constitution untainted with superstition! Shake off your slumbers, and break the chains to which you have too long tamely submitted!

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

TOLEDO, Ohio, Jan. 1, 1873.

"Union is Strength."

READ TO THE FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY OF TOLEDO, DEC. 22, 1872.

BY FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

To-day, as you all remember, is the two hundred and fifty-second anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth Rock. Recent investigations have convinced many of our best living historical authorities that the true date of this ever-memorable event was the twenty-first, and not the twenty-second day of December. But this is what has been long celebrated as "Forefathers' Day," and it makes little difference, except to an antiquarian, which date is the correct one. The event itself is one that will be gratefully remembered so long as America retains a heart of love and honor for those who laid the foundations of her as yet unmeasured greatness. I know the faults of the Pilgrim Fathers: they were stern, fanatical, intolerant; they persecuted the Quakers and the Baptists, they destroyed the witches, they burned with holy and deadly wrath against all who dared to dispute their dark religion, or their right to govern this country in its name. But none the less were they men and women of massive mould, of grand and rarest virtues, of a spirit so fearless and conscientious and devoted that to-day we owe to them the very best traits of our national character. The superstitions of the Pilgrims have partially (and only partially) perished; but the tough fibre of their moral constitution makes to-day the chief element of America's true glory. Let us not judge those genuine heroes by standards fitted only to modern life. The sublime quality of their character makes me proud, "Infidel" as I am if judged by their tests of "faith," to own myself as their descendant, and to fancy that I feel the stirring of the old Puritan blood in my veins.

A few years ago, I was called to preach one Sunday to the First Church of Plymouth, the earliest church planted by the Puritans on American soil. In the course of human progress it has become a Unitarian society. On that occasion I delivered my most radical discourse, a plain comparison of Christianity with Free Religion, and did not hesitate to utter the extremest views I held on that subject. Could I be otherwise than deeply impressed, to stand thus under the very shadow of Burial Hill, and in the venerable pulpit of the Puritans themselves to proclaim the new gospel which would have filled them with horror? Was I a traitor to the cause they loved and so faithfully, so grimly served? No, verily! Little as they comprehended the full scope and breadth of the word, they nevertheless dedicated America to religious freedom. Little as they perceived that Christianity, to which also they dedicated America in the same breath, was a natural foe to religious freedom, they yet bequeathed to their descendants a love of liberty, a fidelity to conviction, a principle of duty and loyalty to the truth, which need but to be educated to make America the freest and noblest land that the world is ever likely to see. And so, when I stood on Plymouth Rock, I am not ashamed to confess that the tears rushed to my eyes, as the ejaculation involuntarily surged up in my heart—"God keep me faithful to the Pilgrims' cause!"

Yes, America is dedicated to freedom still.

The decree of destiny has gone forth that Liberty shall rule the western world; and from this favored land her sway shall spread to the uttermost corners of the globe. "In thee shall all the nations of the world be blessed." So may it be! But between that happy time and this must intervene a stern and desperate struggle—a time that shall try men's souls—an epoch of long transition from the old to the new, which cannot elapse without the throes that mark the death of every ancient faith as it suddenly and despairingly retires before the better faith that must succeed. Let us not deceive ourselves. The love of power dies hard—dies only on compulsion—dies only when death is inevitable. The great Christian Church, which in the childhood of the race was a beneficent ruler, has become to-day its great and powerful oppressor; and whoever dreams that it shall peacefully and meekly place the crown on the head of its greater successor, Liberty, knows little of the laws of history and the nature of man. I do not love contention. I take no delight in the clash of conflict. I should rejoice to believe that the old could pass into the new as the darkness of night melts into the radiance of day. But what power have our wishes to mould the fact? To me it is clear as noonday that the opposing forces of progress and retrogression must meet face to face, and decide the world's destiny by the stern arbitrament of war. Not, perhaps, the war of swords; I most earnestly hope that frightful scourge may be avoided. But at least the war of political strife; that is too plainly inevitable to leave room even for hope that it can be shunned.

Believing, then, in freedom with a comprehension of its demands and its nature that was impossible in the day of the Pilgrims, I claim still to carry on the great cause of the Fathers to a grander issue than they ever conceived. To this complacent American people I must not flinch to declare,—"You are not free! You are a NATION OF SLAVES!" I must not falter in the high duty of summoning them to break their chains. Angry and bitter as may be the response, I must stand at my post, deliver my message, and meet the issue, whether it be ridicule or wrath, a sneer of indifference, a shout of derision, or a storm of fury. But I would most earnestly disclaim the conceit of "leadership." The sentinel is not the general. Slaves have leaders, but freemen never. Liberty disputes her leadership to no man, and suffers her followers to have servants only. In all simplicity and sincerity I would be content to declare what I see, and shun the miserable struggle for pre-eminence to seek the clearest opportunity for service. I repeat, therefore, as the word which is most unpalatable but most necessary to be said, that the American people are a nation of slaves. But the hour for liberty has arrived, and the supreme duty of the hour is to ORGANIZE.

"America not free! America a nation of slaves! It is false!"

No fetter is so terrible or so degrading as the fetter that is unfelt—the fetter that so benumbs the limbs as to make them insensible of its own pressure. The slavery against which the will rebels, yielding only to superior physical force, is bad enough; but what shall be said of the slavery that captures the will itself, cheats the soul into a belief in its own freedom, and so converts man into a machine to perform unconsciously ends he does not even conceive? Briefly defined, slavery is submission to some other authority than that of right reason. There is slavery to despots, slavery to masters, slavery to public opinion, slavery to falsehood, slavery to fear, slavery to passion, slavery to a million of tyrants all eagerly competing for control over mankind. But the only freedom is self-government by the individual in accordance with the natural laws of reason and right. This is freedom indeed; all else is slavery, open or disguised.

Judged by this, the only true standard, the American people are not free, but a nation of slaves. Freemen indeed there are among them, and not a few. But the great majority profess, at least, allegiance to an authority that is other than that of natural reason and right. Nor is the profession unreal on the part of a controlling number. It is true that outward slavery is abolished. It is true that few men are deprived, as all women are, of fundamental and precious rights. But over five millions of the American people above the age of sixteen years, of both sexes, are unable to read and write; are they not slaves to ignorance, one of the mightiest and worst of all tyrants? Many times five millions of Americans refuse stolidly to take any part in the great reformatory movements of the age, preferring to immerse themselves in their private interests; are they not slaves to selfishness, a tyrant cunning and insidious above all others? And the whole American people, with comparatively rare exceptions, submit to the control of the Christian Church, which makes them pay annually from fifty to one hundred millions of dollars in its own support—a sum sufficient, if expended rationally, to relieve all the miseries of pauperism and eradicate the seeds of crime; are not the whole people, then, slaves to a superstition which sucks up the wealth and defeats the best happiness of the nation? Free, forsooth!

America has as yet learned only the alphabet of freedom. Not until ignorance and selfishness and superstition, indifference to reason and right, and supine acquiescence in the control of unreason and wrong, shall have been overcome, will America enter upon the truly free and happy life.

"But what are you going to do about it?" some may exclaim. "What means are adequate to break the power of a slavery so subtle and deep-rooted? How is it possible to free America?"

Doubtless, time, or rather the slow action of natural causes, will do the work at last. Nature is sound at the core, and provides by her law of gradual evolution for the rectification of existing evils. But man is a free intelligence, and has the power indefinitely to hasten the arrival of relief. His active efforts, guided by his reason and conscience, suffice to ameliorate his own condition; and it devolves upon those who are free themselves to put forth their best efforts in helping to free their less favored brethren. There is no human duty so lofty and imperative as that of breaking the entanglements of purely private interests, pleasures, and ambitions, and taking up with brave and unselfish hearts the task of bettering the world we live in. Ease, indolence, pre-occupation, apathy, a thousand unworthy motives, combine to hinder the work, and to cheat the unhappy world out of the services which are its right. But, depend upon it, no noble nature ever yet rose into existence that did not feel, recognize, and obey the high summons to identify himself with his race, and labor for the common good. He, at least, will never shrink from the toll of effort, or skulk out of the great battle for a truer, holier, and more widely extended freedom.

"Yes," you may reply, "but what can one man's or one woman's efforts avail against so vast a slavery as you depict? What can we do but sit down in despair before a task that is plainly impossible?"

I admit, as I must, that one individual's effort is very feeble, if isolated and unseconded. It may accomplish something, but not very much. But I do not urge isolated effort. The very thing I seek is combination of effort. Without organization, little can be done; but the very thing I seek is organization. Let us organize, and the burden too heavy for one will become easy for many.

"It is of no use," perhaps you answer in your own minds; "of all people, liberals are the hardest to organize. You cannot get them to organize. They are solitary and independent, inapt to work together, and therefore weak. Unless you can do what nobody else has been able to do, you will talk to the winds, and have your labor for your pains."

I certainly do not flatter myself that I can do what others cannot; nor have I any ambition to attempt it. But I see causes why the liberals have been hitherto unorganized and weak, which are daily losing their power.

First of all is the indefiniteness of conviction concerning the nature of the work to be done. Men will not organize for a mere abstraction; they must see some definite, practical, and practicable thing to be done,—some important object to be achieved,—before they will unite. This is the reason why so many attempts at organization have failed. It is idle to organize about an abstract principle; there must be a precise end which needs to be accomplished, which can and ought to be accomplished. The reason why so many liberal societies fail is because, unlike the Church, they have nothing definite TO DO. The Church promises to save the souls of its members, and to save the souls of the unconverted; and all its machinery is directed to this one practical object. But hitherto liberal societies have had no practical object corresponding to this. They have met once or twice on Sunday, while their preacher has done all the work proposed by simply reading his sermon or essay.

The people meanwhile have nothing to do but listen and think. Presently they become tired of this; they grow familiar with the preacher's thought, and their interest dies out. Herein lies the secret of many a failure. Liberal local societies, lacking the object of saving souls in the next world, and meeting only to hear or discuss, must inevitably die. They have no root of continuance. They do no work, while the preacher is left to do it all. Therefore, I say, they ought to die; and when they do die, the loss to the world is small. But when liberal societies are formed for the express purpose of working, not by proxy, but in person; when they combine for the express purpose of benefiting the world that now is, and of expending time, money, and zeal in the effort to improve and help the community around them in any and every possible way, they will thrive, and multiply, and wax strong. The preacher or speaker will then be only an adviser or helper, not a poor packhorse to do the work of a hundred or five hundred, and thus to let the society flatter itself that they have done their duty to mankind by merely sustaining a weekly Sunday meeting. A liberal local society has no business to exist for any reason but to take hold of local work, to devise and put in operation plans for the improvement of the little world about them and the great world outside, and thus to make themselves a centre and fountain-head of beneficent social reform. Fill a dozen earnest and resolute liberals with this purpose, and they will succeed without the help of any speaker. Leave a society of a thousand without it, and it will dwindle and die, though it has the services of the best liberal orator in the land. It has been the lack of a definite conception of some practical thing to be done, the lack of a fixed and unselfish and powerful purpose to do it, which has caused the collapse of so many liberal organizations, and will cause the collapse of so many more.

Now I believe that the liberals of this country, who have had nothing definite to organize for, are no worse, no more selfish, than the Christians whose societies flourish all about them. When they find a common work to do, they will do it with zeal, devotion, and success. When they attain a conviction and a purpose concerning the work to be done, they will organize quickly enough. I urge organization now because I believe that, within a few years, this conviction and purpose have been silently maturing in thousands of liberal minds; and that it is already struggling to express itself in organization. If I am mistaken, my appeal is premature and will meet with no response. I shall be content, and shall wait till the liberals grow keener-eyed than they will thereby prove themselves to be. My own conviction is matured, definite, and strong; and I believe it will ultimately be shared by every man and woman in the land who loves liberty, who believes that liberty is the prime condition of human happiness and virtue, and who is willing to take hold with a will and work for the highest welfare of the community. Whether the liberals organize or not in accordance with the plan now submitted, I am sure that sooner or later they will be forced to organize upon some plan similar to it. Therefore I do not hesitate to run all risks in proposing it now.

"But what is the conviction and purpose to which you refer? What common belief and aim can you find even in the germ, in the minds of all our liberals, so widely separated in opinion on so many important subjects?"

My answer may be a negative one to all who see nothing positive in the idea of liberty. The conviction I refer to is this: that, regarded as a theological system, CHRISTIANITY IS SUPERSTITION, and, regarded as an organized institution, CHRISTIANITY IS SLAVERY. The purpose I refer to is this: that, whether regarded as a theology or a church, CHRISTIANITY SHALL WHOLLY CEASE TO EXERCISE INFLUENCE IN POLITICAL MATTERS. Although the national Constitution is strictly secular and non-Christian, there are many things in the practical administration of the government which violate its spirit, and constitute a virtual recognition of Christianity as the national religion. These violations are very dangerous; they are on the increase; they more and more give Christianity a practical hold upon the government; they directly tend to strengthen the influence of Christianity over the people, and to fortify it both as a theology and a church; and they are therefore justly viewed with growing indignation by the liberals. Not unreasonably are they looked upon as paving the way to a formidable effort to carry the Christian Amendment to the Constitution; and the liberals are beginning to see that they must extinguish the conflagration in its commencement. I believe all this myself, with more intense conviction every day; and therefore I appeal frankly to the people to begin now to lay the foundations of a great National Party of Freedom. It is not a moment too soon. If the liberals are wise, they will see the facts as they are, and act accordingly. Not with hostility, bitterness, defiance, or anger, but rather with love to all men and high faith in the beneficence of consistently republican institutions, do I urge them most earnestly to begin the work at once.

In one of the cities of Central Illinois, a rather noted lawyer, Col. R. J. Ingersoll, lately delivered a lecture, the character of which may be inferred from its opening sentence: "An honest God is the noblest work of man." A number of weak-minded personages are now trying to devise some method of preventing Col. Ingersoll's practising law, on the ground that he is unfit to do so, because his theological views differ from theirs. It is not claimed that his lecture was at all immoral; its infidelity is the one charge. There is nothing to prevent the busybodies aforesaid from refusing to engage his services; and there is nothing, and will be nothing, to prevent other people from engaging his services, if they choose to do so. "It is setting a high value on our opinions," shrewdly says Montaigne, "to roast people on account of them." It is setting a high value on them to try to persecute people in any way on account of them.—Erech.

That was a good, though rather a severe pun, which was made by a student in one of our theological seminaries (and he was not one of the brightest of the class either), when he asked: "Why is Prof. — the greatest revivalist of the age?" and on all "giving it up" said: "Because at the close of every sermon there is a 'Great Awakening.'"

OUR PLATFORM.

[In order that our readers may appreciate the growing tendency of the Evangelical churches to combine their forces and concentrate their power, and in order that the liberal element may comprehend the necessity of tenfold vigilance in defence of a religious liberty which could not fail to be most seriously threatened by such a vast Evangelical combination, we copy the following long articles from the New York Union Advocate, a paper powerfully supported and ably edited by "Clergymen of various Evangelical Denominations" in the sole interest of this dangerous scheme. The basis of union, be it remembered, is the Evangelical creed. When will the liberals understand that they must yet contend as never before in defence of simple Freedom?—Ed.]

We have been requested by a gentleman well known in the commercial world, to give such a condensed statement of the principles and object of the Union Advocate that a business man could understand our drift at a glance.

In compliance with this we would say that we are working for the reconstruction of the Evangelical Church.

This Church, made up of all our orthodox believers, is now devoid of system, and cut up into several unconnected and rival denominations.

With the peculiar views of these denominations, or their various methods of operation, we have nothing to do. We believe that they are faithful in preaching the Gospel, and in managing the trusts committed to their charge, and are doing the best that can be done under the present arrangement.

The difficulty lies in the want of organization.

Each sect has a complete and independent array of institutions and officers, and is striving for the occupation of the whole country. Working without concert, they are crowding here, and neglectful there, rushing all together into desirable openings, and leaving other important sections entirely overlooked. At the recent opening of the Brooklyn Tabernacle Lay College, Mr. William E. Dodge stated that "he was engaged in building a railroad 500 miles long, through a new country, with a village every ten miles, every one of which would want a minister." When that railroad is completed, occasional points will be over-stocked with ministers, and vast reaches will have none at all. Were the railroad itself conducted on this principle, the superintendents and various division agents operating at random over the whole line each for himself, the corporation would go into bankruptcy in a month.

In the cities also, this want of organization results in a confusion equally disastrous. Here in New York, each sect, having the whole island in charge, is pushing its sanctuaries into the choicest positions to secure the wealthiest patronage. As a consequence, in the richer sections they have built churches so thickly that their organs jar each other, while in the poorer quarters, twenty times as populous, multitudes are left in a heathenish dark as the jungles of India.

A nobler class of men do not live than the Christian capitalists of New York; they have poured out their money like water for the cause of religion. What are the results? A forest of brown-stone spires in the upper part of the city, and over one hundred thousand persons in the year 1870 sent to our different prisons, almshouses, and reformatory institutions, from the lower parts of the city. The sectarian system, making these churches rivals of each other on the same ground, compels them to hasten up their edifices burdened with debt, and to compete with each other afterwards for attractive preachers and artistic music; thus their pews become so expensive that only the rich can afford to attend, or as one of our religious papers lately expressed it, "it has become a question whether any man with a less income than $5,000 a year, can go to heaven from New York, pre-supposing that one must go there through our churches." And this is the state of things in a city, nineteen twentieths of whose people are poor, and who have around them seventy-four hundred drinking saloons alluring them on to ruin.

Further than this, the system interferes with the reception of the truth itself. However silent our clergymen may be as to their differences, and however cordially they may treat each other, the masses hold the existence of these various denominations as proof that the Gospel is still in debate, and that no clear interpretation of the Bible can be given. On this ground they neglect religion altogether.

This evil becomes aggravated as we approach the heathen world, especially the cultivated and astute nations of the East. The noted Hindu Reformer, Mr. Chunder Sen, after his late tour through Great Britain, drew a mortifying picture of the English sects, each holding out to him a pious hand, and assuring him that it alone had the right to the title of Christian. "If I wanted to become a Christian," said he, "I could not, for they say so many different things, that I do not know which of all these sects to take up with!" In a word, we are beginning to understand from painful experience, the meaning of the Saviour's parting prayer for his people: "That they all may be one, that the world may believe."

The next question is as to the remedy. This is as plain as the disease. We advance no novel theory, discovered in our own day, but a simple return to the ecclesiastical plan laid down by the Apostles, and carried out in the New Testament churches. This plan is as follows:—

1. That, on the essential facts of the Way of Salvation, all Christians should be firmly, indivisibly, and uncompromisingly One. These facts are stated in Scripture with perfect clearness, and in regard to them we have no disagreement.

2. That on all points of minor importance, not so decisively settled in Holy Writ, each Christian must be free to judge according to his light, or, as St. Paul expresses it, "be fully persuaded in his own mind."

On these two principles the early churches organized as follows:—

In each locality, all believers being united upon fundamentals formed one body and were known as the Church of Jerusalem, the Church of Corinth, the Church of Ephesus, etc. Not a solitary instance is mentioned of there being more than one Church in any one city. But among these early Christians, there were just as many disputes upon secondary matters as among ourselves, and these disputes were of the same nature as those which have divided us. Accordingly, our primitive ancestors were allowed to form in any place as many different societies or congregations as they pleased, which congregations were left to arrange their worship and order and ministry, as suited themselves. The result was, entire liberty for the Society, subordinate to the united interests of the whole.

The arrangement was precisely that upon which the American Republic is formed. Separate States, Counties, and Cities, each attending to its own affairs, making its own laws and electing its own officers; and a general government attending to matters of inter-communication, the adjustment of mutual rights, and the guardianship of common property; an arrangement which has made the United States at once the freest and strongest commonwealth on the globe.

What would be the effect of such a system in the Church? Beginning at the foundation, we see that it would elevate each individual Christian society from a denominational outpost, to the dignity of an independent sodality. No conference at Babylon would then threaten the peace of a congregation in Williamsburgh, for practising open communion. No convention in Illinois would go into court to oust a people in Chicago from the edifice they had built, for omitting offensive words from a Baptismal service. No assembly in Pennsylvania would condemn a society in Philadelphia for singing "Rock of Ages." The scandal and disgrace of such prosecutions would cease, for each body of believers would be free.

On the other hand, the Society, having its responsibilities shifted from its denomination to its neighborhood, would realize its immediate call for the evangelization of its vicinity. It would then have no excuse to leave a centre of population for a sparse but fashionable suburb; nor would its contributions be drafted away from the poor around its own doors, to start rival churches in distant villages already supplied with the Gospel.

The Church of the city would meet, as occasion required, for purposes of united prayer, general communion or social reform; could institute proper judicatories for the trial and discipline of immoral members; and would district its territory into parishes, in each one of which the resident society should work as its permanent home, be accountable for every soul within its limits, and be free from intrusion and interference.

The General or National Assembly would exercise such powers as might be delegated to it by the popular will, and disburse the funds committed to it for frontier and mission work as should best advance the Redeemer's kingdom. A constitution could readily be framed which would preserve the rights of each society, and yet secure the advantages of mutual co-operation. Our apportionments being systematized in this way, one dollar would effect more than three dollars do now, and from the increased gain of public confidence, three dollars would be given where one is now received.

Under this general organization, the American Bible Society, the American Tract Society, and the American Sunday School Union, having their officers periodically elected by the whole Church, and their operations and disbursements subject to the official scrutiny of the Church's representatives, would have their claim upon the public patronage, and their sphere of usefulness immeasurably extended, and there would be added to them another department, long and sorely needed—an American Church Missionary Society, which, doing away with a dozen sectarian institutions of a similar name, would accomplish the work of home and foreign evangelization three times as well at one-third the expense.

In a word, therefore, we advocate a system of organization which has the Holy Bible for its authority, and the American Republic for its example.

Hundreds of our leading clergymen and thousands of our most intelligent laymen of all parties and names, are already praying for its consummation; and to the merchants and mechanics and the farmers of our land, to all who are interested in the welfare of the Christian Church, and in the effectual and economical expenditure of Christian funds, we would appeal for its thoughtful consideration.

UNITY IN ESSENTIALS.

[From the New York Union Advocate.]

The fact, that Christians ought to be united, is now almost universally admitted; the Church hardly needs further argument in this direction: what it really wants is guidance in accomplishing that union. There is a very celebrated maxim, which expresses the instruction of Scripture, and the principle of the Protestant world upon the point: "Unity in essentials, liberty in non-essentials, charity in everything." This maxim condenses the teachings of Divine Providence in ecclesiastical history.

The last clause was the first which Christians had to study. Bitterness and recrimination marked the discussions of the early disciples. The Apostle Paul expostulated with them for their harshness, for their unkind judgments of each other. He taught them to respect their neighbor's opinion, to make allowance even for his mistakes, to love him in spite of his eccentricities; in a word, the lesson of the primitive Church was that sublime thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians—that heavenly vindication of CHARITY. Charity for the sinner, charity for the heretic, charity for every son and daughter of Adam.

Then, in the long career of Popery, the second clause became gradually understood. In the Middle Ages the Church groaned under a religious despotism. A forced uniformity upon every article of belief, and every form of worship, fettered its vitality and checked its inward life. In their desire for union, Christians allowed all dissent to be stamped out; they allowed one bishop to be supreme upon earth, and to hold the keys of the kingdom of heaven. After a trial of a thousand years all that this arrangement could show as a result, was religion changed into priestcraft, and devotion built up into cathedrals. Standing at last over this desolation of piety and intellect, we learned that the inherent freedom of the Christian man must be preserved, that the disciple should be amenable to only one Spiritual Lord, his Master in heaven—that there must be liberty in non-essentials. This was the Reformation.

And now another leaf in our task has been turned, and we are studying the page upon which is written, Unity in Essentials. Three words only: but how much toil and prayer must be exercised ere we can master them?

Their point is, that entranced as we may be by the heavenliness of charity, determined as we may be to stand by the principle of liberty, there are, after all, revelations of truth which must be the corner-stone of our union. There are "essentials" which must be maintained at all hazards. We all know what they are. The doctrines of the Trinity, the universal depravity of man, the sacrificial offering of the Savior's blood as the sole atonement for our sins, and the necessity of faith ere the benefits of that atonement can be applied to the sinner. These are matters about which in the Church there cannot be liberty. They are just as true as God's Word. It is God's command that we believe them. Their authority is not human, it is Divine. They are not interpretations of Scripture—they are Scripture; and written so plainly that the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. Any tampering with these truths, any coquetting with those who disavow them, is playing fast and loose with religion itself. These truths are linked together like the lobes of the heart, and a blow at any of them is a wound in the vitals. We may learn this now, or we may go through ages of bitter experience in doing it; but learn it we must before the blessed days of unity can come—first pure, then peaceable. God will not allow us to unite on any basis which would endanger the integrity of his revealed truth. The sinner must be convinced of his own rebellious and hell-deserving state by nature, and he must fly to the Savior as his only refuge—he must rely upon that Savior as an Almighty support, and he must look to the Holy Spirit for his comfort and guidance.

It is useless to soften down or take the edge from off these "musts." Here they are, on the guide-board to heaven, and it is cruelty to the inquiring soul to hint that he may trifle with them. The days of the Athanasian Creed are over. We have no right to put in our Confessions of Faith damatory clauses for others. The final judgment is in the hands of God alone; but that does not affect the essentiality of these great Christian doctrines: without these there would be no Christianity at all.

There is danger upon this point. Many are so set upon Christian union, that they would yield up all articles of belief to accomplish it. They would make Scripture a nose of wax that could be turned any way that we might prefer. They would include Unitarians, who deny that there was any atonement, and Universalists, who say that it saves the faithful and the faithless alike; they would allow diversity as to the deity of Christ and the inspiration of the Bible. Such a union as that would be worse than our present system of division. It is better to go to heaven alienated and strangers to each other, than to get on a path that may not lead to heaven at all.

The Union Advocate will work and plead for the harmony of Christian believers; but it means to stand fast by the faith once delivered to the saints. While it will uphold liberty in its proper sphere, and bespeak for charity an universal application, it intends none the less to labor for a union founded alone upon the fundamental and indisputable facts of Holy Writ.

THE CONSTITUTION AND RELIGION.

[From the Boston Investigator.]

The first article of the Amendments to the Constitution reads as follows:—

"ART. I. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

The tenth article of the Amendments reads as follows:—

"ART. 10. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

There it is in plain English.

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The Constitution prohibits Congress from establishing a religion, but does not prohibit the States from doing so. Therefore under the reserved rights of the States, there is no provision in the Constitution prohibiting States from establishing a religion.

In Story's Commentaries on the Constitution is the following:—

"It was under a solemn consciousness of the dangers from ecclesiastical ambition, the bigotry of spiritual pride, and the intolerance of sects, thus exemplified in our domestic as well as foreign annals, that it was deemed advisable to exclude from the National Government all power to act upon the subject. The situation, too, of the different States equally proclaimed the policy as well as the necessity of such an exclusion. In some of the States, Episcopalians constituted the predominant sect; in others, Congregationalists; in others, Quakers; and in others, again, there was a close numerical rivalry among contending sects. It was impossible that there should not arise perpetual jealousy on the subject of ecclesiastical ascendancy, if the National Government was left free to create a religious establishment. But this alone would have been an imperfect security if it had been followed up by a declaration of the right of the free exercise of religion, and a prohibition of all religious tests. Thus the whole power over the subject of religion is left to the State Governments, to be acted upon according to their own sense of justice and the State Constitutions; and the Catholic and the Protestant, the Calvinist and the Arminian, the Jew and the Infidel, may sit down at the common table of the National Councils without any inquisition into their faith or mode of worship."—[See Story on the "Constitution," vol. 2, sec. 1789.]

"The only ground on which restrictions on Sunday amusements can be defended must be that they are religiously wrong; a notion of legislation which can never be too earnestly protested against. Deorum injuria, Diis curæ. It remains to be proved that society or any of its officers hold a commission from On High to avenge any supposed offence to Omnipotence which is not also a wrong to our fellow creatures. The notion that it is one man's duty that another should be religious, was the foundation of all the religious persecutions ever perpetrated, and, if admitted, would fully justify them. Though the feeling which breaks out in repeated attempts to stop railway travelling on Sunday, in the resistance to the opening of museums, and the like, has not the cruelty of the old persecutors, the state of mind indicated by it is fundamentally the same. It is a determination not to tolerate others in doing what is permitted by their religion, because it is not permitted by the persecutors' religion."—John Stuart Mill.

"There, now," cried little Bessie, the other day, rummaging a drawer in the bureau, "grandpa has gone to heaven without his spectacles."

CURRENT TOPICS.

BY REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE.

A VERY SENSIBLE young minister by the name of Parker read an essay at a recent meeting of Connecticut Orthodox ministers on the best method of dealing with the heterodox. Among other things he said (and I give his exact words): "To scold and anathematize scepticism is supremely silly." "Most of us are not up to the scientific and metaphysical arguments." But shortly after this wise man had sat down, there got up a sarcastic slangwanger and made immense fun for the elder brethren, chiefly by ringing the changes upon the question whether a bear swimming out to sea would become a whale. It was very evident that this joke was a great comfort to the ignorance and superstition assembled.

DR. CHAPIN prayed at Mr. Greeley's funeral thus: "We thank thee to-day for that blessed revelation of Christ which has made God known, and which has lighted up the uncertainty of Nature with the assurance of a Divine love. We thank thee, O God, that our Redeemer liveth." By "Redeemer" Dr. Chapin seems to mean the young Jew who mistakenly supposed that God Almighty wanted a hand to help him out with his care of the creation. But he must know better than this, pastor as he is of the "Church of the Divine Paternity." He must understand that all that we truly know of Divinity points to Infinite Paternity, such as needs no helping out in any way whatever. And he is a very sorry believer if he really sees uncertainty in the suggestions of Nature, the rising life of which in spring, and the glories of which in summer and autumn, have ever been among the most powerful occasions to the human mind to have hopeful and worshipful thoughts of Deity. In fact Nature has done infinitely more for man than the "Christ" of any of the sects has done. They may call it a revelation which has made God known, but in truth it has made known more devil than deity, and played an infernal part towards the heart and life of man far more than a heavenly. The anathemas has been the headlight of the Christian engine, and Christianity has been more ready to curse and damn than to bless and comfort man. Just a few days ago an Orthodox church member related to me how his sister, on losing a child, and being assured by her minister that the child was probably lost, made a vow never to give birth to another child, with more than a chance of its going to hell, and kept her vow, going a mourner through life for her dead and damned offspring. The globe has never seen more infernal superstition than that administered by this "gospel" minister. The "uncertainty of Nature"! It cannot be that Dr. Chapin does not know better, as far as belief at least is concerned. For of knowledge, in the strict sense, we can none of us pretend to that. But of faith and hope and glorious imagination,—these have been very little promoted by "Christ," and have been very much promoted by the light of Nature, especially if we add to the light of external Nature, as we may, that of natural revelation in the human soul.

DR. HORACE BUSHNELL stands midway between the old Orthodoxy and the new radicalism of Connecticut. In 1849, he was tried for heresy because of views expressed in a work on "God in Christ." The well known Dr. Hawes was the chief promoter of the persecution, but it came to nothing; and now Dr. Bushnell stands, as Dr. Hawes stood then, at the head of the pulpit of Congregationalism in Connecticut, and the most thorough radicalism has come in everywhere to take the place once held by persecuted Bushnellism. Not only this, but in his last volume of sermons, recently published, Dr. Bushnell gets upon thorough radical ground when he comes out upon the highest point to which his thought has carried him. Thus, by bringing together some clear radicalisms, out of one of these sermons, we make this confession of purely humanitarian faith: "The thing that we most want is a divine light in souls, in such power as to light up faces. The gospel is nothing now, unless it is incarnated and kept incarnate. The real sermons are the great pure feelings, the generousities of holy sacrifice. Genuine good living is the gospel." This plainly makes character, goodness shown by a good life, the real and genuine thing, the true gospel. It finds divine truth in the great pure feelings of man's heart, and not in any creed whatever. If beliefs are good at all, in this view, it is not in themselves, but in the support they lend to these feelings. To have the practical feelings is the essential thing. One man will have them, along with belief in God of some kind; another will have them without any such belief. I for my part regard a number of beliefs of this kind as helpful to these feelings; but I know men who have the feelings as truly and as fully as any one I have ever seen, without beliefs of this kind at all. Pure, brave, tender goodness of heart made them noble infludels and athletes, because the god and the faith held up to them were meaner than dirt and more hateful than any devil. Right and Truth and Kindness are names of their highest, and they are as good names as any other. The thing is to have those great pure feelings—this Dr. Bushnell confesses. And he is particular to say that there is no good in any story of somebody in the past having had these feelings. That did for then, but the story of it is no gospel. The only genuine gospel is in somebody having them now. It is good news to souls now that these feelings are now in human breasts. It is good news that they come in our own minds, and work themselves out in our lives. It is good news that they come in other minds, and are worked out in other lives. The world was never so full of the good news of these feelings as now. Men of different nations, and of different religions, have them as never before, and seem likely to go on having them far beyond anything ever seen; especially if, as seems certain, the miserable diabolism and Jesuitism and holy bibleism and church-ism of Orthodox Christianity, prove too near dead to do any more harm.

A WRITER in Scribner's Monthly for December brought out Tyndall in a very distinct and interesting way, in respect of his interest in thought and his beliefs, or want of beliefs. Thus he said: "From climbing we drifted off to books and literature, especially in America. I found my companion singularly well informed in our literature, and especially enthusiastic about Ralph Waldo Emerson, whom he pronounced with some energy by far the greatest mind in our literary annals. Such an admiration, coming from a professor of physical science, sounded a little surprising. It has been amply explained, however, by later utterances of Tyndall, which have made plain to us that, along with his study of material forces, he has always maintained a lively and sympathetic interest in the subtler refinements of imaginative or metaphysical thought, and that side by side with his scientific formulae has always lain, half hidden, a spring of fresh poetic feeling and appreciation which has, in an unobtrusive way, permeated and adorned all his severer labors."

In the following passage we get a capital view of the relative positions in our day of believer and scientist. The writer says: "I was led to remark on the, to me, illogical and self-destructive blindness of the materialists who would end our existence here, and deny any life of the spirit beyond that of the body. 'But why so?' was the awkward objection from the lips of the inexorable philosopher beside me. Thus put to my trumps, and unfurnished for the moment with any axiomatic or other devices of dialectic warfare, I made what lame shift I could to extemporize some form of argument which might seem to 'touch hard-pan,' and fell back upon the old assertion of the inalienable beauty and worth of spiritual existence, the comparative or absolute inferiority of matter, etc., etc. But again, 'Why so?' said my sturdy opponent—why might not matter be in its essence just as divine, and in its duration just as eternal, as spirit? Here again my stock of axioms and first principles made a melancholy return of non est inventus. Of course there was no use in going back to the fundamental principles of the Christian or indeed any other accepted system, for I was dealing with an iconoclast from whose armor of positivism such arguments would have glanced ineffectual. Whatever ground might be gained must be won in sheer logical and philosophic tussle, without the intervention of any form of traditional faith or theory. And so from point to point I was beaten by my shrewd master of fence, till I was forced to sit still in discontented silence, not at all sure that I had any good grounds to give for the conviction, still pretty well rooted in my constitution, that I, such as I stand here, am in reality something more than the result of a certain composition of carbon, nitrogen and phosphates, and likely to subsist when these shall have been resolved into their primary state. After gloomily musing over my discomfiture for a half-hour, rather indignant at having had to bear the whole onus probandi of a problem heavy enough for stouter shoulders than mine, I turned on him with an appeal for fairness. 'After all,' I said, 'Professor, you have put the whole burden on me, and left it for me to prove that a man's soul has any value or existence beyond, or apart from, his molecules. Frankly now, what do you think about it yourself, or don't you think at all? Do you, or do you not, give any weight to the inevitable tendency in human nature to speculate or dream of, and long for, and therefore to infer and believe in, an existence of the soul independent of that of the body?' Ah! that, he said, was a very different way to put it, and so interrogated he must allow that he, in common with all thoughtful men, felt the impulse to the speculations, dreams, and even longings, in question—it was at the inference and belief that he felt inclined to call a halt.

"All the tendencies I spoke of he willingly admitted as normal and appropriate in Nature, but that they afford any proper basis for scientific argument and conclusion he must firmly deny."

The Index.

JANUARY 4, 1873.

N. B. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.
The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWERS, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WESTWORTH HINGSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHURCH, ROY CHARLES VOTREY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MORRIS D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

Will friendly editors please copy the article on our first page entitled "Organize"?

We regret to say that, probably by delays in the ocean mail, our "London Letter" for this week has failed to arrive.

Read the new advertisement of "THE INDEX for 1873," "A Unique Premium," and many other new advertisements in this issue.

Many thousand extra copies of THE INDEX are printed this week. A large number will be mailed to the secular and religious press all over the country; and such editors as will send us marked copies of any notice they may be so kind as to make will confer a great favor.

Professor Tyndall has this noble passage in his just published Forms of Water [page 180]: "In science, opinion ought to content us only so long as positive proof is unattainable. The love of repose must not prevent us from seeking this proof. There is no sterner conscience than the scientific conscience, and it demands in every possible case the substitution for private conviction of demonstration which shall be conclusive to all." This is a solid and most weighty truth, which is too apt to be forgotten by the devotees of a narrow individualism.

We have been repeatedly urged to republish in THE INDEX the philosophical articles we wrote several years ago for the North American Review, as the editions of the Review containing them have been all exhausted. If we ever get time to do it, it is our intention to reprint these articles in permanent form, with corrections and additions; but, although they are too long and abstruse for republication in full in THE INDEX, we begin with this issue a series of eight extracts from them, embracing such portions as may possibly interest our more thoughtful readers.

The advertisement headed "THE INDEX for 1873" is as complete as it could be made at the time of writing. But we wish to state that plans of great interest to our readers are on foot which are nearly matured and will be announced as soon as possible. No one, we believe, will regret having subscribed to the paper, or having induced his friends to subscribe. Our efforts to provide a journal worthy of the cause it advocates have been untiring; and, thanks to the many friends who have given us their generous aid, we believe they will be found not to have failed.

We appeal to all those of our subscribers who believe in organization according to the plan sketched on our first page, to take hold of the work with energy in their respective localities. LET A LIBERAL LEAGUE BE FORMED IN EVERY TOWN WHERE THERE ARE A DOZEN RESOLUTE RADICALS. In order to facilitate the work, we will send twenty copies of the present issue of THE INDEX, postpaid, for one dollar, to any one who will order them. They will be found useful, we hope, in carrying out the plan. Let there be a powerful and simultaneous effort made now to accomplish the great task of freeing America from ecclesiastical usurpation.

BURN YOUR SHIPS.

When, in 1519, Cortes ordered Juan de Escalante to burn the fleet which had brought him and his little army to the shores of Mexico, and thereby put an end to indecision, backwardness, and the spirit of faction among his followers, he played the part of a great commander, and laid the foundation of that wonderful Conquest which must always remain one of the most romantic chapters of either ancient or modern history. At such a time, seeming rashness was the very soul of wisdom.

To-day the genius of religious freedom commands her little legion of resolute followers, meditating the conquest in her name of an empire vaster than that of the Montezumas—no less, in short, than this great American republic—to emulate the courage of the Spanish Conquistadores. She bids them take a step which cuts off all retreat, and commits them unreservedly to a career which, whatever lies between, must end in a victory never to be stained with pitying or regretful tears.

Religious radicalism, too long "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought," must now prove that studious contemplation does not unstring the sinews or palsy the arm of action. The debate has been long enough confined to parlors; it must now emerge into the great world of human affairs. True, the subtle influence of speculation, dissolving the spell of theological creeds which had been woven by speculation itself, has been felt even in legislation and political events. The emancipation of thought has already resulted in amelioration of the Statutes, and the day of "Blue Laws" has gone by. The Unitarian reaction against Orthodoxy which shook New England fifty years ago, the Transcendentalist movement which later convicted Unitarianism of being itself diluted Orthodoxy, and the scientific philosophy of religion which now seeks to remove the dogmatic taint lingering even in Transcendentalism itself, have quickened thought to so great an extent that the public mind is reconciled to many practical changes in customs and institutions which could not endure the scrutinizing eye of intelligence. But while the cause of progress has seemed so prosperous and triumphant, observers who look beneath the surface have been steadily considering less evident signs of the times, knowing that every current must have its counter-current, often indeed of greater power. They have noticed the drawing together of the sects, the growing disregard of minor differences, the consolidation of ecclesiastical forces, the increased emphasis of common doctrines, the evident reaction against the spirit of change; they have remembered the tenacity with which ecclesiasticism always clings to its privileges, and have seen the lowering clouds of inevitable resistance to further innovation; they have heard the first drops of the shower in the demands, thus far little heeded, for the reconstruction of the United States Constitution on a Christian plan. All this, and much more of the same kind, speaks volumes to those who believe that human nature is to-day what it always was, and that the Christian gospel contains still the seeds of intolerance to any extent. These men and women are the seers of the age, discerning the future in the past and the present. They recognize the great practical task of religious radicalism, and would fain rouse it from dreams to deeds. They summon it to set the seal of action on its thought, and thereby to prove that this is indeed the truth that shall bless mankind.

But meditation is ease, and action is labor and conflict. Even more than conservatism itself, certain sorts of radicalism dread work and decrepitate agitation. Yet the only alternative of agitation is stagnation. Unless radicalism is but another name for active toil in the betterment of society, it is worse than its opposite; for Christian conservatism, even of the narrowest type, yearns with the "love of souls," and is not ashamed to agitate. There is no excuse for radicalism, if it shirks the necessary application of its own fundamental teaching.

Does not radicalism summon men to be free? Assuredly, yes! Is it, then, content with the measure of freedom already attained by the world? Has it no rebuke for the great violations of freedom still tolerated and submitted to by the American people? Out upon it, if it so belies its nature! It is fit only to be spewed out of the mouth by men to whom radicalism is a great, serious conviction, and not a play upon words.

Look, you who declare that America is "free enough," at these glaring infringements of all liberty and justice.

1. The Christian Church of the United States, by the statistics of the last census, owns property to the value of $354,429,581. Yet all this enormous wealth pays not one cent to the support of the government which protects it as it protects all other property. It is totally untaxed. Single churches, like Trinity Church in New York, may own millions in their own right; yet they are untaxed. The burden of taxation, thus lifted from the shoulders of wealthy corporations, is laid on the shoulders of the community at large; and the poor man who can with difficulty scrape together enough money to buy bread for his family must pay his share of it,—must pay not only his own taxes, but the taxes shirked by the Christian Church. He may not believe in Christianity, as often he does not; he may believe its doctrines are delusions and its practice an outrage. But none the less is he forced to pay its taxes, and submit to its control. And this is American liberty! And America is "free enough"!

2. The support of chaplains or Christian clergymen in Congress and in State Legislatures, in the army and navy and the militia, in asylums and prisons and houses of correction and homes for disabled soldiers, must be paid out of revenues collected from the whole people,—from Christians and "infidels," from deists, pantheists, atheists, sceptics, rationalists, and free thinkers of all degrees, as well as from devout believers in the gospel. This, too, is American freedom!

3. Appropriations of public money, raised from the whole people, are in most of the States habitually made in some form or other in the interest of Christianity. In New York State alone, millions have been appropriated to Christian institutions within a few years, mostly Catholic, but many also Protestant. By what right is your money thus cunningly taken from you by the Church? Politicians are bought, and the people are sold, by the Catholic and Protestant churches of America. And America is "free enough"!

4. Religious services are required and sustained by the government in many different ways. The courts are opened with prayers, paid for by the job. Every regiment, every vessel of war, is the parish of some clergyman salaried by the government; and wherever a national or State institution of any magnitude is established, there is the inevitable minister of Christ, preaching the Christian gospel. Nay, in almost every public school the teachers must every day discharge the clerical function, and read a portion of the Bible as an act of religious worship. And America is "free enough"!

5. The President of the United States, and the Governors of most of the States, publicly proclaim religious fasts and festivals in their official capacity. President Lincoln was the first to appoint a National Thanksgiving; and President Grant has continued the illegal practice. Nay, President Grant has deliberately made the "Christianization" of the Indians a part of the settled policy of the administration, and thus turned the Federal government into a Missionary Society.

6. Official oaths are necessary in order to qualify for office; and in many States the testimony of an atheist is rejected by the courts, although his character for veracity may be unimpeachable. In Pennsylvania this disability is carried so far that an "infidel" society has been within a few years declared by Judge Sharswood incapable of receiving a bequest. Yet America is "free enough"!

7. Laws everywhere are in force discriminating between Sunday and the rest of the week, sometimes avowedly and sometimes covertly on Christian grounds; and penalties are imposed for violations of the "sanctity" of the Sabbath. Even in Massachusetts, within a very few months, a peaceable and well-behaved citizen was fined for training a vine in his own house on Sunday. Public libraries are kept shut by the law, against the wishes and wants of a large proportion of the inhabitants; and in a thousand ways the observance of the Sunday-Sabbath is forced upon the entire people. But America is "free enough"!

8. Many laws of various kinds, penal and otherwise, are based upon "Christian" conceptions of morals, as distinguished from "natural" morality. Usury laws, in especial, which sometimes work great detriment to the business interests of whole communities, are in fact based upon the Bible conception that it is a crime to take interest for money loaned; although the common sense of mankind rejects the notion in fact. Laws against profanity, against blasphemy, and so forth, still stand on the statute-books to disgrace the State that tolerates them.

In all these and many other ways, the Church has contrived to establish itself practically as a governmental institution; and in some of the States, as New York and Pennsylvania, Christianity has been judicially declared "part of the common law." To the radicalism which professes to believe that Church and State ought never to be united, yet professes to believe also that America is "free enough," what shall be said but that is a mockery and a sham?

Now we do not hesitate to affirm that radicalism has a great public duty to discharge in emancipating America from this political control of Christianity. We would scrupulously respect the private religious belief of every man, even while we think it superstitious, and, if he desired to listen, would endeavor to make its character clear to him. The right of Christian congregations to assemble, and to conduct their worship unmolested, we should be the first to defend. But the assumption of the Church to direct the administration of the government, and to control the public funds and the public schools in its own interest, we denounce as an intolerable outrage and usurpation, demanding immediate reform. It is an assumption full of the most real and imminent danger to our political and educational institutions; and the longer it is submitted to, the more dangerous it becomes. It is time to meet this assumption with an overwhelming rebuke at the hands of the American people; and radicalism lies under a solemn obligation to rouse the sluggish public to administer this rebuke. Nothing will ensure the perpetuity of the Union but the great principle of the absolute separation of Church and State; and now is the time to assert this principle with an emphasis and starting force never heard before.

Therefore to you, radicals of America, we make a most serious and earnest appeal to organize at once for the discharge of this high duty. You cannot organize too soon or too effectively. Next February the "National Association to secure a Religious Amendment to the United States Constitution" will hold its annual Convention in the city of New York. That movement is a vital one, because it grows out of the logical and practical necessities of the Christian Church. Feeble as it seems to-day, it is strong with all the strength of ideas shared in common by all sects and denominations. Under the stress of events, those ideas must spread, till in some shape or other they are adopted by a great party. How shall we meet them? Simply by opposing the mischievous change contemplated? No! Let us meet them by a bold and resolute determination to strike out of the government so much recognition of Christianity as it now contains. Carry the war into Africa! Organize yourselves for the peaceful work of educating this nation in the first principles of religious liberty, and their more consistent application. See to it that the States conform their respective Constitutions to the grand Constitution of the United States. Make it impossible for reviving medievalism to put out the light of the nineteenth century.

One word more. Let us go into this great work with a spirit worthy of it. Cherish no partisan hostility to the men and women who compose the Christian Church. Remember, it is not they, but the system that enslaves them and would fain enslave us, that is the foe. Let the noblest spirit of devotion to freedom, to justice, to equal rights, to universal love and good will, not for ourselves alone, but for ALL, animate and dignify our action. If in this spirit we organize and work for liberty, the common cause of all humanity; our children and children's children shall thank us with grateful hearts, as those that have done well, and not ill, to their fellow-men.

Burn, then, your ships behind you, forget your mutual jealousies, and press forward to the great victory of universal emancipation! In the service of this cause let all liberals be of one mind, one heart, one will, and make it their high aim to deliver to posterity the priceless heritage of a land sacred to the grandest and fullest freedom yet known on earth!

MORE PETITIONS.

Since our last acknowledgment, the following additional lists of names to the remonstrance against the proposed Christian Amendment of the United States Constitution have been received:—

From Mr. T. K. Peck, Hanover, Connecticut, one hundred and twenty-seven names (collected in the towns of Canterbury, Scotland, and Sprague); from Mr. S. Newell Hamilton, Orange, Indiana, ten; from Mr. William Jensen, Cawker City, Kansas, sixty-five; from Mrs. Nancy H. J. Blaisdell, Wellesley, Massachusetts, two; from Mr. N. Little, Newbury, Massachusetts, twenty-nine; from Mr. John L. Whiting, Boston, Massachusetts, forty-four; single names from different places, three.

This raises the total number of names sent directly to THE INDEX Office to Thirty-Four Thousand, Six Hundred and Sixty-Nine (34,669). The entire list will now be soon forwarded to Washington, to be presented in Congress; and all those who are still collecting signatures should send in their lists at once.

A LETTER FROM MAX MUELLER.

Our readers will be much interested in the following letter from Professor Max Müller, of Oxford, England, which we publish by permission of the distinguished writer:—

PARK'S END, OXFORD, Oct. 12, 1872.

Dear Sir,—I have just returned from Germany, where I spent the whole of the summer, lecturing on Sanskrit and Comparative Philology in the newly founded University of Strassburg. I found your letter of Aug. 5 waiting for me here, and I hasten to answer it as well as I can, under great pressure of work which has accumulated during my long absence from Oxford.

That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America,—that such a journal should have been started and powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany, though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large.

That religion is a function of the mind, and to be studied as such both in its subjective conditions and in its historical development, like language, like art, like philosophy, is a conception admitted as yet by very few even among those who are ready to examine a new truth, when it is placed before them. Even by those who have ceased to look upon religion as simply something contained in books, religion is generally looked upon as something strange, as a gift either granted or denied to man, according to the time in which he is born or the country in which he lives,—as something outside the pale of our humanity, and in the production of which man has no concern, no active share. And yet the highest interests of his soul are supposed to depend upon religion, and he is made responsible for it in this life and in the life to come.

These views held with regard to religion remind one of the views held, not very long ago, with regard to language. Language, too, was considered as a gift bestowed on man from without, as something far beyond the powers of human workmanship, as more or less perfect in different countries and at different periods of the world's history, and to be used by each man born into this world, without a murmur and without reflection. The Science of Language has driven away such views forever. We know that man would not be man without language, that language is not an instrument placed into his hands, and more or less perfectly played by different races, but that it belongs to man as much as his five senses; that it is the natural and inevitable manifestation of the human mind, while creating a world of thought out of the world of sense; and that, in its different forms, it is the work of man, or, more truly, the work of mankind. We no longer call the Chinese language imperfect, much less do we laugh at it or condemn it: on the contrary, we learn to admire the wonderful art by which all the wants of the rational mind, in its striving for utterance, are satisfied there in the simplest, it may seem childish, yet most ingenious way.

Again, in a truly scientific study of the history of architecture, we have long ceased to admire Grecian temples or Italian palaces only. We study rude stone monuments; we try to find out the true purposes of cromlechs and dolmen; we explore caves, half natural, half artificial; and we begin to understand that the wandering nomad of the desert may have lived as happily in his tent as a king in his palace.

We must try to learn the same lessons from a truly scientific study of the history of religion. We must try to understand that the human soul in its religious aspirations may find comfort even if prostrate before a fetish, and build itself a Tabernacle even in the desert of Buddhist Nihilism. There is a divine wisdom in the history of mankind, which seems foolishness to man so long only as he reads its pages through the spectacles of his own conceits. Let us but read these pages again with our own eyes, and with a firm faith in that Wisdom and Love which encircles, pervades, and upholds the whole world, and the spirit of invidious comparison which, outside the pale of one's own religion, sees nothing but false religion, idolatry, and devilry, will be driven out by the new spirit which reigns in the Comparative study of all religions, and sees or tries to see good in everything.

To-day I send a short article of mine which appeared in 1870, and which is perhaps not known to your readers. It is called "A Chapter of Accidents in Comparative Theology," and was meant chiefly to inculcate caution in the treatment of ancient religions.

Believe me, Dear Sir,

Yours sincerely,

MAX MUELLER.

CREEDLESSNESS AND BRAINLESSNESS.

The idea does not seem to be a wholly new one, that men may do some independent thinking, and yet not all think just alike. But this easy lesson in liberty is still too difficult for a great many worthy people, and they persist in treating it as if it were as hard to fathom as Mr. S. P. Andrews' "Science of Universology," or the "Secret of Hegel."

Take for instance our good friends of the New York Independent, who treat the Free Religious Association more generously, on the whole, than do the Unitarian or Universalist newspapers. Yet over this first elementary principle of its existence they puzzle and shake their heads, as if it were the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid. Nothing can convince them that men can be collectively creedless, and yet not be individually brainless.

Thus in criticising the late Free Religious Conventions in Philadelphia and Brooklyn, the editorial paragraphist of the Independent shakes his head over Mr. Froulingham's first and safest announcement. For the hundredth time, the President of the Free Religious Association explained that the organization as such had no creed and no views, being made up of men of all opinions, who were willing to unite in the pursuit of truth. This might seem, at least, an intelligible position; but to this editor it is "sheer nonsense." "People who have no creed,—that is to say, no opinions on religious subjects and scarcely any views at all,—do not exist; and if they do, they are of no account." And another writer in another column, writing yet more carelessly or hastily (so hastily, at any rate, as to declare that there is no dictionary meaning of the word "religion" which does not imply "a bond," whereas Cicero merely derives the word from relegere, "to read over," and Andrews' Latin Dictionary accepts the derivation), echoes the strain: "Men whose only boast it is that they have no convictions, that they are certain of nothing, that there is no truth in earth or heaven to which they will promise to adhere over-night, do not seem to us to have the stuff in them out of which heroes are made."

No matter about the heroism. I trust the members of the Free Religious Association have not sunk so low as to claim or disclaim that quality—to boast or belittle their sacrifices. The balance of moral courage between those who adhere to the popular theology and those who renounce it, must be struck by somebody else. But who are these men who are thus described by the Independent? Is it Mr. Frothingham who has "no opinions on religious subjects," or Mr. Abbot who boasts that he has "no convictions"? It is as if some bewildered bystander came to these hard-worn soldiers in the midst of battle, with the smoke and the gunpowder on their foreheads, and said to them: "My dear fellows! you are mistaken. You are not fighting. Quite the contrary. Allow me to escort you to a recruiting office, and enlist you into the army!"

It is easy to understand why science is now making such inroads upon theology, when we thus perceive such a difference between the methods of the two departments. In a scientific body, it is well enough understood that creedlessness is one thing and brainlessness quite another. It is the being bound, as an organization, by a creed, that would seem the brainless symptom in science. That which appears to even the liberal Independent so incredible in religion is the very method that prevails in every scientific association and makes it strong. The American Association for the Advancement of Science, and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, are as absolutely creedless as the Free Religious Association. Their president may be one year as Darwinian as Professor Gray, and the next year as anti-Darwinian as Professor Agassiz. In either case, the president may say for his association what Mr. Frothingham said for his, that it has no creed and no opinions. That is, the opinions belong to the individual members, not to the organization. These strong scientific thinkers need no other bond than the love of science; just as the members of the Free Religious Association unite only "to promote the interests of pure religion, to encourage the scientific study of theology, and to increase fellowship in the spirit!"—as the Society's constitution says. That this is creedlessness, we maintain; that it is brainlessness, we deny with all the brains which are allotted to our share.

If there is more resolute individual thinking anywhere on earth than can be found within the Association's limits it would be an interesting spectacle. We do not even agree in the definition or derivation of the word "religion," just as it was remarked at a scientific meeting in England, that no two members gave the same definition of the word "science." We assume that every one must have his or her individual opinion or credo. What we repudiate is the imperative mood of the verb,—which is crede, the original spelling of the word creed.

We stand with the men of science who are now setting the example of freedom to the men of religion. And as we have the support of their method, on the one side, so poetry sustains us on the other; for what says our own Whittier, in painting the ideal period of his "Pennsylvania Pilgrim"?

"For there was freedom in that wakening time
Of tender souls; to differ was no crime;
He varying bells made up the perfect chime."

T. W. H.

NOT TO DESTROY BUT TO CONSERVE.

The spirit in which we do a deed is sometimes even more important than the deed itself. Often a bad or an injudicious manner and tone of speaking or acting will destroy the good effects of a timely and necessary measure, and divert it from the end most desirable. Out of the full heart comes the earnest word; but if the heart be not suffused with the purest spirit and fired with the loftiest motive, the word will have a sharp and harsh sound and grate so disagreeably on the sensitive soul and ear, that the one will be repelled and the other closed to its appeal. Especially is it important, therefore, that those who have deeds to do and words to speak which are aimed at removing prejudices, dispelling superstition, and enlightening ignorance, should act and speak in the gentlest, wisest, most magnanimous spirit and tone, with as little hurt to innocent and unprepared minds as possible. We would not counsel the withholding of any truth, the staying of any timely vigorous word, the suppressing of any full-grown necessary measure, the quenching of any accumulated ardent purpose—not at all; but we hold it to be the religious duty of all who speak and act before the public, with a view to its instruction and education, its advancement and elevation into freer, grander, truer modes of thinking and being, to spare no pains and omit no opportunity to convince the world that their motives are unselfish, their intentions kind, and their aims the most beneficent and all-conserving. Only by so doing will they really further and not hinder, prosper and not spoil, that to which they put their hands and for which they poise their tongues.

It is a matter of no surprise to us that so many of the Christian public regard with indignation and horror the attitude and assertions of Free Religious writers and speakers; not that we do not think that for the most part these writers and speakers proceed to their work in a singularly excellent and commendable way, but because this same Christian public are so unprepared, by all their previous education, to understand how any one can renounce Christianity without renouncing all that is truly good and desirable. Christians habitually and invariably identify Christianity with religion. In their view, Christianity is not a religion but it is religion itself; and to attack or impeach or criticize Christianity, therefore, is to attack and impeach and criticize religion. When we remember how sacred this word, religion, is to the heart of man, and always has been; how associated it is with all that man has held most venerable and holy; how intertwined with his dearest memories, his fondest hopes, his noblest joys, his purest aspirations; how swathed and upborne his whole life has been with its precious consolations and divine assurances,—we cannot wonder that Christians, who for eighteen centuries have used Christianity and religion as equivalent and interchangeable terms, should be startled and shocked at hearing this faith denied the pre-eminence they have so long unhesitatingly yielded to it, and at being compelled to listen while the previous question is moved upon its claims, its merits, and its prerogatives. Indeed, we should be very much disappointed if they were not startled and shocked, and summoned, by all this modern advance of thought, to defend with their utmost energy that which they hold to be so true and precious. If men would give up their most sacred convictions without a struggle, if they would see that which they regard as religion assaulted and carried with storm of question and denial without vigorously trying to defend it, we should believe less than we do in their capacity to reverence what in the end will be proved to be really truest and best.

We do not shrink to confess, then, that it is the needful and inevitable task of Free Religionists to convince Christians, as well by manner and tone of utterance and action as by argument, that Free Religion aims not to destroy but to conserve religion; that the whole movement to supersede Christianity by Natural Religion has for its foremost aim to foster, advance, and assure all the highest and deepest religious interests of man; that the movement to secularize the government, and rid it of all ecclesiastical influences and control, means not the desecration nor the overthrow of any altar to which the heart of man brings sincere and faithful worship, but on the contrary to lead the whole people, in the spirit of the largest liberty and in the light of the purest intelligence, to discriminate between the formal and the essential, the instituted and the spontaneous, the special and the universal in faith and worship, and to found religion not on law and statute, but on the free, glad, natural homage of the human heart. We heartily believe that this is what Free Religion aims and is able to accomplish, and that it can be proved to have just this and no less worthy intention and capacity. It aims to make all men free—free not to impose upon one another religious beliefs and forms, but each to enjoy his own. It would have no national altar or church, no national creed of theism or atheism; but it labors for such a broad and wise education of every man, as will lead him to serve and reverence the highest ideal of which his individual nature is capable of conceiving. A. W. A.

THE RIGHT POINT.

At the installation of Rev. George Hepworth, last month, as pastor of an "unsectarian church," that is, a church that is sectarian only towards Romanists on the one side and Rationalists on the other, Mr. Hepworth, in response to an inquiry, gave an account of the mental process that led him out of Unitarianism, and stated the considerations that prevailed with him to take his last step. "Early failure to bring others to his opinions" (we quote the report of the New York Tribune) "led him to study and think and he came to the conclusion that it was better to teach men what to believe than what not to believe. He seemed to be working out of sympathy with everybody, and doing them no appreciable good."

This is precisely what every young minister feels before he is heartily committed to his work,—before he understands the conditions of it. He thinks he has made a mistake, has got into the wrong sect, has chosen the wrong profession, has misdirected his talents. He complains of being lonely, of being out of sympathy with people, of doing no appreciable good. We presume that every earnest man goes through the same experience. He is lonely; he is out of sympathy with people. What then? Is that a sign that he is on the wrong track or on the right one?

Assuming that the majority are right, it is a sign that he is on the wrong one. Assuming that the majority are wrong, it is a sign that he is on the right one.

In the first case there is but one course to take: he must go with the majority, wherever that is. In Protestant countries it will be with the "Evangelicals;" in Catholic countries it will be with the Romanists. On this principle no new departures would ever have taken place. There never would have been a Protestantism; there would never have been a Romanism; there would never have been a Christianity. In the latter case there is, but one course to take: he must stay where he is, accept his loneliness, take a certain absence of sympathy as an indication that he is doing his duty, and learn to look very far below the surface for evidence of the effect of his labors. The first position is the more comfortable; the second is the more heroic. Each has its dangers; on one side the danger is of fatal acquiescence, on the other of fatal presumption. The man who craves sympathy must beware lest he sink conscience and lose independence, lest he cease to study and think, lest he mistake sympathy for evidence of influence when it may be evidence of inefficiency. The man who stands alone must beware lest he mistake pre-emptiousness for prophecy and arrogance for inspiration.

"One with God is a majority," said Frederick Douglass; and a very splendid saying it was. But how shall the "one" know that he is with God or God with him? Is isolation from one's fellow creatures equivalent to commerce with God? Suppose the isolation proceed from stubbornness, or eccentricity, or perverseness, or unreasonableness, or conceit? The man in a minority is sorely tempted to claim the invisible infinite as being on his side. He must have communion somewhere; he must be in sympathy with somebody. All alone none can endure to be; all alone none pretends to be, save the madman.

To be in sympathy with the men of one's own generation has never been a sign of greatness, for it betokens a mind that lives on a level with the average mind. The sincere have never large following. The great teacher has few disciples: not that every teacher who has few disciples is great. Littleness keeps people away as well as greatness. But greatness keeps people away. In London, Martineau and Maurice spoke to scores and hundreds, while Spurgeon and Newman address thousands. Emerson has but a handful of disciples. Parker, as a religious reformer, was less in sympathy with the multitude than some of his friends think. His great popularity was due to the earnest part he took in the antislavery movement, which lifted thousands to a great elevation of thought and feeling.

The popularity of a teacher is not in the best quarters considered a good sign. It is regarded as an indication that he is going down rather than rising. If THE INDEX were to be suddenly overwhelmed with new subscribers; if subscriptions to stock were to come pouring in, a thousand dollars at a time, so that capitalists were eager to put money into it,—we should say, "What is Mr. Abbot about? Is he lowering his standard? Is he abandoning his principles? Is he pandering to the popular taste?" The difficulty of making friends for the paper proves that the paper is doing a needed work. It is working out of sympathy with the majority; it is trying to change public opinion,—always a slow, laborious, and thankless task.

That it has any power to do it is owing entirely, not to its being alone, but to its being in sympathy with something impersonal but mightier than the groups of personalities called churches, sects, denominations. It is in sympathy with ideas, that are near enough to be visible, and tangible enough to be seized. It is at one with the latent mind of the generation, with the intelligence that has not yet found expression in creeds, and that to the multitude seems negative and destructive. It is in the air, but condensed, and is therefore regarded as vague, mystical, unreal. It is the truth of the future, the revelation unrevealed, the apocalypse unopened. To those who have vision of it, it is the most real of real things. To those who have no vision of it, it is nothing and less than nothing. To the mass of people he who has the vision seems to stand alone in a wilderness. They pity him. He is simply standing in an invisible company of disembodied persons, the undeveloped spirits of men, so to speak. He has caught the advancing forms of the coming generation; he hears their solid tread, marks their firm direction, reads the motto on their banner, understands the meaning of their murmuring speech; and he communicates what they communicate to him. This was the case with Luther, with Channing, with Parker. This is the case with Emerson. So far from being without sympathy, the so-called leaders of thought have the widest and purest of all sympathy,—sympathy with the interior feelings, purposes, tendencies of men,—sympathy with the strong drift of things. To leave this for the fellowship of any body of dogmatists is a retreat indeed. You may spare your pity for the solitary teachers, and save the whole of it for these comfortable Christians who have gone back to the flesh pots, having made the discovery that Egypt was after all the Promised Land. They will tell people what to believe; namely, what they believe already on the authority of tradition. They will leave to others the duty of telling them what not to believe; namely, those very things.

O. B. F.

In the last analysis, the "logic of events" is the logic of ideas.

THE RELATION OF FREE RELIGION TO SOCIAL REFORMS.

I.

The "new chemistry" teaches us that weight is the measure of all things, and that our only test of certainty in the analysis of unknown substances is the fact that none of the weight of the original material is lost, but all is reproduced in the new compound. But weight is only another word for the comparative relation of substances to each other and to the mass of the earth; and therefore in this, we have no absolute standard, but only a comparative one. The true measure of all things is harmony, or the accordance of one thing with another or with the great whole.

There is an analogy between this scientific method and the practical test which the common sense of mankind applies to every religion. There is no absolute standard by which we may determine whether this religion is true and that is false. Every sect has sought to establish one, but with as little success as England and France tried to use the measure of the royal hand or foot as a universal guide. The only test is the power of a religion to meet the wants of human nature and help forward the work of humanity.

Now that the great movement which we call by the name of Free Religion is passing from a critical and negative stage to a positive and creative one, it must prepare to abide this severe test by which all religions are eventually tried. Its weight must be tested; we must know its relation to the great mass of human life, and must measure its power in comparison with that of others spiritual and mental forces.

It must show that in its recombination of the original elements of human nature nothing has been lost, and that the freedom of movement given to every atom has only called out latent energies and developed new power of good.

In other words, Free Religion must be tested by its power to arouse, inspire, and develop the faculties of the human soul, and lead them in a direction which shall permanently benefit humanity.

If it be not so, however attractive may be its freedom, however refreshing its hopefulness and serenity, however dignified and commanding its independence and self-respect, however tender and loving its welcome of truth from every quarter, and its sympathy with every form of faith, it will not permanently satisfy us.

If in our recognition of law we have lost something of faith and trust which a blind acceptance of Providence would give us,—if in our cosmopolitan liberality we sacrifice that spirit of loyalty and devotion which makes the superstitious crusader or bigoted fanatic noble in our eyes,—if in honoring all days alike, we have ceased even to feel a Sabbath calm and a holy peace steal over our souls,—in short, if we have let go anything which really belongs to the integrity of human nature and the highest spiritual welfare, then our equation is imperfect and we must go back and find out what has escaped from our crucible, and why our synthesis does not correspond to our analysis.

Such is the problem which is offered to those who have given up the fixed formulas of Church doctrine and creed, and who are seeking new values in the results of the mental forces acting in perfect freedom. That we or any body of men have solved this problem, it would be folly to assert; but it is a question constantly forced upon us. Is there not something of joy or hope or use to be gained by quiet resting in the old forms which we are losing by setting our sails for the broad ocean, and following the pole-star of truth wherever it leads us?

Mr. Emerson long ago expressed this natural feeling very beautifully in his poem of "The Problem," and we all of us feel tempted to ask the same question:—

"Why should the rest on him allure
That I could not on me endure?"

But of this we are sure that, as no atom of matter is ever lost, but, though it may escape the chemist's balance, is safe somewhere in the universe, so—

"No account of the Holy Ghost
The heedless world has ever lost."

If we have by some mistake in our methods or carelessness in their application failed to preserve all that is of spiritual value, it is not lost, and the want will be revealed by the sharp tests which life is constantly applying, so that we shall be warned of our error, and able to renew and correct our processes.

With this view I shall try to consider some of the social problems of the day as solved by the methods and in the spirit of Free Religion.

E. D. C.

EVENING NOTES.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—Accepting your proposal that I send you weekly a column or so of "correspondence," I beg you to let me do it in my own way. I offer you, then, these "Evening Notes" on random topics, which I shall jot down and send you without much after-thinking. Let this be borne in mind by any of your readers who may perchance be disposed to call me to account. They will be written to myself more than to the public, and I may be among the first, when I see them in type by daylight, to smile at their folly, or shake my head over more serious faults. Let them pass for the little good somebody may twist out of them, and believe me, yours truly,

S. H. MORSE.

GEORGE MACDONALD, as report goes, preaches better than he lectures. His lecture on Tom Hood, which I heard, certainly left plenty of room for improvement. But his prayers are described as superior to lecture or sermon. And this I can believe, for he impresses you by manner, voice, and cast of thought, as one whose whole life is a prayer that all the world may become very good, and that speedily. The heroic sentiment may also claim him as a champion. He does not pray for sugar-plums to eat on the way. He is willing to rough it, if need be, accepting any amount of hardship. To beseech the Almighty for sorrows, afflictions, adversities, of every kind, if thereby we may be lifted to nobler and truer living,—must not a petition like that strike the Divine ear oddly? Asking for gifts that come by the way of adversity is no common occurrence. The ordinary Thanksgiving is for sunshine or gentle rain, not for clouds and tempest; for peace and plenty, not war and famine. Well, it takes a great faith to see the good that is in everything, and one is not always sure about it then. Yet I have sometimes wondered why our governors do not sum up the entire year, the evil with the good, thanking the wise Providence for all, and not alone for the supposed best part. MacMahon could shoulder Sedan and relieve Napoleon of responsibility. But can we so stand between this world's ill-fortune and Delty? I am not sure that we dispose of the matter when we say there is no ill-fortune; the difference being simply, shorter or longer, easier or more difficult means. I incline to believe in the reality of some misfortunes; that although we survive and escape them, still they were evils which no Providence could foresee or hinder. The good of ill lies in our seeing that it is ill. And we turn it to account because we ourselves are the God of infinite resource. It would be ill indeed could we make no use of it. It is hard to believe that it was specially provided by a Superintending being for our benefit. I incline to doubt if there be a Delty who knows of these occurrences before they happen. Is there an all-seeing eye that discerned our fire before citizens of Boston did? An eye, forsooth, that saw the great Boston conflagration before even the globe itself was fashioned,—so that, when the alarm sounded, this Delty knew, as we did not, that the flames would spread to the wharves and down to the Post Office, laying in ruins a fifth part of the city? I can but think that the world's experience from the beginning negatives every such supposition. God is the intelligent spirit, immanent in us, on which we rely though all else fail; our abiding resource, our greater self offering us cheer and counselling us to greater knowledge, stricter integrity, and wiser methods.

THE LECTURE SEASON is less attractive each succeeding winter. Time was when the Parker Fraternity offered a rare and bountiful feast for the price of a ticket. They flourished; competition sprang up, and things began to cheapen. Now we have more "courses" than I can count, and not half-a-dozen good lectures among them all. Quantity supercedes quality. I must own, though, that I judge by the subjects mainly this winter. This test may not absolutely be a safe one, but still subjects are signs which a wise man will not disregard. Had any one else, not so favorably known as Col. Higginson, taken the cheap-sounding subject, "What I know about London," I should have laughed to myself, and said, "I guess it isn't much he knows," and let him "say his say" as the Woman's Journal would express it, without going to hear him. In which case I should of course have made a mistake.

"WENDELL PHILLIPS on Froude" was a taxing subject. But I despair of Irish history. They all appeal to "facts." Froude is "impartial," gives England her due of censure; but somehow the story comes out as an Englishman on the whole might be expected to wish it would. Phillips says, Froude states one fact, omits another: that other changes the picture. Froude knew it would, &c. Well, I don't think the true history of Ireland's woes will get written yet a while. The appeal to history is no vindication of England. Let England heal the breach, by making a new history which no eloquent Irishman can have the heart to defame. Let by-gones be by-gones. Be just to-day. No earthly power can hinder the forgiveness and reconciliation that will to-morrow follow.

CHARMING WAS Brete Harle's "Argonauts of '49." I enjoyed the way the whole story was told. His description of California life in the mountains made one almost wish that times there were again and now as they used to be, that he too might go and be an "Argonaut." The following consideration, however, has a bearing one way or the other: "Some of the best had the worst pedigree, and some of the worst had been nurtured in the best families of the land." I wish many people might have the pleasure of hearing this lecture.

I HAVE RECEIVED a little pamphlet about Mr. Henry M. Stanley who arrived in Boston yesterday to lecture about his discovery of Livingston. What is all this noise about Stanley, I wonder? One would think that his discovery was of greater importance than Livingston's. Says this advertisement: "There can be no doubt that his reception in his own land, whose flag he carried in behalf of American generosity"—(it isn't patriotic, but I query, in spite of patriotism, whether, when young Bennett said to young Stanley, "can you find Livingston?" and he answered, "yes," and Bennett said, "go," there was not at least an equal looking forward to the fate of the Herald and that of the African discoverer)—"into the very heart of Southern Africa, will be no less enthusiastic, no less a triumphant ovation, than was extended to him abroad." Well, I don't know. There was merit in Bennett's saying "go," and in Stanley's going. But this parade, this going and doing a pure, "generous" act, and then coming home to exhibit yourself, and court a "triumphant ovation," turning disinterested heroism into a fortune,—I say I don't know. 'Tis the custom of the time, and one seldom honored in the breach, and my feelings may wholly be at fault. It is good to hear that Livingston is alive, has had succor extended to him, and is now likely to prosper. Stanley brings us the news. Let us forgive all that requires forgiveness; and say, "Sir, you have done nobly. Accept our thanks."

"THE WORLD moves," writes Mr. Beecher in an editorial I have just been reading. Indeed it does, for he reports a case of Free Religion (though he does not himself so name it) which has just broken out in New York City, around and about Mr. George H. Hepworth. Hepworth has been installed as an Orthodox minister. "To the council were invited churches and ministers of all the principal Evangelical denominations,—Episcopal, Methodist, Baptist, Dutch Reformed, Presbyterian, and Congregational." The whole article is right well worth your space, but I will quote only sufficient to cover my point, and send you the rest, which is a description of Mr. Beecher's own terrific installation-experience, for some unfilled corner, sometime.

Dr. McCosh, President of Princeton College, N. J., and for soundness in Calvinistic faith, as delivered to the Scotch, not to be questioned; Dr. Ormiston, a fit representative of the solid and substantial merits of the Dutch Reformed; Rev. Dr. and Professor Martin, of the University of New York; Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., of the venerable Episcopal Church; Rev. Dr. Foss of the Methodist, and Rev. Dr. Armitage of the Baptist, faith; together with Rev. Dr. R. S. Storrs and Rev. Dr. Budington, of Brooklyn; Dr. Cliff, Dr. Ray Palmer—these were some of the members of this remarkable council.

"Ministers of various sects have long been accustomed to meet together on the common ground of benevolence, but this was a council called to examine the fitness of a candidate to assume the pastoral charge of an Evangelical church. Mr. Hepworth certainly does not accept Calvinism as Dr. McCosh does; nor church-worship services as Mr. Tyng does; nor the ordinances as the Baptists do; nor church government and order as Dr. Ormiston and the Presbyterians do.

"Now, had Mr. Hepworth been as earnest for systematic theology as Turretin, it would have been a remarkable phenomenon to have such a various Council approve his views. But, Mr. Hepworth is not a systematic theologian. Neither by nature nor by grace does he run in that direction. This was his strength. To a few cardinal facts and doctrines—the sinfulness of man, the need and reality of a change of heart by Divine power, the Divinity of Christ, and the Atonement for sin by his death, the rewards and penalties of a future life—he gave his assent. A rigorous examination on any one of these doctrines, from the standpoint of any of the sects represented, would not only have overthrown the candidate, but have set the whole Council by the ears!"

What now shall be said? That this is not a case of very Free Religion? Only one thing seriously affects the conclusion: Mr. Beecher intimates that this drawing together of "many men of many minds" was in some measure inspired by a "sense of common danger," which, if true, makes of course a difference. So, after all, the outlook is not so promising, for it may prove that we have been rejoicing over only a case of Free Religious variety.

BOSTON, Tuesday Evening, Dec. 15, 1872.

Literary Department.

NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS.—All books designed for review in these columns must be addressed to THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

RECEIVED.

PHYSICS AND POLITICS; or, Thoughts on the Application of the Principles of "Natural Selection" and "Inheritance" to Political Society. By WALTER BAEHRST, Esq., Author of "The English Constitution." New York: D. APPLETON & COMPANY. 1873. [International Scientific Series: No. 2.]

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. In Three Parts. With Essays. Boston: A. WILLIAMS & Co. 1873.

REVENGES OF A WOODMAWYER; or, "Rum" Killings of Cord-Wood, being Serio-Comic Views of Life as it is, as taken from the Top of a Saw-buck. By JONAS SIMPKINS. New York: Printed for the Author by LANGE, LITTLE, & HILLMAN, 108 to 114 Wooster street. 1872.

SPIES. A Novel. By MRS. MARTHA J. LAMB. With Illustrations. New York: D. APPLETON & Co.

CLARENCE. A Drama. By D. J. SCHIRER. St. Louis: E. F. HOBART & Co., 615 Chestnut St. 1872.

A SERMON, Preached in Ann Arbor, Michigan, on Sunday Morning, December 8, 1872: the Sunday next after the Funeral of Horace Greeley. By C. H. BURGHAM. Ann Arbor: ANN ARBOR PRINTING AND PUBLISHING CO. 1872.

THE GALAXY. January, 1873. New York: SHIELDON & Co., 67 Broadway.

THE PENN MONTHLY. December, 1872. Philadelphia: 308 Walnut Street.

THE OTTAWA MONTHLY. December, 1872. Chicago: LEADER, BREWSTER, & Co., 142 LaSalle St.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE. January, 1873. Newburgh, N. Y.: S. S. WOOD & Co.

DIE ENTSTEHUNG DER BIBEL. Von EMIL ZITTEL, v. Stadtpfarrer in Karlsruhe. Zweite unveränderte Auflage. (THE ORIGIN OF THE BIBLE. By EMIL ZITTEL, Prof. Minister in Karlsruhe. Second unaltered edition.) Karlsruhe, 1873. 12mo. pp. vii, 236.

There is, perhaps, no greater need in English literature at the present moment than that of popular and at the same time thoroughly scientific works in aid of a rational study of the Bible. Almost every other department of scientific research has already been made more or less accessible to the general reading public; but in this one direction, of the highest possible importance, absolutely nothing has been done. The consequence is that, while popular information concerning the present state of knowledge on other subjects is continually increasing, there is, even among otherwise well-read people, still the densest ignorance of everything that is necessary to a correct understanding of the origin, composition, contents, and character of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. The kind of enlightenment which has thus far been offered to the people on these topics has, as a general thing, not been more than sufficient to open their eyes to the fact that the Bible is not in reality what any of the churches assume and proclaim it to be. Further than this, the positive information given may be estimated at zero; and this for the simple reason that the men, both in this country and in England, whose special culture renders them competent to speak and write on Biblical literature, have been content to leave popular instruction in this branch to be supplied by men altogether innocent of any thorough and accurate acquaintance with it.

At the first glance this statement may seem unjust, and to need no further refutation than a simple reference to such books as De Wette's "Introduction to the Old Testament," edited by Theodore Parker, the same author's "Introduction to the New Testament," translated by Frederick Frothingham, the works of Dr. Davidson, Colenso, and others of like character. But, whatever else may be said of this class of books, it cannot be said that they are popular in their form. The learned apparatus, which takes up so large a space in De Wette's "Introductions," at once indicates that they are addressed to the scholar. The works of Davidson, besides being in a measure open to the same objection, are altogether too elaborate for the general reader; and if Colenso were to continue to treat all the writings of the Old Testament and the New with the discursiveness which characterizes his work on the Pentateuch, it would almost be doubtful whether "even the world itself could contain the books that should be written." What is most needed is not other literary aids for the professional student (although there is need enough of those), but direct instruction of the people. To this end, works of a character quite different from any that we now possess are necessary—not exhaustive treatises which are sure to exhaust the ordinary reader's patience before he has got half way through them; not books that "pre-suppose any special training in order to get the full benefit of their contents; not mere compendiums of larger, more expensive, and more difficult works, nor mere compilations of the investigations of others, without critical sifting of the material or independent judgment as to the tenability of the results,—but brief original expositions, at once careful, compact, and thoroughly trustworthy in statement, furnishing the facts that have been ascertained and are no longer open to question, conscientiously noting what still belongs to the domain of hypothesis, and giving it only for what it is worth; works that shall be attractive in style without detriment to the gravity of the subject, and that shall combine a certain epic flow and fullness of narration with a wise economy in the handling of details.

The production of works such as the foregoing gives a hint of is, of course, attended with difficulties. There is no leger-de-main about it—they "cannot be shaken out of one's sleeve," as the Germans say. But German scholars are the men who have not only shown that the difficulties are not insuperable, but have also shown, by descending from their academical heights to instruct the general public, that they have the universal dissemination of sound Biblical knowledge at heart. Books like Hausath's Geschichte der alttestamentlichen Literatur (History of Old Testament Literature), Langhans's Heilige Schrift (The Holy Scripture), Nöldeke's Alttestamentliche Literatur (Old Testament Literature), and that indicated at the head of this notice, are all illustrations in point. They are all intended for popular information, and all of remarkable, though not equal, excellence. Professor Nöldeke's is decidedly the most original in its matter and the most brilliant in execution. The latest of them, however—that of Pfarrer Zittel—has great merits of its own. It really gives a bird's eye view of the whole subject of Biblical Literature, from the vantage-ground of modern criticism. As a work which appeals directly, in simple and beautiful language, to the common understanding of the (German) people, it will not be easily surpassed. Some idea of the scope of it may be formed from a general survey of its contents. It is divided into seven sections or chapters, which treat of the following subjects: 1. The Bible, or the Sacred Writings of the Old and New Testaments; 2. The Torah, or the Pentateuch; 3. The Prophets; 4. The Hagiographa; 5. The Apostle Paul and his Letters; 6. The Revelation, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the seven Catholic Epistles; 7. The Gospels.

The chief defect of the book is the inequality of its handling of the topics. If all the parts were as well done as those which treat of the Pentateuch, of Paul, of the Apocalypse, and of the Gospels, there would be but little more to be desired. In the dozen pages (213–214) devoted to the discussion of the general questions connected with the genesis of the Gospels, the author furnishes a brilliant illustration of the style in which all such books ought to be written. Few persons who have not made a special study of the apostolic and post-apostolic age could read these pages, few as they are, without gaining a clearer and more vivid idea than they already possess of the circumstances out of which the gospel narratives grew and by which they were moulded. The pages that are least satisfactory of all are those which relate to "The Messiah." The author utterly fails to give any adequate representation of the origin and development of the Messianic idea. This is a great defect, which ought, in future editions, to be remedied. The section on the Prophets would also bear revision and some enlargement. Then, in a few places, there is a little more or what borders upon specifically Orthodox unctious than is, perhaps, necessary or wholesome in a book which is so thoroughly radical. T. V.

SEPTIMIUS FELTON; OR, THE ELIXIR OF LIFE. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston: Brown & Faunce, Toledo.

There are hardly any books yet made in America that show perfect art and perfect insight so truly as those of Hawthorne do. He is in telling the story of the human heart all that Emerson is in thinking the thoughts of the free human mind, with perhaps more clearness of vision and a yet finer gift of expression. I at least give Hawthorne the first place in American letters thus far, and say to all studious and thoughtful people, "With all your reading read Hawthorne." Such penetration of the secrets of human nature, such parables of man's experience, such communion of the feeling heart and thinking mind with outward scenes, and such imagination of the way that is before us, are rarely found in human scriptures. The "Scarlet Letter" and the "Marble Faun" are a great deal more suggestive of divine wisdom than that much vaunted theological document, of unknown authorship and dubious character, the Fourth Gospel, if only sensible and feeling people will once see the inspiration of Hawthorne, as they vainly try to see that of the fictitious "John." The man who was with us not long since was to Puritanism what the John of idealizing imagination is to the prosaic history of Jesus—a poet and thinker full of sweetness and light. Even the least valuable of Hawthorne's writing, the "Note Books," are not only better history than the doubtful transcripts of oral traditions called Gospels, but if we could once surround them with an atmosphere of worship, like that in which people look at the New Testament, we could readily find more spiritual incident and thought in them than in all the meagre simplicity and superstition which are offered us as the sole history of God on earth—the four Gospels.

In truth, Hawthorne is full of profound divinity, clear and deep suggestion and imaging forth of spiritual things, which deserve zealous study. He is especially wonderful in his knowledge of the development of man from animal intelligence to spiritual, from mere instinct to pure and great conscience, from the low love of pleasure to lofty experience of beatitude. He does for our moral growth what Darwin does for our spiritual—shows how struggle and suffering lead us up from the earthy to the heavenly. And the very clear insight of Hawthorne has especially made him an apostle of truth about the nature and position of woman. The expostious, hints, and questions on this subject, which are scattered through the writings of this pure master, alone make him a Doctor of more sound divinity than all New England otherwise has yet become learned in. Next to this understanding of man's ascent from the material, and of woman's struggle with shrouded fate, the illumination of external Nature is marvellous in the writings of Hawthorne. The impression made by a new world on the Puritan mind comes ripe and perfect from the mind of Hawthorne, fruits of a long tradition of observation and reflection, such as we pluck only once in an historical period.

And to those who otherwise know Hawthorne, the last work of his pen, the unfinished story of Septimius Felton's search for the elixir of immortality, will show the master at his best, unfinished and imperfect as the work is. Septimius is the unsettled young mind, suffering the penalty of a bringing up in the dim religious no-light of tradition. His pastor says to him, in the usual fashion of pious fraud, without which Orthodoxy could not live a day: "Study for the ministry; bind your thoughts to it; pray; ask a belief, and you will soon find you have it. Doubts may occasionally press in; and it is so with every clergyman. But your prevailing mood will be faith."

This bread-and-butter godliness it is both too early and too late for Septimius to accept. He is not yet a minister, with many necessities and restraints, and he has already given a rein to free and bold thought. So he answers: "It has seemed to me that it is not the prevailing mood, the most common one, that is to be trusted. This is habit, formality, the shallow covering which we close over what is real, and seldom suffer to be blown aside. But it is the snake-like doubt that thrusts out its head, which gives us a glimpse of reality. Surely such moments are a hundred times as real as the dull, quiet moments of faith, or what you call such."

The minister's reply is true to fact, when he says: "To a youth of your frame of character, of your ability, I will say, and your requisition for something profound in the grounds of your belief, it is not unusual to meet this trouble."

And from this we go forward in the story of Septimius along the path of a mind taught to feel that new questions in the soul are snake-like. He takes the common road of intellectual revolt against the wearing of spiritual goggles, and refuses to look into spiritual things at all. He asks the question: "May it not be possible to have too profound a sense of the marvellous contrivance and adaptation of this material world to require or believe in anything spiritual?" Then one of the Orthodox fictions suggests to him that our chief trouble is that, since the fall of man, we do not live long enough. Reflection on this turned all his natural instinct of immortality into a hope of attaining a deathless life here. The sense of an undying principle, which justly interpreted causes us to look upward, was made significant by him of possible continued existence on earth. Then happening on an old tradition of this same twist of the mind, in a document so undecipherable and dark and difficult as to answer very well to supply the place of a Bible to his new credulity, he studied and believed and built his life on the expectation.

At first there is a chance that a healthy human love, with more divinity in it than in any speculation, orthodox or heterodox, will help the groping youth; and there is a fine touch in what Hawthorne says of the maiden's influence: "She reconciled him, in some secret way, to life as it was, to imperfection, to decay; without any help from her intellect, but through the influence of her character, she seemed, not to solve, but to smooth away, problems that troubled him; merely by being, by womanhood, by simplicity, she interpreted God's ways to him; she softened the stoniness that was gathering about his heart."

There is more of the real woman question in this single glimpse than in all that the female platform has yet given us, and more of the coming of God to man, as if in very flesh, than in all which Christian theology has ever guessed or feigned of incarnation.

But Septimius was too much drawn away by his one-sided thinking, and converted from an interested actor into a cold and disconnected spectator of all mankind's warm and sympathetic life. He had killed, on the outskirts of Concord fight, a young British officer, and out of the fate thus woven came a visitation which we will let the reader look up in the book, as we wish to criticise without "spoiling the story." A woman dowered secretly with misfortune becomes a leading figure of the scene, as in nearly all Hawthorne's stories, and there comes in also a Doctor Jabez Portsoaken, who makes spiders his familiars, and who hints at the dusty and musty thing which seeking mere knowledge, apart from human sympathies, may become. The unhappy woman of the tale, with her youth and her hidden sorrows, reflects a great deal of Hawthorne's keen perception, as when she says: "I think man is more favored than the angels, and made capable of higher heroism, greater virtue, and of a more excellent spirit than they, because we have such a mystery of grief and terror around us; whereas they, being in a certainty of God's light, seeing his goodness and his purposes more perfectly than we, cannot be so brave as often poor weak man, and weaker woman, has the opportunity to be, and sometimes makes use of it. God gave the whole world to man, and if he is left alone with it, it will make a clod of him at last; but, to remedy that, God gave man a grave, and it redeems all, while it seems to destroy all, and makes an immortal spirit of him in the end."

Such philosophy of mortal destiny and immortal life makes the current conceit of life and immortality brought to light by a physical escape from the grave seem the cheap imitation of a universal savage notion which it really is. Not a tribe of man but has had a belief in escape of the ghost from the grave, to a realm of other-world life. It is in thought only, not in any crude tradition, that the real path of man on earth and through the God's Acre has been justly traced. The common faith degrades religion to the level of corpse life, of flesh containing God on earth, of flesh saved and restored,—wholly missing the true lesson of made perfect in spirit through the suffering of the flesh and delivered by the grave itself into a higher state of existence.

So Septimius, in his reaction against a most earthy faith, gets into a most earthy pursuit of knowledge, with vast imagination of a kingdom of heaven to be secured this side the grave by it, precisely as Jesus, in his unenlightened enthusiasm, imagined a realm of miracle about to descend on him on earth, and make him a world-deliverer competent to supernatural baffling of the grave, and re-conquest from the grave of the hapless dead. And as Jesus got nothing for his pains but to feel the hand of Providence breaking every bone of his mortal condition, and launching him ruthlessly off the shore of dust and ashes and tears and blood upon the sea of untried and unknown existence, so did Septimius see at last the product of all his toil fall, as a glass shattered against the stones, and learn that beyond the grave, not on this side of it, is the true goal of man's deepest interest and purest longing. He had gathered, he thought, a flower, and completed his elixir of life, only to find that what he had deemed a beautiful flower was a semblance only, and was in fact a baneful growth out of the soil of a grave, a deadly poison. But woman far more than man suffers in the catastrophe of the story, as in that of human life; and in conclusion we may quote what the chief sufferer says, when she is helping out the dream of Septimius about regenerating the world in living forever here on earth. She is laying out her imaginary messianic task, and says: "I will go among women, and observe and converse with them, from the princess to the peasant girl; and will find out what is the matter, that woman gets so large a share of human misery laid on her weak shoulders. I will see why it is that, whether she be a royal princess, she has to be sacrificed to matters of state, or a cottage girl, still somehow the thing not fit for her is done; and whether there is or no some deadly curse on woman, so that she has nothing to do, and nothing to enjoy, but only to be wronged by man, and still to love him, and despise herself for it,—to be shaky in her revenges. And then if, after all this investigation, it turns out—as I suspect—that woman is not capable of being helped, that there is something inherent in herself that makes it hopeless to struggle for her redemption, then what shall I do? Nay, I know not, unless to preach to the sisterhood that they all kill their female children as fast as they are born, and then let the generations of men manage as they can! Woman, so feeble and crazy in body, fair enough sometimes, but full of infirmities; not strong, with nerves prone to every pain; ailing, full of little weaknesses more contemptible than great ones!"

E. C. T.

If Adam is accountable for "consequential damages," he will have a rough time of it.—Investigator.

PHILOSOPHICAL PAPERS.

I.

BY F. E. ARDOTT.

PSYCHOLOGICAL ANALYSIS OF THE IDEA OF SPACE.

FROM AN ARTICLE ON THE "PHILOSOPHY OF SPACE AND TIME," IN THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR JULY, 1874.

It was stated as the first distinction between Space and Extension that, while the latter is a simple notion, the former is the indissoluble synthesis of three distinct elements. Now all these constituent elements of the idea of Space are negative notions. It is erroneous to suppose that a negative notion is the negation of all thought, and conveys absolutely no knowledge; the contrary is easily demonstrable. If, however, as will be proved, we know Space only by negative characteristics, this simple consideration will sufficiently explain why we can never represent it, either as finite or infinite, by the sensuous imagination.

The first of the three notions is that of receptivity. Matter is contained in Space,—Space contains matter. Extended matter is the only object of perception and of the sensuous imagination; but the existence of Space is the necessary condition of the possibility of Extension. In other words, matter could not be continuous if Space did not exist; yet Space is not given as an object of positive cognition by any faculty. Every act of the pure intellect is the intuition of a relation between terms; and the proposition—"Matter is contained in Space"—being the formula of the receptivity of Space, the terms of this relation are Matter and Space, and the relation itself is that of inclusion. Now in all instances in which the relation of inclusion is positively cognized, the two terms are alike in kind, as when we say that the pitcher contains the water, or the apple contains its seeds; here both terms are extended matter. But in the above formula the two terms are unlike in kind, and the second is simply a negation of the first. It is true that the formula is not precisely interpretable into "Matter is contained in Not-matter,"—for time, mind, etc., equally come under the category Not-matter, which shows that the terms Space and Not-matter are not strictly convertible. As to its receptivity, Space may be defined—"that which is not matter, but which renders matter possible"; or, more briefly,—"the immaterial condition of matter"; or, again, "the absence of matter plus its possibility." But these definitions do more than simply define Space as one term in the formula, "Matter is contained in Space"; for they also state the relation between the terms. So far forth as a single term only, analysis can reach no result beyond this, that Space or absolute vacuity is the negation of matter; we cannot go further and say that this not-matter, as distinguished from other not-matters, is the necessary condition of Extension, without stating the relation between this term and the other term, matter. This very fact proves the absolute necessity which characterizes the psychological relation between Space and Matter; neither term can be thought independently of the other, and the correlation is therefore unconditioned and indissoluble. Moreover, the receptivity of Space is cognized, not by the sensuous imagination, but by the faculty of pure intellect, or the non-sensuous reason. Space cannot be imagined as containing, but only Extension as contained. When imagination pictures Extension, reason postulates an underlying and including Space; annihilate Extension, and imagination is paralyzed. Space does not exist at all to the sensuous imagination, which is conversant only with that which exists in Space. But reason asserts that, while Space contains and underlies Extension, it is not the Extension contained; beyond which she is silent. The receptivity of Space, therefore, as an idea of the reason, is simply the negation of matter; and this is the primary and intuitional element of the triple synthesis, on which the other two depend as logical necessities.

The second of the three notions is that of unity. All division of Space into parts is arbitrary and seeming only. Extension, so far as perceivable and conceivable, is indefinitely divisible and separable; Space must be indivisible. For suppose it divided into parts, the parts must either be separated or not separated. If they are not separated, Space is still continuous, and the division is illusory, like that of the earth's surface by parallels and meridians, which serve for convenience of reckoning, but indicate no actual partition. But if they are separated, they must either be separated by matter or by vacuity; whereas Space on the one hand is presupposed by matter, and on the other hand is itself, in the absence of matter, vacuity. Consequently Space must be divided from itself by Space, or, in other words, is not divided at all. Hence we see it involves a logical contradiction not to predicate unity of Space. Now human intelligences can form both an imaginative conception and a rational idea of unity, radically diverse in their characteristics because the products of radically diverse mental faculties. Positive unity is the attribute of a complete, bounded whole, limited in the very fact of its completeness, which can be conceived and grasped as one by the imagination; it necessarily involves, on the one hand, complexity of parts, and, on the other, finitude or limitation; it is the unity of matter which we perceive by the senses, or conceive by the sensuous imagination. Negative unity is the negation of plurality and complexity of parts, and is strictly synonymous with simplicity or indivisibility; it involves necessarily neither finitude nor infinitude, limitation nor illimitation, and is perfectly compatible with either; it cannot be pictured or grasped by the sensuous imagination, and is a purely rational idea; it is the unity which is possessed by mind, and is in fact only the condensation of the proposition, "There are no parts." The imagination, from its nature, can represent only the positive unity of Extension, which is unavoidably conceived as a limited aggregate of parts; whereas the reason, cognizing the negative unity of Space as simply the attribute of indivisibility, discovers no contradiction between the unity and the infinity of Space.

In regard to the unity of Space but two propositions are possible, namely:—

1. Space is many.

2. Space is not-many, i. e. one.

The propositions are contradictory and mutually exclusive. Now the first, affirming the plurality or divisibility of Space, has just been shown to involve in its very statement a logical absurdity; and is therefore set aside. But the removal of one contradictory necessitates the positing of the other; the second proposition, therefore, which, although utterly inconceivable by the sensuous imagination, is not a contradiction in itself, is necessarily established. The negative unity of the reason, which is seen to be the negation of plurality, is the second notion of the triple synthesis.

The third notion is that of infinity. Extension, being only a quality of matter, however vastly extended, must still be extended in Space, and is consequently limited by the Space beyond itself. Extension, being included, is ipso facto limited by the including Space. All limitation of Space, however, is purely arbitrary, and non-inclusive of that which is to be included. For suppose it limited, it must be limited either by matter or by vacuity; but Space is pre-supposed by matter, and is itself, in the absence of matter, vacuity; consequently Space must be limited by Space, or, in other words, is not limited at all, but is uniformly continuous. Hence we see it involves a logical contradiction and absurdity to predicate finitude of Space. But here again it must be noticed that the infinity of Space is not the infinity of the sensuous imagination, which is merely the indefinite expansion of Extension. The putative infinity of the imagination is simply the absence of limitation, whereas the cognized infinity of the reason is the impossibility of limitation. The imagination wears itself in fruitless essays to represent an infinite extension, and gives over its attempt from sheer exhaustion; set a boundary in thought, and, goaded on by reason, which asserts Space still beyond, the faded phantasms of imagination flutter hopelessly onward, until, like Noah's dove, she flies back in awe to her abandoned home. The imagination cannot compass infinity; but the reason can.

In regard to the limitation of Space but two propositions are possible, namely:—

1. Space is limited.

2. Space is unlimited.

These propositions are contradictory and mutually exclusive. Now the first, affirming the limitation of Space, has just been shown to involve a manifest absurdity, and is therefore set aside. But this necessitates the positing of the second, which, although utterly inconceivable by the sensuous imagination, is not contradictory in itself. The infinity of the reason, therefore, which is seen to be simply the absolute negation of limitation, is the third notion of the triple synthesis.

We have thus completed the psychological analysis of the idea of Space as it exists in the human mind. The conclusiveness of the arguments which demonstrate the unity and infinity of Space can only be impugned by impugning the validity of the reductio ad absurdum. The general result may be summed up as follows. We know Space only by negative characteristics, and these are cognized, not by the sensuous imagination, but by the non-sensuous reason. Our idea of it is a triple synthesis, the constituent elements of which are three negative notions—receptivity, unity, and infinity; the first is the negation of matter, the second the negation of divisibility, and the third the negation of limitation. To some one of these three, every other possible predicate of Space may be reduced; hence the analysis is exhaustive. For instance, to the receptivity of Space may be referred its penetrability, incorporeity, incorruptibility, &c.; to its unity may be referred its simplicity, uniformity, &c.; and to its infinity may be referred its immutability, immobility, &c. We have not included necessity in the synthesis, inasmuch as it attaches to the idea of Space as the logical condition of the possibility of Extension, and to each of the three notions as the constituent elements of this necessary idea; but it is not a distinct element in the synthesis.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Flagrantly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

THE PHOTOGRAPH PREMIUMS.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE INDEX:—

In order to enlist a wider co-operation throughout the country in the work of increasing the circulation of our paper, I have at last persuaded Messrs. Abbot, Stevens, Frothingham, Higginson, Potter, and Spencer, to furnish good negative plates to the Index Association from which their photographs can be printed as required. These negatives were taken by the best artists near their respective homes. Mr. Frothingham's negative was taken and the cards printed by Sarony, now the most famous artist in New York. Mr. Abbot's negative was taken, and his as well as all the others' cards were printed, by Mr. W. H. Sherman, of Milwaukee, than whom a better artist cannot be found in America. Mr. Sherman is the inventor of the "Vermilion Bath," which so fixes the lines of the picture that the sun will never cause them to fade, as ordinary photographs will. We have the word of Mr. Sherman that each of these pictures shall be a perfect piece of work, so far as his art can go. The cards are of the size suitable for the album.

The above gentlemen have also kindly consented to write their autograph signatures, either on the cards themselves or on a separate slip of paper, to accompany the photographs.

Those who would like to see THE INDEX circulated more widely can do themselves a pleasure and us a service by sending as many new subscribers as possible, in accordance with the terms of the advertisement of the Index Association.

ASA K. BUTTS.

[In addition to the above, Messrs. Newman and Voysey have kindly forwarded from England negative plates from which their photographs also can be printed. The Board of Directors of the Index Association have agreed to adopt the plan devised by Mr. Butts, and to offer all these photographs as premiums for subscription to THE INDEX, as explained on another page.—ED.]

A RADICAL "GOOD TIME."

The Second Radical Club held its first Anniversary last Monday evening.

The cheerful rooms of the New England Woman's Club were thrown open for the occasion; and, as I entered, such a flood of brilliant light, such a warm glow from open grates, such delicious odor of pure Java, such cheerful voices, and such happy faces and intellectual faces and pure faces, all combined, greeted my senses, that for a moment I thought Radicalism must have gone crazy to have stopped its hard digging after roots and hidden things, and thus turned itself into a gay holiday. But, before the evening closed, I felt convinced it had done just the wisest and most sensible thing a Radical Club could do.

The first business of the evening was the reading of a report from the business committee by Mr. Hineckley, president of the Club. This report stated that this second child is not in the least antagonistic to its older Boston brother, as has been rumored; it is different in character and scope, but the same in final purpose. The principal subjects treated by the Club the past year have been, "Ideal and Historical Christianity," "Immortality," "God as Artist," "Woman Suffrage," and the "Labor Reform." The Committee regret that the Club has not had sufficient funds to employ able students upon scientific questions to present essays, and advise the Club another year to enter upon the realm of science as thoroughly as it has this year upon theology and reform.

The whole number of members belonging was reported to be eighty-three, and the amount of subscriptions received, two hundred dollars.

"They think the Club made a mistake in prohibiting reports of its doings for the press last year, and recommend that reporting be allowed in the future." This brought up a discussion of the reporting system, which was heartily entered into by Mrs. Dall, John Wetherbee, and others. The final business of the meeting was the electing of a board of officers for the ensuing year; after which the members broke up all formality and did the very unradical thing (some will say) of partaking of an excellent collation in the evening. As I passed around among the groups that were laughing and chatting over their coffee cups, plates of ice cream, and cake, I watched just a little, to see what radicals might have to say, and how they would appear when let loose like common mortals; and this I have to report, that I heard so many wise, good, witty, and happy things over these shoulders, that I wanted very much to take out my note book, and catalogue them all, and go home and write a "Radical Chat Book," to teach the world how to talk, and what to talk about. But of course I did not dare to do such a thing, or look the least bit like a reporter; for I had noticed a large show of hands adverse to reporting, when the question was taken and finally carried in favor.

It is marvellous how much at ease, how graceful and happy and comfortable intelligent men and women are when they meet together for a social time like this,—how little trouble the feet have to find a place, or the hands a becoming attitude, or the face a sweet and interesting expression,—how well the ladies' toilet looks, and how finely the gentlemen's coats fit, and how naturally everything flows along.

I often read in the papers, or hear through a friend, of some town's people that are sighing after a Radical Club, but don't know quite how to organize one; and I always wish I could tell those people that it is the easiest thing in the world to do.

Come together, all ye thinking minds, and name to each other the topics you are particularly anxious to investigate. Let some one make a list of your subjects, and appoint that "some one" the president of your club. Then begin at the top of the column, question number one, discuss that in the frankest, kindest, freest manner possible. Do it after your own fashion, and not try to duplicate Boston or New York, or even THE INDEX, though THE INDEX will serve you as a good dictionary to look into quite often. In this way you will establish a Radical Club of your own kind, that will be the best grown-up school you can enter, whose good and educating influence will console your whole lives ever after.

LOUISE S. HOTCHKISS.

Boston, Dec. 12, 1872.

NAMES AND PERSONS.

Boston, Dec., 21, 1872.

DEAR EDITOR:—

I have received warm congratulations, from distant parts, on certain pieces in THE INDEX signed with my initials. So far as the essays have fallen under my eye, I have not wondered they should, in my correspondence, seem to entitle me to such credit. But I feel, in my silence, as if I were having the benefit of stolen goods, like those who in the great Boston fire fugged off such quantities of shoes and dry goods. If your contributor should encounter articles of mine, he or she may fear unjust accusations for ventilating unsound or heretical views: are we not all heretics to each other? I know not what can be done in the premises. Both may have the solace that neither of us is seeking the guilty alias of a thief, or making a false plea of alibi; and we must also be sure that personal identity is no changeling. There can be no doubt at last about the real Dromio. The consequences, good or ill, of our own thought and speech and action will come back to us. Whatever criticism the old Bible may meet, I have heard of no infidel or atheist to question the sharp text—"Be sure your sin will find you out." And, if our character be writ on our thumb-nail, it is in every stroke of our pen. The universe is Argus, full of eyes. Whether we print or not, we shall all be read.

Cordially yours,

C. A. B.

[We have felt the awkwardness of having two contributors with the same initials, but could not see exactly how to prevent confusion without taking undue liberties with the signatures. If the names were subscribed in full, or (in case modesty forbade this) a nom de plume were adopted, all embarrassment would be obviated. We suspect, however, that no one who knew either "C. A. B." would mistake the style for that of the other. Our honored Boston correspondent certainly puts himself into every stroke of the pen.—ED.]

Down among the mountains of Maine lives a rough specimen of a farmer, well-to-do as it goes with his neighbors, but seldom seen at church. A new minister came into the place, and, in calling among the people, happened one day to reach Uncle Luther's just at dinner-time. He was invited to come in, and when dinner was on the table, to "hitch up his chair." When they were all seated, Uncle Luther nudged him under the table and says, "Now touch her off, parson." Had he been about the world less, he would hardly have taken that for an invitation to say grace.

A gentleman was surprised, during the late frosty weather, to see his little daughter bring home from the Sunday-School a grave treatise on "Backsliding." "My child," said he, "this is too old for you, you can't make anything of it." "I know it papa, I thought it would teach me how to slide backwards."

TEA PARTIES.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

Here is a young man who has been seven years in a church-going city—himself a church-goer—and says this is the first time any Christian man has spoken to him about his soul. What does he mean? There are churches in that city, there are Young Men's Christian Associations, to which every young man is again and again and in many ways welcomed. There are ministers who every Sunday are honestly and earnestly trying to point out to their hearers the way of life. Every word spoken was intended for those young men. They had, moreover, the Bible and all the institutions of a Christian city. Every avenue to the kingdom of heaven was as wide open to them as the clergy and the church could open it. No elder of any Church can tell them how to become a Christian any better than they can tell themselves. The Bible is his source of information, and a New Testament can be bought anywhere for twenty-five cents. Instead of censuring the neglect of the churches, I censure the egotism of the young men. It was not that no Christian had spoken to them about their souls, but that no one had taken notice of their special personality. No one had flattered their vanity by addressing them as Mr. Smith and Mr. Brown. They would not join the church until they had been invited to tea.

Many years ago a half-witted negro, called Pompey, was to be hung for having murdered his master. The Sunday before his execution he was taken to church, and sat the sermon through on a stool in the broad aisle. The minister prayed for him very; but when he was returned to his cell, and asked if he heard the prayer, he asserted and insisted that the minister had not prayed for him at all. "He never said 'Poor Pompey.'" The good clergyman was informed of Pompey's incredulity, and in the afternoon he prayed with renewed and real fervor, for "Poor Pompey" by name, to Pompey's great edification and consolation.

Young men in this age and country have no more reason to charge neglect upon church members for not speaking to them about their souls than had Pompey to charge neglect upon his pastor. All their grievance is that the deacons do not say "poor Pompey." They have not been invited to tea. I do not say that the elders shall not, for Christ and the church, invite them to tea, and talk about their souls. If they have no power to reason, if they have no original thought, if they have no conviction and no principle, perhaps there is nothing left but to work upon their emotion. If poor Pompey is helped by the mention of his name to reach feebly up to God, it is a small thing—and yet not small—to name him. But I do say that the young man is egotistic, self-conceited, and as yet very shallow who brings this forward as any reason why he has not joined the church. That is a question for himself to decide. Either it is his duty or it is not. Society furnishes him with every opportunity of enlightenment on the subject. No man has spoken to him about his soul? But has he spoken to any man about his? The church member has no more responsibility for the young man's soul than the young man has for the church member's.—Independent.

The Philadelphia Press is very eulogistic of Senator Sumner. It says—what the Commonwealth has all along endeavored to impress on our impulsive and not always reasoning brethren—that it will not help the cause of the Republican party or General Grant to abuse and disparage Charles Sumner. The Press remarks that "he is one of the grandest historical characters of our time, standing almost alone in the immensity of his intellect and the sublimity of his patriotism and integrity. He is the ideal of a democratic Senator in a republic approaching more nearly the Roman model than any man who lives to-day. His life is a record of absolute fidelity to liberty and human rights—of that rare virtue that clings to right in the absence of reward and at the expense of preferment. In the struggle against slavery and caste he has been the foremost man in America, and through all the mutations of our politics, the apostasy of some leaders and the lukewarmness of others, Charles Sumner has been consistent in his rigid devotion to republicanism in the widest meaning of the term."—Boston Commonwealth.

A Great Comfort to the Sick and Feeble.

THE MAGIC EARTH CLOSET.

The Magic Closet is 19 inches square, and 2 feet 10 inches high.

It is simple in its construction, and the mechanical parts are entirely hid and protected from injury. It is automatic in its action, and deposits the earth exactly where it is needed. Being entirely inodorous, it may be used in any room in the house without offence. When not in use it is a handsome piece of furniture with nothing about it to indicate its purpose.

PRICES.

Pine, plain.....	$16 00
Chestnut, Bl'k Walnut, Trim'd.	20 00
Black Walnut.....	25 00
do Ornamented.....	30 00

Descriptive Pamphlets Free.

THE WAKEFIELD

EARTH CLOSET CO.,

88 Day Street, New York.

LOCAL AGENTS WANTED.

Cultured Free Thought.

The Index Association,

With offices at 142 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 88 Day Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. PROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD F. HOLLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHAS. VOYSEY, London, England.
Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, Weston super Mare, England.
Rev. M. D. CONWAY, London, England.

ASA K. BUTTS is Advertising Agent for the Index Association. All letters to him on business matters, relative to the paper, should be addressed—"THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio."

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $5.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

TOBACCO—By saving that which would be lost in smoke, one may procure the reading of the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL a year at $3, and thus learn what calling in life he may be best fitted for. Young men should try it. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

TO BOOK CANVASSEES—A NEW way of running a book. Can sell thousands per week. Address, MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING CO., 129 East 88th St., N. Y. City.

HERALD OF HEALTH

FOR 1873.

(Three Numbers of 1872 Free to New Subscribers.)

READ WHAT IS SAID BY THE PRESS.

The N. Y. Evening Post says: "We can always commend this journal without qualification."

"It contains," says the Scientific American, "more sensible articles than any other magazine that comes to our sanctum."

A SPLENDID CHROMO,

WORTH $10.00,

Given free to every subscriber. It is an original picture of

A BEAUTIFUL GIRL,

Beautiful in form and face, on a mission of love to the cottage of a poor family. She stands with her supplies of good things knocking at the door, clad in a handsome costume, with a face expressive of the highest qualities the heart possesses, the perfect picture of health and beauty. This chromo is handsomely colored

IN TEN COLORS,

AND

WILL PLEASE AND DELIGHT

all who possess it.

Every Home Should Have One.

It will give daily pleasure, and be a constant lesson of good to every one who looks on it.

Send your subscription for next year at once, and thus obtain the picture to exhibit to others when you are forming a club, and three numbers of 1873 free.

The January number contains a remarkable paper on the

CONDUCT OF LIFE,

written 346 years before Christ by Isocrates, and well worthy the attention of every liberal thinker. The February number will contain a well written article entitled,

The Physiology and Hygiene of Marriage.

The March number will contain an Essay entitled,

Do Mothers Mark their Children?

It is the aim of the publishers to make their journal thoroughly useful and fill it with the productions of sound writers.

In short, the Herald for one year contains matter enough to make eight or ten dollar-and-a-half books, and yet it is sent with a picture worth $10 for the small price of $3.00.

The Herald for 1873 will be

RICH AND ROYAL

With the very best matter from the best writers, and each number will be worth the full subscription price—

$2.00 a Year

(12 cents extra for postage on premium). We will send the HERALD OF HEALTH, with its splendid Chromo, and any $1.50 magazine, or paper, with their premiums, post-paid, for $3.25. The HERALD OF HEALTH and its Chromo, and any $4 magazine, for $5.12, or the Herald and Chromo, and New York Times or Tribune, for $3.50.

Agents wanted. Liberal commissions given. Address

WOOD & HOLBROOK,
15 N. 1st St., New York.

THE WAKEFIELD

EARTH CLOSET.

One of the greatest blessings of the age is the discovery of

THE DRY EARTH SYSTEM,

and in connection therewith a practical method of using the same in Earth Closets and Com modes.

The Wakefield Patent is one of the latest inventions, and has many advantages over all others.

The simple act of closing the lid brings the earth forward, and drops it directly to the center of the pan; thus insuring the absolute certainty of covering all the excrements. This is important.

One hundred of these closets are now in use in Central Park, New York.

Send for Descriptive Pamphlet.

Prices from.....$25 to $40.

THE

Wakefield Earth Closet Co.,
OFFICE and WAREROOMS,

88 Day Street, N. Y.

Back Numbers of The Index

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete set of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-Five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. Abbot; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. Abbot. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

THE EXAMINER.—A limited number of Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 5 will be sent postpaid—the four numbers for sixty cents. Nos. 1, 2, and 3 for 40 cents. Nos. 1 and 2 for 30 cents. No. 1 for 10 cents. What remains of full sets are reserved for binding. Zion's Herald says:—"The boldest heretic of to-day." The Independent says:—"The most pronounced radical in the land." The Chicago Post says:—"Equal to the utterances of Theodore Parker." Address THE EXAMINER, Winnetka, Ill., where the numbers for sale remain.

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,
35 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete Dices of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

THE RICHEST MEN IN AMERICA are no more happy than those who earn their own living, and who read the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, published at $3 a year by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

GOD IN THE CONSTITUTION.

To the Editor of the Commercial:

Can any one read the report of the meeting on page three of the Commercial of February 1, without concluding that the gentlemen who spoke in favor of the movement must be in very earnest? And this being so, should they not be very certain by something more than the present knowledge extant as to God, and his son Jesus Christ, that they are talking of persons with whom they have some degree of acquaintance? How have those men become acquainted with God and his son Jesus Christ? Is it in any other manner than from reading accounts of those persons in the Bible? In that book it is plainly stated, and such statement is as true as any other in it, that "No man has ever seen God." And if no man has ever seen God, and no man for eighteen hundred and forty years has ever seen his son Jesus Christ, why should those hundreds of men whose names figure in that report want to have either of those persons put into the Constitution? What is the object of doing this? Mr. Milligan said simply that this whole movement was not to join "Church and State, but to secure the recognition of God and his son Jesus Christ in the National Constitution." Now who is a big enough fool to believe that this is all Mr. Milligan wants? He knows how it is himself, and yet he tries to bamboozle the public with such a statement as this. Put this recognition in the Constitution, and where will it end and how appear? As a sixteenth amendment or how? If as a sixteenth amendment, it will be different from all other amendments in its having no effect, result, or action, as Mr. Milligan says plainly it is not to have. All he wants is to have it there, and bring there is a dead letter! Very aly, Mr. Milligan, but not very convincing. As the graceful and rhetorical Snapp, M. C., would say: "You can't come it over a pensive public in that cheap way." Amendments to the National Constitution have to have a meaning, and an effect, and a result of some importance, and are not put there as simple objectless nonsense.

Now, suppose you put your God-and-Jesus Christ amendment into writing. Your friend, Mr. Mayo, required Mr. Abbott, of Toledo, to put his protest into writing, and it is but the correct thing to require you to put your amendment into shape; or will you allow me? If so, how will this do?

"Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States assembled, that from and after the passage of this, the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and its adoption by two-thirds of the State Legislatures of the several United States, God and his son Jesus Christ shall be recognized in the Constitution of the United States. Provided, always, that this recognition shall not have any effect or result whatever, either of recognizing or causing a junction of Church and State in any of these United States to any extent, or of working any change whatever to the present condition of religious freedom extant and obtaining in these United States, but simply, and not otherwise, the object one and indivisible of this amendment is to introduce a recognition of God, and his son Jesus Christ, into the Constitution of the United States of America, to the end that certain respectable petitioners for this condition may be satisfied, and their inward craving for this recognition be assuaged."

There; how will that do? I think it covers Mr. Milligan's proposition, and as there was no statement made at the meeting by any person that his proposition was not the correct thing, it therefore must cover the object desired, and I hope it may be adopted.

FAIR PLAY.

CINCINNATI, February 1, 1871.

In this era of investigation, it would be well for the Board which is responsible for our missionaries to Japan to institute an investigation into their conduct. The disgraceful squabble there between two Christian ministers, in which one of them said that the Golden Rule had nothing to do with him, will be remembered. A resident of Yokohama has published a letter, in which he charges two others with beating their wives, and indulging in various disgusting debaucheries, and says that the native priests are using their conduct with telling effect as an argument against their nominal religion. If the converts copy after the converters, the persecution alleged to be now going on in Japan may be but a righteous punishment of sin.—Chicago Tribune.

GOOD BOOKS FOR ALL.

"BOOKS WHICH ARE BOOKS."

Works which should be found in every library—within the reach of all readers. Works to entertain, instruct, and improve. Copies will be sent by return post, on receipt of price.

NEW PHYSIOLOGY; OR, SIGNS OF CHARACTER, AS MANIFESTED THROUGH TEMPERAMENT AND EXTERNAL FORMS, AND ESPECIALLY IN THE "HUMAN FACE BYLINE," with more than One Thousand Illustrations. By S. H. WELLS. Price $1.00.

THE FAMILY PHYSICIAN.—A Ready Prescriber and Hygienic Adviser. With Reference to the Nature, Causes, Prevention, and Treatment of Diseases, Accidents, and Casualties of every kind. With a Glossary and copious Index. By JOEL SAWYER, M. D. Illustrated with nearly 300 Engravings. One large volume, intended for use in the Family. $1.00.

HOW TO READ CHARACTER. A New Illustrated Handbook of Phrenology and Physiognomy, for Students and Examiners, with a chart for recording the sizes of the Organs of the Brain in the Delineation of Character, with upwards of 170 Engravings, latest and best. $1.25.

THE PARENTS' GUIDE; OR, HUMAN DEVELOPMENT THROUGH INHERITED TENDENCIES. By MRS. HAZEN PANDLTON. Second Edition revised and enlarged. One vol. 12mo. Price $1.25.

CONSTITUTION OF MAN: Considered in relation to External Objects. By GEORGE CORNELL. The only authorized American Edition. With Twenty Engravings. $1.75.

THE HYGIENIC HAND BOOK: A Practical Guide for the Sick-Room. Alphabetically arranged with Appendix. By R. T. TAYLOR. One vol. 12mo, 800 pp. Muslin. $2.00.

"HOW TO WRITE," "HOW TO TALK," "HOW TO REMAIN," and "How to do Business," a Hand-Book indispensable for its improvement. In one vol. $2.25.

WEDLOCK; OR, THE RIGHT RELATIONS OF THE SEXES. Disclosing the Laws of Conjugal Selection, and showing who may and who may not marry. A Guide for both Sexes. $1.50.

ORATORY—SACRED AND SECULAR; OR, THE EXTENSIVE SPOKER. Including a Chairman's Guide for conducting Public Meetings according to Parliamentary forms. $1.50.

MANAGEMENT OF INFANCY. Physiological and Moral Treatment. By ANDREW CORNELL, M. D. With Notes. $1.50.

HISTORY OF SALEM WITCHCRAFT: "The Planchette Mystery;" and "Modern Spiritualism," with Dr. Duffbridge's "Dream," in one vol. Price, $1.00.

ROOF'S FABLES. The People's Pictorial Edition. Beautifully illustrated with nearly Sixty Engravings. Cloth, gilt, beveled boards. Only $1.00.

THE RIGHT WORD IN THE RIGHT PLACE. A New Pocket Dictionary and Reference Book. Embracing Synonyms, Technical Terms, Abbreviations, Foreign Phrases, Writing for the Press, Punctuation, Proof Reading, and other Valuable Information. 75 cents.

Inclose amount in a Registered Letter, or in a P. O. Order, for one or for all of the above, and address S. H. WELLS, Publisher, No. 389 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted.

Parturition Without Pain.

A Code of Directions for escaping the Pains of Childbirth. Edited by M. L. HOLBROOK, M. D., Editor of THE HERALD OF HEALTH.

"This Treatise is one of sterling excellence, and should be very widely circulated not only among wives but husbands as well."—The Index.

"Contains suggestions of the greatest value."—Tilton's Golden Age.

"A valuable book for women."—Literary Christian.

"An interesting and plausible argument. The course recommended cannot fail to be beneficial."—Becher's Christian Union.

Price, by mail, $1.00. Agents wanted. Address WOOD & HOLBROOK, 15 Light St., New York.

"The Greatest Luxury in the World."

TURKISH BATHS.

81 & 83 COLUMBIA HEIGHTS, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Three minutes' walk from Fulton Ferry. A series of these Baths will relieve, if not cure, nearly every form of disease. The beauty and simplicity of their action consists in the perfect adaptability, either mild or powerful, of this method of treatment to each and every case. It cleans the body, purifies the blood, and equalizes the circulation, thus arousing dormant functions, and restoring the highest measure of health possible to the individual.

Unnumbered references can be given to cases cured by the Bath, and the proprietor will freely advise with those who desire any information regarding its proper use.

First-class rooms and board at moderate prices. CHARLES H. SHEPARD, M. D.

GOOD FOOD AND GOOD FUEL are indispensable to health and comfort. Good All leading magazines and newspapers are clubbed with the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, at $3, and the SCIENCE OF HEALTH, at $2, by S. H. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BRYANT & BENTLEY,

Manufacturing Jewelers. Rings a specialty. 350 patterned hard solder rings, stamped and warranted 16 carats fine. 18 carat Bracelets, Cameos, Coral, Roman, and engraved sets; Masonic Jewels, &c. No. 13 Maiden Lane, New York (up stairs).

THE BABCOCK

FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against Fire."

SURE, SIMPLE, SELF-ACTING.

Used by the Fire Departments of the principal cities of the Union.

F. W. FARWELL, Secretary, 407 Broadway, New York.

Over Twelve Hundred Actual Fires put out with it.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents Wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than in anything else. Particulars Free. Address G. Silson & Co., Portland, Me.

WANTED—BOK AGENTS

for the

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES; an historical summary of the origin, growth, and perfection of the chief industrial arts of this country. 1,300 PAGES, AND 500 ENGRAVINGS. WRITTEN BY 20 KMINENT AUTHORS, including John B. Gough, Leon Case, Edward Howard, Jos. B. Lyman, Rev. E. Edwin Hall, Horace Greeley, Philip Ripley, Albert Brisbane, F. B. Perkins, etc., etc.

This work is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufacture, etc., in all ages. It is a complete encyclopedia of arts and manufactures, and is the most entertaining and valuable work of information on subjects of general interest ever offered to the public. It is adapted to the wants of the Merchant, Manufacturer, Mechanic, Farmer, Student, and Inventor, and sells to both old and young of all classes. The book is sold by agents, who are making large sales in all parts of the country. It is offered at the low price of $3.50, and is the cheapest book ever sold by subscription. No family should be without a copy. We want Agents in every town of the United States, and no Agent can fail to do well with this book. Our terms are liberal. We give our agents the exclusive right of territory. One of our agents sold 133 copies in eight days; another sold 306 in two weeks. Our agent in Hartford sold 307 in one week. Specimens of the work sent to agents on receipt of stamp. For circulars and terms to agents address the publishers,

J. B. MUNN & HYDE,

Hartford, Conn.,

CHICAGO, ILL., or CINCINNATI, OHIO.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S NEW BOOK.

The Religion of Humanity,

By O. B. Frothingham. Contents.—I. Tendencies; II. God; III. Bible; IV. Christ; V. Atomism; VI. Power of Moral Inspiration; VII. Providence; VIII. Moral Ideal; IX. Immortality; X. Education of Conscience; XI. The Soul of Good in Evil; XII. The Soul of Truth in Error.

One vol., 12 mo. $1.50. Sent free on receipt of price.

DAVID G. FRANCIS, Publisher, 17 Astor Place, New York.

GEORGE BROWN, Late Cashier Toledo Savings Institution.

WM. A. FAUNCE, Late with Henry S. Stebbins.

BROWN & FAUNCE,

BOOKSELLERS,

STATIONERS,

AND DEALERS IN

Window and Wall Papers,

(Successors to Henry S. Stebbins.)

115 SUMMIT STREET, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Keep constantly on hand a fine stock of standard and current literature, embracing books upon Science, Art, and Religion, and are in receipt of new books from publishers as fast as issued. Books sent by mail post-paid on receipt of publishers' price, and promptly ordered when not in stock.

Out-of-date and rare books furnished when procurable in this country or in England. Orders by mail solicited.

ROBERT WALLIN,

No. 453 North Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., keeps on hand a variety of LITERAL BOOKS AND PAPERS—THE INDEX, and Index Tracts; also, an assortment of Stationery.

YOUR WIFE OR YOUR SWEET-HEART would thank you for a beautiful lady's gold watch; good time-keepers. Why not make her a present of one? A few subscribers for the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, at $3 each; for SCIENCE OF HEALTH, at $2 each, will secure one from the makers through S. H. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,

DEALER IN

NEW AND OLD BOOKS,

17 Astor Place, and 140 8th St., New York.

Priced catalogues of books in stock, issued from time to time, will be forwarded free to any address.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy. Published Quarterly in St. Louis, Mo. It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription,

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume is mailed, will be sent post-paid by mail for $3.00.

Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V., in mail, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

Box 3938, St. Louis, Mo.

A TREASURE—NOT TRASH.—The PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, for 1871, will contain just such information relating to "self culture," as every individual, old and young, ought to read. It is only $3 a year. S. H. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

GUNS FOR THE PEOPLE

Breech-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $200. Double-Barrel Shot-Guns, $8 to $150. Single Guns, $3 to $20. Breech-Loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers, $8 to $25. Pistols, 75c. to $5. Gun material, fixtures, and ammunition of every kind very cheap. Send Stamp for Large Illustrated and Descriptive Price-List to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Samuel Johnson's Work on In-

dis. Sent on receipt of price, $5.00.

Address S. H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

Send to same address for Catalogue of other scientific and religious works.

KELLER, SAITER, & CO.,

Manufacturers of RICH JEWELRY. STONE CAMO sets a specialty. Office, 12 Maiden Lane, Factory, Blocker St., cor. Bowery, New York.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH.

The first volume having been sustained beyond expectation, the Publishers are prepared with additional facilities for making the next volume respond more fully to the popular demand for an independent HEALTH MONTHLY. Ample arrangements have been made to render each department a welcome and instructive visitant to the reader, and educate the people in all that relates to PREVENTING AND REPAIRING HEALTH.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH will not be the organ of any person, business, or institution, but an independent, earnest Teacher of the Laws of LIFE AND HEALTH; the exponent of all known means by which HEALTH, STRENGTH, and LONG LIFE may be attained, by using and regulating those agencies which are vitally related to HEALTH and the treatment of DISEASES on strictly hygienic principles.

TERMS.—$2.00 a year; Single numbers, 25c. ten copies, $15.00, and an extra copy to agent.

Please address S. H. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, New York.

YOUNG MEN AND YOUNG WOMEN who would know what they are good for, what they can do best should read the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. A new volume begins with Jan. No., and may be ordered at once from S. H. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

NEW TRACTS!

INTENDED TO TEACH RELIGION WITHOUT SUPERSTITION.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 7.

SECOND SERIES.....No. 8 to No. 15.

Either Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cents.

Address CHAS. E. WHIFFLE,

19 PRICKNEY ST., BOSTON.

Hall's Magic Shade Fixtures!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the Window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PRIVACY in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for Inside Blinds. Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY.

145 SOUTH CLINTON ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

F. J. SCOTT, J. H. STOPPLET

ARCHITECTS,

72 MADISON STREET (Near Boody House), TOLEDO, OHIO.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, JANUARY 11, 1873.

WHOLE No. 159.

HOW IS YOUR HEALTH?

If good, you are living right; if not, you should study the Laws of Life and Health by reading the

SCIENCE OF HEALTH.

a new and thoroughly practical Health Journal. Its teachings are based on Hygienic Principles, promoting the best interests of the individual, the Nation, and the Race. The SCIENCE OF HEALTH is independent of medical schools or sects, and seeks only to teach the reader "how to live" so as to regain and retain Health.

A GOOD NUMBER.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH for January contains matters interesting and important to all readers. Ladies should read "What My Corsets Cost Me," Early Marriages will interest both sexes; Holiday Dishes, What to Select and How to Cook, a timely article, looking to luxurious and healthful meals; Dress of Uncivilized Women; Three Classes of American Boys, with Illustrations; Popular Physiology, with Illustrations; Ague and Fever, the Cause and Cure; Scarletina; Bronchitis; Health of Teachers; Women Doctors. In answer to correspondents, we have—How to Feed the Baby; Gray Hair; Sick Headache; Bilious Fever and Ague; Magnetic Waters. Concluding with Excellent Health Lectures, touching Cold Feet; Headache; Cramps; Lumbago; Heartburn; Dyspepsia; Neuralgia; Palpitation; Impure Blood; Corns and Bunions; Bowel Complaints; Constipation; Sleep, etc.; with remarks on "Prayer and Medication." makes a capital number with which to begin the new volume and the new year. Price 30 cents, or $2 a year.

Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THE (ORIGINAL) CONTINENTAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.,

of Hartford, Conn. Incorporated May, 1869.

SAM'L E. ELMORE, President,
JOHN S. RICE, Vice President,
FRANCIS D. DOUGLASS, Secretary,
H. E. MORLEY, Actuary.

THE CONTINENTAL especially commends itself, by its past experience and present management, to those who desire to place their insurance in a conservative company, conducted on the principle of furnishing RELIABLE and ABSOLUTE INSURANCE at as REASONABLE COST as is consistent with PERFECT SECURITY.

25 A few first-class Agents wanted for unoccupied fields.

BABCOCK FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against fire."

USED BY

RAILROADS,
STEAMBOATS,
HOTELS,
FACTORIES,
ASYLUMS,
FIRE DEPARTMENTS, ETC.

F. W. FARWELL, Sec'y,
407 Broadway, New York.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

The Science of a New Life.

By JOHN COWAN, M. D. A radical work on Sexual Physiology and the laws necessary to the denervation of the Human Race. Recommended and endorsed by O. B. Frothingham, Dr. Die Lewis, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, and other prominent ministers, physicians, religious and secular writers. Every copy sold helps in the direction of the coming "millennium." Agents wanted everywhere. Send for circulars. Sold only by subscription and by the Publishers, COWAN & CO., 139 Fifth St., New York.

A GREAT OFFER! HOLIDAYS!

HORACE WATERS, 481 BROADWAY, N. Y., will dispose of 100 Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of three first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during the HOLIDAYS. First-class Pianos, modern Improvements, for $275 cash. The Concerto Parlor Organs are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Price, for 6 stops, $185, 70 stops, $325 and $350 cash. Other Organs and Melodeons for $45 and upwards for cash. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

J. F. HUGGLES, BIBLIOPOLY,
J. BARNES, MICHIGAN, Dealer in English and American Free Thought Literature.

GOOD BOOKS FOR ALL.

"BOOKS WHICH ARE BOOKS."

Works which should be found in every Library—within the reach of all readers. Works to entertain, instruct, and improve. Copies will be sent by return post, on receipt of price.

NEW PHYSIOGNOMY: or, Signs of Character, as manifested through Temperament and External Form, and especially in the "Human Face Divine," with more than One Thousand Illustrations. By S. R. WELLS. Price $3.00.

THE FAMILY PHYSICIAN.—A Ready Prescriber and Hygienic Adviser. With Reference to the Nature, Cause, Prevention, and Treatment of Diseases, Accidents, and Casualties of every kind. With a Glossary and copious Index. By JOSEPH SHAW, M. D. Illustrated with nearly 300 Engravings. One large volume, intended for use in the Family. $4.00.

HOW TO READ CHARACTER. A New Illustrated Handbook of Phrenology and Physiognomy, for Students and Examiners, with a Chart for recording the sizes of the Organs of the Brain in the Delineation of Character, with upwards of 170 Engravings, latest and best. Muslin, $1.35.

THE PARENTS' GUIDE: or Human Development through Inherited Tendencies. By Mrs. HAZEL FENDLETON. Second Edition revised and enlarged. One vol. 12mo. Price $1.50.

CONSTITUTION OF MAN: Considered in relation to External Objects. By GEORGE COMBE. The only authorized American Edition. With Twenty Engravings, $1.75.

THE HYGIENIC HAND-BOOK: A Practical Guide for the Sick-Room. Alphabetically arranged with Appendix. By R. T. TRALL. One vol. 12mo, 300 pp. Muslin. $2.00.

"HOW TO WRITE," "HOW TO TALK," "HOW TO BEHAVE," and "How to do Business," a Hand-Book indispensable for Home Improvement. In one vol. $2.25.

WEDLOCK: or, the Right Relations of the Sexes. Disclosing the Laws of Conjugal Selection, and showing who may and who may not Marry. A Guide for both Sexes. $1.50.

ORATORY—SACRED AND SECULAR: or, the extemporaneous Speaker. Including a Chairman's Guide for conducting Public Meetings according to Parliamentary forms. $1.50.

MANAGEMENT OF INFANCY: Physiological and Moral Treatment. By ANDREW COMBE, M. D. With Notes. $1.50.

HISTORY OF SALEM WITCHCRAFT: "The Planchette Mystery;" and "Modern Spiritualism," with Dr. Doddridge's "Dream," in one vol. Price, $1.00.

JOSEPH'S FABLES. The People's Pictorial Edition. Beautifully illustrated with nearly Sixty Engravings. Cloth, gilt, beveled boards. Only $1.00.

THE RIGHT WORD IN THE RIGHT PLACE. A New Pocket Dictionary and Reference Book. Embracing Synonyms, Technical Terms, Abbreviations, Foreign Phrases, Writing for the Press, Punctuation, Proof-Reading, and other Valuable Information. 75 cents.

Enclose amount in a Registered Letter, or in a P. O. Order, for one or for all of the above, and address S. R. WELLS, Publisher, No. 389 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted.

THE BUTLER HEALTH LIFT.

LEWIS G. JONES, MANAGER.

Principal Office—New York,
Park Bank Building, 214 Broadway.

ALSO,

BROOKLYN, 138 REMSEN STREET.

"This kind of exertion not only increases muscular power but refreshes exhausted nervous energy."—H. D. NOYES, M. D., Professor in Bellevue Medical College.

Apparatus for private use of the most perfect construction, and at the most reasonable prices. Refer to Rev. O. B. Frothingham, Rev. Dr. Bartol, D. S. Rogers, and many others.

Visitors Always Welcome.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S NEW BOOK.

The Religion of Humanity,

By O. B. Frothingham. Contents.—I. Tendencies; II. God; III. Bible; IV. Christ; V. Atonement; VI. Power of Moral Inspiration; VII. Providence; VIII. Moral Ideal; IX. Immortality; X. Education of Conscience; XI. The Soul of Good in Evil; XII. The Soul of Truth in Error.

One vol., 12 mo. $1.50. Sent free on receipt of price.

DAVID G. FRANCIS, Publisher,
17 Astor Place, New York.

MUSICAL GIFT BOOKS!

"Gems of Strauss."

The "Gem" of the season is having a remarkable sale. Contains all of Strauss' best music; 250 large pages.

"Musical Treasure,"

Latest collection of choicest Vocal and Piano Music.

"Wreath of Gems,"

Entirely Vocal Music. Songs, Ballads, Duets, etc.

"Piano Forte Gems,"

Entirely Piano Music, Nocturnes, Dance Music, etc.

Price of any of the above, $1.50; or, in Full Gift, $4.

MUSICAL LITERATURE.

Mozart (by H. Ran) $1.75	Rossini (life of) $1.75
Beethoven (life of) 2.00	Schumann (life of) 1.75
Mendelssohn, (life of) 1.75	Gottschalk, (life of) 1.50
Chopin (life of) 1.75	Polko's Musical Sketches 1.75
Beethoven's, Mozart's, Mendelssohn's Letters, each 1.50	Ritter's History of Music 1.50
Moore's Encyclopedia of Music 6.00

Any one of the above sent, post-paid, for retail price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

The Illustrated Phrenological

JOURNAL. This Magazine has been before the public so long and become so well established, that the Publisher hardly feels called upon to more than announce a new volume. Its name has become a household word in all parts of the country. It will as heretofore be devoted to all that will improve men Physically, Mentally, and Morally. Containing all that is new on PHRENOLOGY, or the Brain and its Functions; ETHNOLOGY, or the Natural History of Man; PSYCHOLOGY, or the Signs of Character exhibited in the human Face and Form; PSYCHOLOGY, or the Science of the Soul; SOCIOLOGY, or Man in his Private and Public Relations; HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY, or Man in the Past and in the Present.

TERMS.—$3.00 a year. Single Numbers, 50 cents; Ten Copies, $3.00, and an extra copy to agent.

PROMISES.—Besides the above Club Rates, we are offering the most liberal Promises, a List of which will be sent on application. LOCAL AGENTS wanted everywhere and cash commissions given. Please address

S. R. WELLS Publisher,
389 Broadway, New York.

Are You Going to New York?

If so, and you wish to stop where you can FEEL AT HOME, and get GOOD FOOD HEALTHFULLY PREPARED and PLENTY OF IT.

Go to the Hygienic Institute,

Nos. 13 & 15 Light Street.

Here Cars pass near the door to all parts of the city, making it a very convenient stopping place for persons visiting New York, either upon business or pleasures. Open at all hours, day and night. Board by the day or week, at reasonable rates. Rooms can be secured in advance by writing.

Address
WOOD & HOLBROOK, Prop'rs,
Nos. 13 and 15 Light Street, New York.

HEALTH, EXERCISE, AND

LIFTING CURE. 229 FIFTH AVENUE. "As a means of retaining and, in certain chronic cases of disease, of regaining health, I regard it as of GREAT VALUE."—F. J. BUMSTEAD, M. D., College of Physicians and Surgeons.

"Admirable in its results, and of the greatest benefit to those frames weakened and diseased by civic life and sedentary habits."—Edward Bayard, M. D.

Parents who have feeble children can have them placed under our care with the assurance that all we can do to make them robust will be done.

Send stamp for a circular.
M. L. HOLBROOK, M. D.,
229 Fifth Ave., New York.
Refer to Cyrus W. Field, Asa K. Butts, O. B. Frothingham, E. P. Dutton.

HARLAN P. HYDE.

REAL ESTATE AGENT,

AND

Negotiator of Mortgages.

95 1-2 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

"THE GALAXY" is about as near perfection as anything can be."—Daily Register, New Haven, Conn.

THE GALAXY

FOR 1873.

It is the best American Magazine. No family can afford to do without it. It gives more good and attractive reading matter for the money than any other periodical or book published.

THE LEADING NEWSPAPERS PRONOUNCE

THE GALAXY

The Best and most Ably Edited American Magazine.

THE GALAXY

Meets the Wants of Every Member of the family.

It contains thoughtful articles by our ablest writers.

It contains sketches of life and adventure.

It has serial stories by our best novelists.

It has short stories in each number.

The new department of SCIENTIFIC MISCELLANY appears in each number.

What the Leading Papers say.

"First of all in attractions we place 'The Galaxy.'"—Standard, Chicago.

"Well sustains its reputation for vigorous and racy writing."—N. Y. Tribune.

"The Galaxy" is always more a magazine than any, and more varied in its range than any other."

—Independent.

"A model periodical; a credit to American periodical literature."—Philadelphia Press.

"There is not a dull page between its covers."—N. Y. Times.

"The variety of its contents, their solid worth, their brilliancy, and their great interest make up a general character of great excellence for every number."—Fort, Boston.

"Always ably edited, and remarkable for the good judgment displayed in the selection of current topics for discussion. In this way quite eclipses the more conservative periodicals of the day."—Boston Journal, Mass.

"We are inclined to believe that more down-right good literature is crowded between the covers of 'The Galaxy' than any other American magazine can boast of."—Chicago Times.

"Sheldon & Company have opened a mine of interest in their magazine, 'The Galaxy,' by drawing to it the communications of prominent public men upon questions of general interest."—Age, Philadelphia.

"The reported increase in the circulation of 'The Galaxy' is hardly to be wondered at, for it is certainly the best of American magazines."—Express, Buffalo, N. Y.

"The Galaxy" is one of the fullest, and, taken altogether, richest, of the many monthlies which have given such an enviable name to our American magazine literature."—Sunday-School Times, Philadelphia, Pa.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

PRICE 25 CTS. PER NUMBER.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $4.00 per year.

CLUBBING TERMS.

THE GALAXY will be sent for the year 1873 with any one of the following Periodicals at the prices named: With "Harper's Weekly," or "Harper's Bazar," or Appleton's Journal," $7; the regular price is $8. With "Every Saturday," $8; regular price $9. With "Our Young Folks," $5.00; regular price $6. With "Little's Living Age," $10; regular price, $12. Address

SHELDON & COMPANY,

677 Broadway, New York.

New England Thought!

JOURNAL OF PROGRESS AND REFORM,

"THE COMMONWEALTH,"

OF BOSTON, MASS.,

Now in its ELEVENTH YEAR, gives a cordial recognition to all the progressive movements of the age, and with its attention mainly upon

POLITICS,

LITERATURE,

ART AND NEWS,

has free and unobscured columns for their elucidation. $3.00 to Boston subscribers; $3.50 to mail subscribers. Send for specimen copies.

CHAS. W. SLACK & SON, Publishers,
25 Brimfield St., Boston.

A SWEET, PURE BREATH DEpends on certain bodily conditions, which are explained in THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH, a new independent Health monthly, at $2 a year. Published by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

THE INDEX.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

Published by the Index Association at No. 142, St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio, with Branch Office at No. 36, Day Street, New York City.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. PROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.
M. D. CONWAY, England.

THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A new LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MONSE, late editor of the RADICAL, whose EVENING NOTES will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 36, Day Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. F. DINWIDDIE, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post office money order.

Address THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A UNIQUE PREMIUM.

Photographs and Autographs

OF

LEADING WRITERS

OF

THE INDEX.

O. B. PROTHINGHAM.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

W. J. POTTER.

W. H. SPENCER.

F. W. NEWMAN.

CHAS. VOYSEY.

A. W. STEVENS.

F. E. ABBOT.

☞ The PHOTOGRAPH of any ONE of the above-named persons will be mailed post-paid to any NEW subscriber who shall remit $3.00 for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

☞ To any one who shall send a list of names of from one to eight NEW subscribers and $3.00 for each, a corresponding number of Photographs shall be mailed post-paid, to be given to these subscribers; and the same number of Photographs shall also be mailed, post-paid, as premium to the sender himself.

☞ To any one who shall send $3.00 for three years' subscription to THE INDEX in advance, a full set of the Photographs shall be mailed post-paid.

☞ The Autograph of each of the above American writers will in all cases accompany the corresponding Photograph; but no Autograph can be sent with the Photograph of the English writers.

☞ These Photographs are well executed, are not on sale anywhere, and can be obtained in no other way. In offering them as premiums, the INDEX ASSOCIATION rely on the good will and active co-operation of all friends of THE INDEX.

☞ All orders for Photographs and remittances of money should be addressed to

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admit them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. PROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER MILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. PROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Third Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 1 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

Address, THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LAW, BETT AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "Does Religion represent a PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A FENESIBLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Prothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Saver, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 25 cents; 10 packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

positive (not merely or chiefly negative) explanations of our name. By name, because the simple name tells all of our story that most men care at first to hear. If we think the words "Christ" and "Christianity" really belong to us, let us openly claim that they do, and give the reason for our claim, that others may understand the new preciousness which liberal thinkers have found in the old mine. If not, let us openly tell of the greater preciousness that lies for us beyond these names. "Are you a radical?" Yes. "Are you outside of Christianity in the senses meant by all the churches?" Yes. "Well, then, what do you radicals think of God and Life and Providence?" That is a fair question, the very one we invite, the one we want to have asked in earnest, the one we are bound to give as plain an answer to as we can. In using those great words common to all religiousness, let us try to know distinctly what we do think, and then speak out humbly but firmly, that others may catch the vision that makes us glad,—speak, confessing all our ignorance and the limitations of human thought, but affirming our positive thought inside of the limitations, and, if we have it, the boundless trust that stretches beyond all thought into the unknown. Clearer thought possible is duty to others. Clear thought, right or wrong, is the kind that helps progress most. Loyalty to facts and to logic, and plain confessions of ignorance, are the ethics of the intellect; and society lives by these ethics as well as by those that rule our human sympathies.

Once more and still more should we avoid what is called the exoteric and the esoteric way,—thinking one thinking and speaking another,—thinking a whole and speaking a half,—thinking clearly for oneself, and speaking vaguely for the sake of that babe, the public, who cannot bear our strong meat. Here lies no small temptation to really noble minds. It is easy to become an unconscious traitor to truth out of sympathy and genuine desire to help. You may long to uplift men, immediately, visibly, by your word, yet sadly feel that the most effective lever to uplift them from the place they are in is some doctrine which others can use sincerely, but not you. In that case we must remember that, as we are not deceived into taking visible leverage-power as the test of the highest truth, so we must not be lured into taking it as index to our post of service to the truth. Let only true hands serve each lever; and never fear that such hands will not abound for every lever that society may need. I doubt if moral service can be rendered save by sincere men. The apparent demand for insincerity from any man shows that he has not yet found his post at which to help. Certainly it must hurt one's power of seeking more truth thus to disown one's vision of it; and probably after all one is never so far ahead of his time that he will not help it most by telling out the whole truth that he sees. Not only clearest thought, but also clearest declaration of one's thought, is a duty that we owe to society. Offence comes seldom by too much sincerity, seldom by too much sympathy, but very often by sincerity without sympathy, and very often also by sympathy without sincerity.

This brings us close to our question.

TWO KINDS OF DISTINCTNESS: NEGATIVE AND POSITIVE.

For how shall we make our thought distinct? Shall we imitate the spirit we were just describing? To speak of literature alone, the early Protestants used the coarsest weapons to make good their stand against Catholicism; the Unitarian controversy of fifty years ago is said to have shown on both sides much invective and denunciation. Are we to renew that policy; or, in this day and for this larger thought of ours, is some nobler policy permitted? Must we be predominantly negative in order to be sufficiently distinct and positive? Must we be strongly aggressive in order to be progressive?

THE BRAHMO-SOMAJ.

Let me put before you two examples drawn from fact, and from to-day, and from this very movement of religious thought. In Hindustan a little sect of pure Theists, called the Brahmo-Somaj, has begun. This new Church of Hinduism rises in the midst of a popular national faith full of superstition and idolatry and the spirit of caste. It has abandoned the Vedas as a book of divine authority, and takes for the basis of its faith "God's revelation in Nature and in the religious instincts of man." Were Chunder Sen, its leading prophet, here, you would understand and sympathize with every thought he uttered, and feel its deep religiousness. Two or three years ago he opened a new house of worship in Calcutta; and what I quote is taken from the formal declaration of principles by which that church is guided:—

"No created object shall be worshipped here.
"No man or inferior being or material object shall be worshipped here as identical with God or like unto God or as an incarnation of God; and no prayer or hymn shall be offered or chanted unto or in the name of any one except God.
"No carved or painted image, no external symbol which has been or may hereafter be used by any sect for the purpose of worship or the remembrance of a particular event, shall be preserved here."

This is all exceedingly distinct; no shade of compromise. Then the declaration goes on to say:—

"No created being or object that has been or may hereafter be worshipped by any sect shall be ridiculed or contemned in the course of the divine service to be conducted here.

"No book shall be acknowledged or revered as the infallible Word of God; yet no book which has been or may hereafter be acknowledged by any sect to be infallible shall be ridiculed or contemned.

"No sect shall be vilified, ridiculed, or hated."

THE INDEX.

This is one answer to our question about attitude. The other example drawn from the same religious movement as it is going on in our land, where Brahma is called God and the Vedas give place to the Bible, is Frank Abbot's newspaper, THE INDEX. Many of you know it. Abbot has one of the ablest, clearest-thinking heads in our country, and one of the truest hearts,—is brave and utterly sincere, and is in live earnest in his unselfish work. That work is the impeachment and destruction of Christianity; he calls on all not only to come outside of Christianity, but to be anti-Christians, and to oppose in every fair way an influence which now, in his opinion, is working more harm than good. He says that for himself he shall "use every weapon in the armory of thought that is not dipped in malice or falsehood,"—not only argument, persuasion, and appeal, but sarcasm and ridicule as well, in his warfare upon the Christian system. He keeps his word, and in all his ringing onsets is fair even to chivalry, I think. One may not assent to his view of Christianity; but it is that which the vast majority of the Church always has accepted and now accepts as its definition,—the religious system organized around belief in the specific authority or influence of Christ. Those of us who cannot help regarding it as the true view of Christianity, and who therefore cannot regard "Christianity" as the deepest and broadest religious truth of the day,—all such, I should think, must find themselves at last with Abbot, outside of Christianity.

Must they be Anti-Christians also? I think so, because every man would like to help others to that which is light and growth and strength and joy to him.

But must they be Anti-Christians in Abbot's way? Is his method of helping the most effective method? Must we war against the faith from which we have passed out ourselves? And use sarcasm and ridicule against it? And is it true that Christianity to-day is doing more harm than good?

RELIGIOUS AGGRESSIVENESS WRONG FOR RADICALS.

I think this method is not essentially wrong, but very wrong in and by its emphasis. And the question of method in all reforms is very largely a question of emphasis.

Grant, reiterate, that the new thought must be made distinct at all events; grant that for distinctness some negation will be required; grant that in all the reforms both kinds of men appear, the trumpet-voiced denouncers and those whose word is as the clear, calm shining of the light, and that both kinds do good, although not equally good, service; grant also that, apart from any specific thought itself, the principle of free thinking needs sturdy guards because it is the highway of all progress for humanity; and yet I think that this method is wrong. For four reasons:—

THE FIRST REASON.

Because its emphasis practically neglects one-half of the fact of Evolution; and yet Evolution is the central recognition of the new system of thought. It is in allegiance to that idea that we have to give up the dear old name of our mother faith, and seem to set ourselves absurdly against the millions that surround us, because "Christianity" specifically denies Evolution in reference to its own origin, and by so much casts off faith in Nature. Thorough Radicalism is nothing but thorough Evolutionism. Each is a word that affirms growth everywhere. Radicalism says, "Roots." Evolutionism says, "New Outcome from the Roots." And thorough faith in Evolution will never adopt an emphasis that slights either the old or the new part in this fact of growth. An attitude of sharp antagonism to Christianity will seem to make the new thought more distinct, but it would be a distinctness false to Nature, and so would certainly hurt the cause we have at heart.

"Its emphasis neglects one-half of the great fact." I mean literally that. Although the Universe moves so altered before our eyes that a new name is wanted in religion, yet our new thought is but fulfilment of Christian thought. Radicalism denies Christian doctrines by affirming them in a far larger sense than Christianity. Where Christianity sees a single instance and makes a doctrine of the supernatural out of it, radicalism sees a law, which enters into her scheme of the natural. Christianity says, One incarnation; radicalism makes it universal and the grand truth of human nature. Christianity says, Adam's fall and inherited sin; radicalism looks with eyes more and more intent and awestruck and full of hope on the grand law by which body and mind and conscience pass down the generations by inheritance, till they gather in the curse that eliminates itself from visible being, and gather in the blessedness of

"Man and woman, Diviner, but still human."

Christianity says, One vicarious atonement; radicalism sees a vast law binding man to man by which no one lives unto himself or dies unto himself, no one sins and no one wins haloes by himself, but all vicariously bear each other's burden and each other's joy. Christianity says, One mediator; radicalism sees in every better person than oneself a mediator between him and the Highest, a real uplifting presence. Christianity says, Eternal punishment; so does radicalism, and adds the vision that it subverts the end of higher life and of eternal progress. Christianity sees a Trinity, God three in one; radicalism grows still before the abiding mystery of the All in one!

These are but examples. All through there is close vital connection between the two sets of ideas, the old and the new. The new destroys the old by fulfilling it into something larger, truer, more glorious. We have not one thought original in the sense of being undervived from Christian preparations,—just as nothing in Christianity itself came save from preparations.

Of course this fact is trite enough for general allowance. It is axiomatic,—if you think of it. But axioms are important, and this is half of the great evolution-truth; and as such it should be constantly and strongly urged, not slighted, by the attitude and emphasis of radicals. With all respect to able men, I should think they were not thorough radicals, consistent evolutionists, who use a method that does not keep this fact prominent. It seems to compel radicalism to sympathy instead of a war-cry all through its anti-Christian effort; to compel the spirit of brotherhood in the party that is especially devoted to the spirit of truth-seeking; compels it—does not leave it as a thing desirable if it can be, but makes it a thing that must be, in order that one may be truest to the truth. When the spirit of truth becomes perfect, by the principle of evolution, it leads to and includes the spirit of love. Is not that a sign that the religion of evolution will be noble?

And when we keep in mind this fact that our thought fulfils the Christian thought, it will make us recognize to the credit of Christianity that that name stands actually for much wider truths than it can logically stand for. Many faiths are larger than their creeds or names imply. Somewhat as kindly Christians say of radicals, "You are Christians still," so we may, must, say of Christianity, that it teaches a great deal of good radicalism, and not incoherently either; only, as we think, incoherently. It is all the time fulfilling itself in this way without the change of name, by a natural process that can be witnessed in the history of every reformation. There is not much real difference between those on the verge of Christianity who stretch forward and embrace the new ideas, and those who stand outside more distinctly among these ideas but have to, and are glad to, own connection with the past. These latter think it will be found that "Christianity" cannot advance far beyond its present extreme and still be "Christianity." But the Christians are progressive, and for all this such men as Beecher and Stopford Brooke, and some of the more liberal Unitarians, who are not "radicals," are the great radicalizers of the day. This ought to be remembered in taking our "attitude."

With it also another truth, resulting from the evolution-fact (I speak it still more humbly) that all cannot be radicals in thought to-day and be religious. To-day, I say; right off. To vast multitudes the ideas of Christianity bring motive, and courage, and trust, and joy, to whom our ideas would bring nothing of the kind. The inspiration that comes from ideas depends largely on birth and culture, still more largely on intellectual atmosphere. I do not doubt that a radical with a deep sense of God—a sense such as Jesus had—could stand anywhere and make men feel the Presence; make them "see that his eyes saw God;" but in many quarters this is nearly all that a radical can do by direct word for religiousness. We need not be sad about this incapacity, nor doubt our truth, nor feel that it can do nothing as a religion for the masses of our people. In other quarters multitudes are ready, are longing for it; or at least for something more true in its ideas than the special emphases of Christianity. The phenomenon of unchurched Spiritualism shows that. If we have not what the seekers need, we at least are sure to help them in their search. But radicalism has more ways than preaching by which to spread its Gospel; and besides, as was just said, its preaching is not committed simply to one set of men.

Is Christianity now doing more harm than good? For a very long time yet, I think, that question cannot be answered with a yes. Much harm or little, however, if we have something better we should urge it, but in a spirit that takes into account all facts of human nature and society.

The first reason, then, for doubting the right of the aggressive method is, that by its emphasis it slights in this way one-half of the fact of evolution.

THE SECOND REASON.

The second reason against the method of violence is that its negative emphasis takes off the strength of radicals and the attention of others from our positive thought; and that of course is the important part of one's thought. In other words, the aggressive method fails, I think, in attending in the best way to the other half, also, of the evolution-fact—the half that affirms a new growth. It fails in the very point on which it so insists—distinctness. It is so distinct as to what is not the truth, that it loses time and force for making distinct what is the truth.

What are our better ideas? What is our brighter glory? To know that, people very naturally wait before they leave their old mansions of faith. Would that our best brains would work harder to answer these questions,—to broaden, clear, proportion, and systematize our thought about the universe, its God, its life, its providence, its immortality, its children, its moral laws! He who can best fit the evolution theory of all Nature to the religious sentiments of human nature will be the prophet of the New Era. The people in the churches want to have that done. The unchurched people need to have that done, that they may again organize themselves around an enthusiasm. The rough unfinished radicals need to have that done, to get by their crude thought. All of us need to have it done, that we may catch more of the coming inspiration.

"Free Religion," we say. Freedom,—yes, that is the roadway, the opportunity. But the road to what, the opportunity for what? What is the religion? That is the question. The best way merely to stand for the free thinking is to show what noble results the freedom leads to. A man's weight in religiousness is in proportion to the degree in which he can say, it is. Distinctness is not necessarily dogmatism. Through many may-bees to one it is the deeper seers go, who again stand in our midst, astonishing and blessing us, as those who speak with new authority. Truth spreads by holding it up, so that all can see it,—by naming it, by explaining it, by illustrating it, by applying it in life and in society, by being martyrs for it if need be; and so convincing men that a Gospel has come to them. This is no slight task, demands no slight sacrifice, allows no silence, no compromise, no selfish indifference, waiting without working; and I think it is more helpful to progress, because more affirmative and so more really distinct than the aggressive method leaves one strength or time or heart or brain to be.

THE THIRD REASON.

The third reason is closely akin to the first two and follows naturally from them. The emphasis of this aggressive method, by neglecting both parts of the fact of evolution, practically disowns the method of evolution. It does not aim to destroy by fulfilling, but rather to destroy that it may fulfil. The process is conceived as two, not one; and first in the process comes destruction. Its favorite phrase would seem to be destruction and re-construction; terms borrowed not from organic life, but from the old theory of creation, that of manufacture. Brick walls may be pulled down and reconstructed; political platforms can be pulled to pieces and reconstructed; governments we sometimes attempt to reconstruct; but the attempt is apt to fail, and we have to leave the work after all to Nature with her vital processes. Even leaves drop by very gentle violence to make room for new ones of the same kind. But the thought that best applies here (for we speak of advancing and not simply of recurring growth) is that leaves are destroyed by being transformed, transfigured, fulfilled into petals and flower-organs. Ideas are at least as vital, as organic, as the plants. They are destroyed most naturally by being fulfilled in larger truths,—truths more beautiful. Much violence hinders their growth. Why, we are hardly reasoned into, much less knocked into, our beliefs or out of them. The process is long, slow, gradual. We have to do much more than take away or set up an object to be looked at; we have to evoke eyesight in the lookers—to win, not an argument, but the arguer; a very different thing. Our chance to win minds is always closely proportioned to the use we make of the common standpoint. The more connection we can honestly keep with the past, and yet be perfectly distinct as to our own actual position, the better our chance of helping.

There must be some pounding, however, in every religious reform, to start it," says a friend. Well, tell me just whom it helps. The bigots? It maddens and hardens them. The unconvinced, but not bigots? It frightens and disgusts them. The half-converted? They do not need it; they are growing; it hastens them, if at all, at the expense of delicacy and proportion and final equity. The already converted, then? They are the ones who applaud the good hits at Orthodoxy,—who smile at the sharp satire and enjoy the boisterous negations—they and the utterly indifferent. But does it do these any good? Save but fighting always draws a circle of human attention, I cannot see the good that comes, even indirectly, from religious pounding; and I suspect it almost always does more harm than good, and that the pounders do their real good—and some they do—not by their sarcasm and their negations, but by the element of positive affirmation and explanation that is almost always mingled. A mind is more alive than a rose-bud, and as Thackeray says, you cannot open a rose-bud with a pen-knife. A fable from the old Chinese wisdom comes to mind à propos of Thackeray's bud. "Let us not be like the man of Sung," said Mencius. "There was a man of Sung who was grieved that his growing corn was not longer, and so he pulled it up! Having done thus, he returned home looking very stupid, and said to his people, 'I am tired to-day. I have been helping the corn to grow long!' His son ran to look at it and found the corn all withered. There are few in the world," moralizes the sage, "who do not deal with the passion-nature (with the minds of other people, we must put it) as if they were assisting the corn to grow long. Some, indeed, consider it of no benefit to them and let it alone; they do not even weed the corn. But they who assist it to grow long, pull out the corn. What they do is not only of no benefit, but it does injury."

THE FOURTH REASON.

There were four reasons against the aggressive method, I said. The last is that its emphasis tends to quench this fact that should ever be uppermost in mind,—that religiousness is greater than the ideas of religion.

If one tries to define religion, he thinks first perhaps of its institutions,—the worship here or the worship there, the worship thus or so. Then his deepening look goes in to note the ideas of God and life,—our doctrines and beliefs. But these also are soon felt to be but outward; and below their variety are seen yet deeper moral truths and aspirations. Here we find essential unity. By these moral unities men are more alike in religiousness than they are different, however far their isms of belief or forms of worship may diverge. Now a religious reform, when it comes to be self-conscious and active, has to be carried on mainly in the middle sphere of beliefs, in ideas: it is the mind that has to be directly addressed. If we urge the reform as if the ideas were all-important instead of very important,—as if they constituted the essence of religiousness,—we make a sad mistake. It is just the mistake that so many Christians have always made—the mistake of emphasizing belief as necessary to salvation. Radicals, of course, do not say that; but they closely approach to that when by their emphasis they urge, or seem to urge,—"Unless you think as I do you are a fool." Denunciation and sneers and sharp impeachments correspond in rational religion to persecution in the history of "revealed" religions. It is very easy to be a radical bigot, rather hard not to be (because religious ideas to any one who holds them intensely do seem so grand and mighty); and the radical bigot or Evangelical bigot are own cousins, even if the first be the more right and the other the more wrong in his thought.

We need more reverence for others' reverence. Part of religiousness is sympathy; intense, real sympathy with all religiousness, even if in hostile or lower forms. I do not see how one, all quick with the sense of God, the Infinite Patience and the Infinite Sympathy, can use sarcasm, can shoot sneers, can hurl denunciations at another's faith. The sense of God—and satire at another's sense of God! The vision—and laughter at another's vision! No; rather such might of sympathy that it will drive us to be more strenuously careful as well as eager in trying to open the eyes to see the better glory.

Especially to-day, in this day of earnest looking and of thought that is emancipating itself each hour, we can try some nobler method than that which Luther tried three hundred years and more ago, and so many other reformers in darker times than this. Luther was brave and honest, but narrow and coarse and violent. Erasmus was broad-minded, but cowardly and dishonest. To-day at least can not radicals be brave with Luther and broad-minded with Erasmus?

Come with your new interpretation,—clearly, repeatedly, enthusiastically! That moves. Be full of it,—the fuller, the better. Then as you go, you preach. You mean "radical;" you are known as radical; everywhere you are its representative; and what you stand for in that name is clear. If it be deeper faith,—steadier, gladder cheer,—an humbler ignorance, and greater trust through the ignorance,—warmer, wider sympathies,—more eager loyalty to many teachers,—fear before no facts,—absolute honesty of thought and word,—if radicalism be all these, then stand for all these positively, and, as you go, you preach! "Are you radical?" Of course I am. "Why?" Because—don't you see how warm and bright and deep the trust is, and how true to facts the interpretation of the Universe, and how simple and touching the worship?

That, that is the emphasis, I think, we want.

A Detroit gentleman, one hundred and five years old, has lately been troubled with a failing of his eyesight, and the doctor thinks it is the result of smoking to excess for the last ninety years or so.

Conversation enriches the understanding, but solitude is the school of genius.—Gibbon.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

CURRENT TOPICS.

BY REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE.

AN EARNEST EFFORT is making in England so to reform the system of scholarships and fellowships in the universities as to secure, what does not now exist, the adequate maintenance of mature study and scientific research,—provision, that is, for the support of men who are not chiefly acting as teachers of what is already known, but as investigators, and teachers of new fruits of investigation. This fostering of knowledge for its own sake, and making it to grow and multiply and fill the earth, is becoming the finest, as it is the highest, aim of great interest in science. Universities, as distinguished from schools, academies, and academic colleges, should be organized with special reference to this bringing together and supporting of men devoted to research, and competent to throw around common study the interest of near association with active search for new truth. At present we are, in all parts of the world, sacrificing great and original and accomplished minds to the work of the schoolmaster, when we ought to set them free for, and sustain them in, the higher labor of pushing forward the boundaries of science. The mistake begins to be understood, in all the leading nations which have part in modern culture, and it can hardly fail of rectification under the impulse of present confidence in science, and expectation of the benefit to all practical human interests of fostering science to the utmost.

AN ITALIAN PROFESSOR of Sanskrit at Florence—Dr. Angelo De Gubernatis—has just brought out in England, and in English, a work which, in two large volumes, nearly covers the ground of mythology, and in a way in the highest degree interesting and satisfactory. The direct aim of the learned author is to give a summary and a critical examination of all legends in which any mention of animals is made. Hence the title which he takes: "Zoological Mythology; or, The Legends of Animals." But this aim conducts the discussion over the entire mythological field, and brings in almost every important myth of all the Aryan nations, and of many other families also of the human race; and at every step admirable fruits of research are brought to view. Perhaps as interesting an example of this as can be selected is the store of heathenish myth which Dr. De Gubernatis has dug up from the soil of Italy, and in view of which he makes the assertion that "the basis of Italian belief is still pagan." A statement of this kind falls in with the conviction which the candid student of Christian history cannot escape, that the Christianity which has filled the world with its pretensions has been underneath largely heathen, and no more deserving of historical, humane, or religious respect than any other degraded type of man's tradition of religion.

IT IS NO SMALL SIGN of the rational advance of Christian mankind that a Scotch divine, of the position of Dr. John Tulloch, can say that "the true idea of the Church is that it is continually in search of a higher theology;" that "it did not begin in dogma—it does not rightly rest on it;" and that "thought can only live and flourish along with perfect freedom." Dr. Tulloch has recently published a work on "Rational Theology and Christian Philosophy in England in the Seventeenth Century," giving an account of the two classes of men known as "Liberal Churchmen," or "Latitudinarians" and "the Cambridge Platonists," who figured as radicals in their day. It is in this work, when he sympathetically sums up the Church ideas of "the Cambridge Platonists," that he makes the statements quoted above. The whole passage is as follows:—

"The Church was not to them an organization for the propagation of this or that set of opinions; it was a culture or worship resting on the recognition of a few divine facts,—a spiritual society, within whose sheltering bosom all opinions consistent with these facts should find free room and scope. It did not begin in dogma—it does not rightly rest on it; yet one of its functions is to elaborate dogma and cultivate a higher Christian thought, as well as a more diffused and earnest Christian spirit. Thought is the function of the few; it can only live and flourish along with perfect freedom. Dogma is the varying expression of the divine activity of the Church, in ever renewed adaptation to its own necessities and the progress of knowledge. Instead of being the beginning, therefore, it is the summit and crown of the Church's being. Instead of resting upon a creed, in any purely dogmatic or scientific sense,—in other words upon a special theology, which was the Puritan conception,—the true idea of the Church is that it is continually in search of a higher theology—a more comprehensive and perfect co-ordination of the spiritual facts lying at its basis."

It is plain enough, of course, that some relics of narrow divinity are assumed in this statement, especially in the reference to "a few divine facts." Yet it is equally plain that the narrow assumptions may be set aside, and liberal and radical ones put in their place, thus readily converting, or rather completing the conversion of, Dr. Tulloch's Christianity. Thus we may assume that doing of good, seeking of truth, and cultivating fellowship, without reference to any historical or theological opinions whatever, are the fundamentals of union in faith. Thoroughly sift both the New Testament and the Old, and they warrant this assumption. Micah reduces religion to these three roots: justice, kindness, and humility. Paul declares that love alone is of real avail in faith; so then it may be truly worked out to this—that to do and to be the best we can among our fellows here and now is the heart and soul of true religion, the life of a pure church. To do good with all our power, to love it and live by it, is sufficient walking with whatever Source and Soul of good there is, for all common and practical purposes. A theology may be a good thing, and to me it seems a very good thing; but the only true heart of it is goodness, and this atheists are known to have. The fraternal feeling of man with man points well enough to Our Father, even if the thought denies any such Author and Providence of us all. So the pure love of truth is a large practical homage to Infinite Reason, even in one who denies that God is at all; and cultivation of pure and good fellowship among men is a sufficient practical beginning of trust in and devotion to the Infinite Spirit and Life which figure to us the influence in the soul of perfect godhead. It is quite practicable, therefore, without asserting a thought of God as Father or Providence, Reason or Intelligence, and Spirit or Life, conceiving Infinite Being under the three aspects of our own higher nature, will, intellect, and feeling,—to get near enough to it for the practical purposes of union by asserting the divinity of goodness, truth, and love; thus reducing the problem of a genuine church to union for doing good, seeking truth, and cherishing love, and making the problem of theology to consist in harmonizing our speculations, not only with intellectual laws of speculation, and intellectual hints from natural science, but still more and primarily with the absolute moral principles which are of first and chief authority. In this view certain tender-hearted, upright, and modestly devoted "atheists," or deniers of the common idea of deity, are better believers, and even better theologians, than average Doctors of Divinity, whose God is a devil and whose godliness is heathen fear and cruelty and superstition.

THE FACT OF ANYTHING thoroughly radical coming out of New Haven, the seat of Yale College and the centre of Connecticut divinity, could hardly be credited except upon very positive testimony. But the testimony is at hand, in the shape of "The Fraternity Church of New Haven," organized under the charge of the writer of these lines, with no small promise of success. After some two months work by Sunday evening discourses in a public hall, this result has been reached—a Radical Club, and "The Fraternity Church." The members of the latter unite "for associated doing of good, seeking of truth, and promotion of fellowship," and the minister is only required to be "of approved character, devotion to doing good, zeal for the study of truth, and reasonable learning." There are no other specified marks of this church and of the work which it proposes, all else being perfectly open to free opinion. It asks no man what his theology is, nor whether he has any at all, but takes for granted that atheists may need society and may be good society themselves, in all the practical matters which induce men to take hold of hands together. It may be presumed that a thinker and scholar devoted to religion, or to humanity even, will work out some theology, or an equivalent for this under some other name, but all this is left to come as it may. To-day THE FRATERNITY CHURCH has a Theist as a pastor, but such a thing might happen as that an atheist should come to his place, so large in goodness, and truth, and love, as to do excellently well as a minister; and he would find no bar to keep him out. A true theist had rather a thousand times that God should never be mentioned again to all eternity than that a thoroughly bedevilled theology should be taught; and the very high probability is that sound theology in the future will more and more advise men to take no name nor make any image of thought, in worship, but become conscious rather that thought is blind before the divine brightness, and language inadequate almost to blasphemy. This does not apply to abstract personification, as when we say Infinite Father or Providence, Infinite Reason or Intelligence, Infinite Spirit or Life. It applies rather to personal naming or defining, as when we call Infinite Being God in a personal sense, or when we attempt to tell in any way how and where Infinite Being is. The common insistence upon "a Personal God" is a bit of sheer heathenism. The putting of God into a human form and naming him Jesus is heathenism as reprehensible to sound thought as any heathenism in divinity the world ever saw. Hence I say that sound divinity will have no personal mask, either of thought, or image, or name, for deity, and that it is quite possible that what are now known as atheists may do perfectly well as practical ministers of religion, at least as long as average theists are in fact devils, and not theists at all. A church, therefore, is not broad enough for human wants which has any divinity except that of human fraternity in its foundation. Fraternity churches, not theological churches, are what we want. This, and not any sectarian, nor even the Christian, name, is the name to be taken. One may accept Christianity rightly cleansed and made new, but our church must have a ground which every soul on the planet can stand upon, provided that standing is consistent in any way with good union, as any virtuous standing is. The human virtues, in a general sense, and not the conventional virtues of particular civilizations, much less the theologies and rituals of different religions, are the tie of soul with soul, of spirit with spirit, of creature with creature, in this matter of helping one another onward and upward. Give us, then, Fraternity Churches all over the land, and in all lands, until sectarian names cease to be of significance, and even such names as Christian, Moslem, Buddhist, etc., imply accidental separations only, and not essential diversities.

There is no occasion to explain here what will be taught, and what discussed, in the Fraternity Church of New Haven, and among the members of the New Haven Radical Club. It is of more account to call the attention of INDEX readers to the importance of a movement now made for the first time under the shadow of Yale College and in one of the capitals of the State of Connecticut. There is no section of the country which has been less worked by external radicalism than this; but it is a mistake to suppose that the radicalism of general influences, of common experience and thinking, is equally absent. The reverse of this is the truth. All the more for having no vent, the radicalism of individual minds is deeper and more intense than that to which most persons are accustomed. People and pulpits are honey-combed with it, to an extent which gives great promise for large strength at no distant day. But the surface of custom covers up a great deal of it, and this, like a scab on a wound, must come off gradually, and cannot be rudely torn off. A great many, for example, will hear the most radical preaching, and will extend their sympathy, and make some small contribution of means, but will not at once take hold openly and thoroughly, in the way necessary to adequate success. Most of the work has to be done by the minister, with the help of a few, and under circumstances which operate very much against the collection of material resources. So far these have not met the merest costs of a place of public meeting, and they are not likely to pay the minister anything for a good while yet. All his work is gratuitous, and he has to live as best he can by the labors of his pen. The radical headquarters in Boston, the Free Religious Association, decline to undertake collecting assistance for such enterprises as the Fraternity Church of New Haven, nor do they stimulate in any way the disposition to lend a hand which radicals surely of all people ought to cherish. A man may pay all the costs of years of struggle and waiting, and arrive at a point where a little help would make the difference between immediate success and further failure, and yet no help will be so much as attempted, for lack partly of radical attention to need of it, and partly from a very absurd doubt whether help will be helpful, whether people had better start at all who cannot start alone. That this need not be has been proved by the abundant radical support extended to THE INDEX, which could not have started without aid, nor have held on without it. The New Haven movement perhaps ought not to have started on so much faith and so little money, and it may have to go down for lack of a little help, even though its conductor does not take a penny from it; but one thing it has amply shown already, that the other elements of success are present, and that if it can be held up by sheer sacrifice it will become one of the most important centres of the radical work.

During the late war some jokes were cracked at the expense of the knowledge of geography possessed by Frenchmen. A recent case shows, however, that some improvement has been made. Two Parisian bourgeois, of the true type, were lately exchanging the news of the day on the Boulevards. The first one said: "The news from Russia is terrible. Twenty thousand persons have been burned by the fire of Vesuvius." The second Parisian here exclaimed, with a theatrical shudder: "Why, that is truly horrible, horrible! Who can have set it on fire?" The first one responded: "It is unknown as yet; but the Sultan will doubtless inform himself, and the miscreant will suffer the full penalty of the law."

A man incarcerated in the Tombs has been figuring in chalk on the walls of his cell: "In New York City the spires of 342 churches, worth $41,140,000, point heavenward. I'm here for stealing a loaf of bread for my starving child."

"AUTHORITY AND INFLUENCE."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—You mistake my position when you say that I claim for Jesus an authority "entirely different" from that of other men—as Galileo for instance. I expressly said that, in my view, the authority of Jesus was like that of Galileo in its being freely recognized and accepted, but unlike it by all the difference between astronomy and religion: Galileo helping me in my knowledge of the spheres, Jesus in my human and divine relations.

You claim the word authority as applied to Jesus to have a technical sense, and that my use of it is unauthorized, and merely equivalent to influence. But, though I define it by influence, it is not in my use equivalent to it, but includes the idea of power, and of a position of power; a meaning not found in the word influence, nor in any word that I know of except authority. Whether you are right as to its technical theological use in this connection, I do not know; but my position has no dependence on that special word.

You seem under the impression that this position is peculiar to me. I have indeed tried to look at the fact itself, apart from the fashion of other men's views of it; but something like this position is held by many scholars and thinkers of recognized ability both here and abroad. In many of the German universities—at Strasburg, at any rate before the war, and at Leyden—views like this have been taught of late years. At Geneva it has respectable adherents. In England I judge it to be the position of Mr. Martineau and others; and in this country of Dr. Furness, and Dr. Bartol, and very many others. (See especially the History of the Doctrine of the Deity of Jesus Christ, from the French of Albert Réville, pastor at Rotterdam, published by Williams & Norgate, London, 1870. "It will be seen that the Orthodox dogma of the deity of Jesus Christ is one amongst many forms of Christian faith; that there is nothing in it necessary to the existence of Christianity; that, in particular, Jesus himself, the apostolic age, and the two following centuries, did without it; that it was founded by degrees, and under the influence of various principles, some very elevated, and others of a contrary character; that, in a word, this dogma has its history within Christendom itself. Without it at the beginning, the Gospel can survive it, as indeed it has already survived it in the minds of many Christians on both sides of the Atlantic.") Whether this position ought to keep the name Christian or not, is an incidental question whose discussion I must waive for lack of space.

I must also waive the comparison between Socrates and Jesus. I have very great love for Socrates, but I do not find in him the "intellectual superiority" over Jesus which you assume, nor the superior "spirit of justice and veneration for natural rights;" nor especially do I find in him the holy inspiration which I find in Jesus. But on this question I can only refer the doubtful to Plato and Xenophon on the one hand, and the Gospels on the other.

Waiving the authenticity of the Gospels, you bring up as evidence of the character of Jesus the story of the devils sent into the swine. But we have no right to waive the authenticity; we are bound to examine it; and criticism of the passage makes the fact as reported rest on a very slender probability. You certainly cannot believe the story, for you do not believe Jesus had the power to send the madness into the swine; nor can I regard it as other than a curious coincidence misinterpreted and misreported.

But these are only single sides of our difference. I have tried hard to get at the unity of your position, in order to let it clench with mine; but I am not sure that I have found it. As near as I can make out, the difference between us is this: that you ignore or deny the personal oneness of the human race, which I affirm. You limit inward and real human fellowship to a chance and occasional friendship with certain living persons; and I extend it over the whole human race present and past within my reach. I regard the race as a brotherhood in a personal sense, as one family in heart, its individual members personally related with each other, according to their character and worth. And for myself, my humanity is the humanity within my conscious reach, though I would not deny a certain unconscious and mystical fellowship with brethren forgotten and unknown. This personal oneness of the human race you seem not to apprehend or believe in; hence the whole question of the place of Jesus in the heart and history of humanity is to you an idle one. I cannot but regard this view as an ignoring of the reality, and a narrowing of it.

Yours truly,
FRANCIS T. WASHBURN.

MILTON, MASS.

[Most certainly we do not "believe the story" of the swine and the demons. But if we once begin to question the authenticity of the gospels, it is necessary to go a great deal further than Mr. Washburn apparently does. Unquestioning faith in the gospels makes men believe this story with all the rest; questioning reason makes them reject it with everything that involves the supernatural or the unnatural. The superiority that our correspondent claims for Jesus is at least unnatural, since he admits no analogous claim for any religious teacher in the whole course of history; and if he will carefully analyze the basis of it in his own mind, we think he will discover that this alleged superiority rests on a supposed supernatural foundation. This fact, if true, will entirely explain the difference between Mr. Washburn's thought and our own.

The human brotherhood we believe in has its bond in community of origin, nature, interests, sentiments, aspirations, destiny. Mr. Washburn singularly misconceives it.—Ed.]

FOOD FOR THOUGHT.

[From the Brooklyn Catholic Review.]

The facts contained in the subjoined paragraph, which we cut from one of the Brooklyn dailies, speak for themselves. The comments made upon them strike us as slightly absurd. Unless all classes of citizens are to be forced not only to pay taxes for the public schools, but also to provide for their children no other education than that afforded by them, we fail to see what "genuine American sentiment" ought to be alienated by this action of some of our Brooklyn Catholics, who, after paying their taxes for "School No. 5" and its congeners have seen fit to burden themselves with an additional tax, in order to vindicate that freedom of conscience which is popularly supposed to be one of the things which "genuine American sentiment" is pledged to maintain. That the fifteen teachers so summarily thrown out of employment should feel aggrieved we can comprehend, but what other parties have any comprehensible ground of complaint we do not understand. As the city is the gainer by this special transaction, and is likely to be so by those which are sure to occur in the future, it is in a position to congratulate itself on the calmness with which Catholics submit to injustice, and the inveteracy with which they cling to the doctrine contained in the Scriptural injunction to "train up a child in the way he should go." But we quote from our contemporary—

"A PRIMARY SCHOOL RUINED.—Primary School No. 5 is situated in School District No. 7, which comprises all of the Second and a good part of the Fifth Ward. The residents are largely Roman Catholics. Recently a parochial private school has been opened, the effect of which has been to deplete the Primary of two-thirds of its scholars, so that the Board of Education will doubtless feel called upon to close the school. The attendance before vacation averaged 554; now it is less than 200. Fifteen teachers, whose salaries amount to $7,500.57, will be thrown out of employment by this innovation. Still, as they are in the service of the Board of Education, that body will doubtless feel called upon to provide for them as vacancies occur. We regret the distaste shown in this instance for our public schools by the members of the Catholic communion, as things of this kind cannot occur without alienating genuine American sentiment from the Catholics in this country."

CHRISTIAN UNION.

[By Rev. Dr. Philip Schaff, in the New York Observer.]

There is a great deal of loose and sentimental talk about Christian union which does the cause more harm than good. Many efforts to bring about union have only resulted in greater division. There has been within the last twenty or thirty years, both in Europe and in this country, a development of denominationalism and confessionalism which seems to put union further off than ever. Episcopalians are more intensely Episcopalians, Lutherans more Lutheran, Presbyterians more Presbyterian, Congregationalists more Congregationalists, than they were when Lutherans and Calvinists were united into one Evangelical Church in Prussia and other German States in 1817, and when the great religious union societies for Bible and Tract distribution were formed in England and in this country.

And yet the idea of Christian union is one of the great ideas of the age, and must sooner or later be actualized, although it may be in a form very different from what is generally supposed. Non habet suam horam et moras. The thickening conflict with Infidelity and Antichrist points to the necessity of union. "United we stand, divided we fall," is an old and true maxim. Divide and conquer," is the policy of the successful enemy. "When bad men combine," said one of the wisest of British statesmen, "the good must associate, else they will fall one by one, an unopposed sacrifice in a contemptible struggle." This is as true of religion as of politics.

Every one complains of the badness of his money, but nobody of his judgment.—Roche-would.

The Sanctuary of Superstition.

N. B.—Brief and pithy extracts for this column will be gratefully received. Please send marked copies.

[Copy of the Rev. Rowland Hill's original and celebrated Play-Bill.]

The original bill was posted up at Richmond, on Saturday, June 4th, 1774, close to the play-bill of the day, and helped to close the theatre.

BY COMMAND OF THE KING OF KINGS,

AND

At the Desire of All who Love His Appearing.

AT THE THEATRE OF THE UNIVERSE,

ON THE EVE OF TIME,

WILL BE PERFORMED

THE GREAT ASSIZE,

OR,

DAY OF JUDGMENT.

THE SCENERY, which is now actually preparing, will not only surpass everything that hath yet been seen, but will infinitely exceed the almost stretch of human conception. There will be a just representation of ALL the inhabitants of the world, in their various and proper colors, and their customs and manners will be so exactly and minutely delineated that the most secret thought will be discovered. "For God shall bring every work into judgment; with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil."—Eccles. xii. 14.

This Theatre will be laid out after a New Plan, and will consist of Pit and Gallery only; and, contrary to all others, the Gallery is fitted up for the reception of the people of high (or heavenly) birth; and the Pit for those of low (or earthly) rank!

N. B.—The Gallery is very Spacious; and the Pit Without Bottom.

To prevent inconvenience, there are separate doors for admittance into the company; and they are so different that none can mistake that are not wilfully blind. The door which opens into the Gallery is very narrow, and the steps up to it are somewhat difficult—for which reason there are seldom many people about it. But the door that gives entrance into the Pit is very wide, and very commodious; which causes such numbers to flock to it that it is generally crowded.

N. B.—The strait door leads towards the right hand, and the broad one to the left.

It will be in vain for one, in a tinseled coat and borrowed language, to personate one of high birth, in order to get admittance into the upper places; for there is One of wonderful and deep penetration, who will search and examine every individual, and all who cannot pronounce Shibboleth, in the language of Canaan, or have not received a white stone, or new name, or cannot prove a clear title to a certain portion of the Land of promise, must be turned in at the left hand door.

THE PRINCIPAL PERFORMERS

Are described in 1 Thess. iv. 10; 2 Thess. i. 7, 8, 9; Matt. xxiv. 30, 31; xxv. 31, 32; Daniel vii. 9, 10; Jude xiv. 15; Rev. x. 12-15, &c. But as there are some people better acquainted with the contents of a PLAY-BILL than the Word of God, it may not be amiss to transcribe a verse or two for their perusal:—

"The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that obey not the Gospel, but to be glorified in his saints. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him. A thousand thousand ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him. The judgment was set, and the Books were opened; and whosoever was not found written in the Book of Life was cast into the lake of fire."

ACT I.

Of this GRAND and SOLEMN PERFORMANCE will be opened by an Archangel, with the Trump of God.

"The Trump shall sound, and the Dead shall be raised." 1 Cor. xv. 22.

ACT II.

Will be a PROCESSION of Saints in white, with golden harps, accompanied with shouts of Joy and songs of praise.

ACT III.

Will be an assemblage of all the Unregenerate. The Music will consist chiefly of cries; accompanied with weeping, wailing, mourning, lamentation, and woe.

TO CONCLUDE WITH

AN ORATION

BY THE SON OF GOD.

As it is written in the 25th of Matthew, from the 34th verse to the end of the chapter. But for the sake of those who seldom read the Scriptures, I shall here transcribe two verses:— "Then shall the King say to them on the right hand: Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand: Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

AFTER WHICH THE CURTAIN WILL DROP.

Then! O to tell!

Souls rais'd on high—others doomed to hell!

John v. 28, 29.

These praise the Lamb, and sing redeeming love,

Rev. v. 8, 9; xiv. 3, 4.

Lodg'd in his bosom, all his goodness prove.

Luke xvi. 22, 23.

While those who trampled underfoot his grace,

Luke xix. 14, 27.

Are banish'd now forever from his face.

Matt. xxv. 31; 2 Thess. i. 8.

Divided thus, a gulph is fix'd between,

Luke xvi. 26.

And (EVERLASTING) closes up the scene.

Matt. xxv. 46.

"Then wilt thou do unto thee, O Israel; and because I will do thus unto thee, prepare to meet thy God, O Israel."—Amos iv. 12.

Tickets for the Pit.

At the easy purchase of following the vain pomps and vanities of the fashionable world, and the desires and amusements of the flesh,—to be had at every flesh-pleasing assembly.

"If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die."—Rom. viii. 13.

Tickets for the Gallery.

At no less a rate than being converted, forsaking all, denying self, taking up the Cross and following Christ in the regeneration,—to be had nowhere but in the Word of God, and where that Word appoints.

"He that hath ears to hear let him hear."—Matt. x. 15.

"And be not deceived; God is not mocked. For whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."—Gal. vi. 7.

N. B.—NO MONEY WILL BE TAKEN AT THE DOOR.

Nor will any Tickets give admittance into the Gallery but those sealed by the Holy Ghost with Immanuel's signet.

"Watch therefore; be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the son of man cometh."—Matt. xxiv. 42, 44.

In the whole of Spanish America, but especially in the larger towns, the moment of the Angelus has a strange attraction for the stranger. As the usage requires every one to halt, no matter where he may be, at the first stroke of the bell, to interrupt his conversation however important, and listen without stirring until the conclusion of the chime, the singularity of a whole population surprised in a moment as it comes and goes, held in a state of petrification, and paralyzed as if by an enchanter, may be imagined. On every side you see gestures interrupted, mouths half opened for the arrested remark, smiles oddly lingering or passing into an expression of prayer. You would fancy a nation of statues. A town in South America, at the tinkle of the Angelus, resembles the city in the Arabian Nights whose inhabitants were turned into stones. The magician here is the bell-ringer. But hardly has the vibration ceased when a universal murmur arises from these thousands of oppressed lungs. Hand meets hand, question seeks answer, conversations resume their course; horses feel the loosened bridle and paw the ground; dogs bark, babies cry, the fathers swear, and the mothers chatter. The accidental turns thus given to conversation are many, and sometimes striking.—From "Searching for the Quinine Plant in Peru," in the December number of Lippincott's Magazine.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OXFORD HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1873. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Nine Hundred and Fifty.

Seven Shares, $700.00

JAMES EDDY, Providence, R. I., Two Shares 200

PHILIP A. PALMER, Geneva, N. Y., One " 100

JAMES ELLISON, Newark, N. J., " 100

W. M. JAMES, Danbury, Conn., Two " 200

JEFFERSON UNIVERSITY, Springfield, Mass., One " 100

$206.400

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending January 4, 1873.

Chas. Coventry, $ 3.00	J. J. Keyes, 1.50
C. B. Crandall, 3.00	A. E. McCann, .85
Wm. M. Smith, 3.00	Chas. Gale, 1.00
Jno. August Visconti, .85	Jonathan Musser, 1.00
Jno. D. Becks, .75	Geo. M. Booth, .75
Jackson Brothers, .30	T. C. Search, .25
W. M. Raper, 3.00	H. Clay Ham, 1.00
J. M. Wertz, .50	Geo. Fiss, 1.00
John Clark, 1.00	Peter Thomson, 1.00
Narah C. Hollowell, .50	Fanny Eddy, 3.00
P. Roosevelt Johnson, .35	Phoebe A. Palmer, 3.00
Sam'l Dees, .25	Wm. Clark, 3.00
James Eddy, 4.07	A. B. Bradford, 3.00
Frank P. Weeks, .25	Imbelle G. Hardy, 3.00
Lyman Cross, .25	S. Newell Hamilton, 1.50
David Cony, .10	Austin Kent, .25
J. T. B. Smith, 3.00	Fanny A. Jordan, 1.00
H. P. Hollowell, 3.00	T. R. Knowles, 1.00
Mrs. J. P. Angler, 2.00	A. B. Swaine, .75
W. J. Walker, .80	Wm. H. Dwight, .75
E. S. Walker, 3.00	Lemuel Adams, 1.50
L. L. Hepburn, 1.00	Henry Miller, 1.50
M. Jane Devendorf, 1.00	B. P. Wilcox, .75
E. M. Sewell, 1.00	W. Curtis, 1.50
A. McInnes, 1.85	C. A. Lloyd, .50
D. H. Clark, .50	T. H. Hasel, .50
Robert Mason, 4.00	H. Bateson, 10.00
W. M. Lockwood, 1.50	Wm. T. Menefee, 10.00
Wm. Newman, 1.85	P. C. Skinner, .50
Clara P. Bousland, .50	P. C. Turner, .25
M. R. Smith, 1.50	E. R. Tower, .25
Mary Wetherbee, .50	M. P. Fanchetti, .25
B. Barnum, .25	A. W. Thompson, 2.43
Jno. Collins, 1.50	Ferry & Morion, 1.20
A. Vander Nailler, .75	J. P. Ruggles, 1.20
E. C. Towne, 1.50	Chas. Hodges, .10
J. L. Pratt, .75	Wm. H. Hamlin, .50
Geo. H. Ford, 1.00	Toledo Printing Co., 10.00
A. P. Linn, 1.00	Jay Denamore, .75

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mailing. We have no means of knowing whether their wish is continued or not except the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Cheques on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

The Index.

JANUARY 11, 1878.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, with an seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 88, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS PROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOTREY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Please send all matter intended for any particular issue of THE INDEX at least a fortnight in advance of date. We shall be very greatly obliged by attention to this request.

The thirst for truth cannot be quenched with the dry sand of facts. Facts are dead. They were true once; but when we say, "They have happened," their truth is gone forever. What we want is that which is always true, and this is the principle, the idea, the thought, of which facts are but the transient form.

General Joseph R. Hawley, ex-governor of Connecticut and at present member of Congress from that State, has just joined the Asylum Hill Congregational Church in Hartford. He was required to express his belief in the articles of faith of that Church, including the doctrine of the Trinity, the communion of the saints, the resurrection of the body and the life everlasting, the inspiration of the Scriptures, salvation through Christ only, repentance through the Holy Ghost, the unity of all organized bodies of believers as constituting one Catholic Church, and the Divine ordination of baptism and the communion. And this in the latter half of the nineteenth century!

The New York Independent of Nov. 21 has the following paragraph:—

"The Toledo INDEX quotes at length an old editorial of ours which it says has 'the right ring,' in which we protested against the appropriation of public money for sectarian purposes, and it asks: 'But does the Independent carry it out so far as to demand the taxation of church property?' Of course we do. That is one of our old hobbies. We have said it again and again. To exempt a piece of church property from taxation is simply a roundabout way of paying to that church the amount of the tax. And so long as church property is untaxed, the churches thus favored are to that extent established churches. We utterly disbelieve in all State support of religion, under whatever disguise. Is THE INDEX satisfied that we have eyesight enough to bridge the distance from a principle to its application?"

Yes, in this instance, as we are very glad to perceive. We are agreeably disappointed in finding that the Independent will work side by side with THE INDEX on this very important question of the taxation of church property. But it should not marvel at our surprise at such a discovery, when it blows so very hot and so very cold at the same time on the "prayer-gauge" question. If it had eyesight enough to bridge the distance from the principle of freedom to all its applications, it would be a zealous champion of Free Religion, instead of sitting awkwardly on the fence, as it usually does, or attempting to achieve an impossible posture on both sides of the fence, as it very frequently does.

DEVELOPMENT AND CRISIS.

The opening paper of the present issue of THE INDEX, by Mr. Gannett, of Boston, contains an independent criticism of our "method" in endeavoring to promote the radical cause. Its main purpose is to advocate a sympathetic treatment of Christianity, though from an outside position, rather than active opposition to it, at least by means of ridicule or sarcasm; and Mr. Gannett finds illustrations of the two "methods" he discusses in the Brahmo Somaj and THE INDEX respectively. "Must we be aggressive," he asks, "in order to be progressive?" The Brahmo Somaj, enjoining forbearance from "ridicule" and "contempt" and "hate" in the treatment of other faiths, commands his special encomiums; while THE INDEX, although its editor is mentioned in terms which should be credited entirely to old friendship, receives a qualified censure.

It would be high treason to the spirit of Free Religion, if we were otherwise than pleased to give place in these columns to criticism so thoughtful, so earnest, so candid. We do not venture to pronounce at all upon the question of their deservedness: of that our readers will judge for themselves. But at the request of the critic himself we will say a word or two on some leading points.

It is conceded by Mr. Gannett that the true attitude of radicalism is not only extra-Christian, but even anti-Christian. The position we take in THE INDEX, therefore, with reference to Christianity, he approves as essentially right; even our "method" is "not essentially wrong, but very wrong in and by its emphasis." This concession reduces the real difference between us to such small dimensions that we are somewhat at a loss to know exactly what to reply to. We might say that position to a certain extent necessitates method; that anti means anti; that either the position is wrong, or the method is right; that the cannon-ball of argument is no more legitimate than the pistol-shot of sarcasm, and sometimes not half so available. It is bad policy to fight mosquitoes with bomb-shells. The matter of "emphasis," we suspect, is partly a matter of temperament, partly a matter of perception, and partly a matter of circumstances. To say that there is no use for sarcasm in the treatment of hurtful follies and superstitions would be tantamount to saying there is no use for it at all; for what else could be so justly an object of sarcasm as folly and superstition? The sarcastic spirit, if unduly indulged, doubtless reacts unfavorably on the person who surrenders himself to it; but the measured use of sarcasm must be defended as legitimate and right. At least we should defend it, believing that there is a just employment for every faculty with which humanity is endowed. We should never dream of requiring others to be sarcastic; we are quick to appreciate and to admire the beautiful spirit which marks all of Mr. Gannett's utterances; but, remembering that even the sweetness of the pudding-sauce is enhanced by a dash of acidity, we must be permitted to adhere to our belief that love itself is wisely flavored with a certain pungency, and that wit is never so nobly used as when turned against the foolish, the false, and the pernicious.

But the directly aggressive method forgets the fact of evolution, draws off attention from the positive side of radicalism, emphasizes the negative side too much, tends to "quench the fact that religiousness is greater than the ideas of religion." We do not think this objection well grounded. He is not thoroughly versed in the philosophy of "evolution" who fails to note that "dissolution" is its correlative fact. Mr. Gannett is by no means unmindful of this; but he would gently detach error from the truth to which, barnacle-like, it clings, when perhaps the sharp edge of a knife is indispensable. Crisis, no less than development, is a stubborn fact of Nature. What is birth but a crisis? And what shall be said to the suggestion that Free Religion is now come to the birth,—that a certain violence is the condition of its entrance on its great, illimitable career? It is quite idle, we believe, to expect that the world can ever pass through this present epoch of religious history without commotions of feeling, revolutions of thought, perhaps convulsions of society. He does not make the fact who announces it. The most merciful method in the long run is that which shortens the period of pain, even though it for a time intensifies it. If radicalism must now resolutely emphasize negations, it is not because it loves them, or because it has nothing better to provide; but rather because crisis is as much a part of evolution as insensible gradations of growth, and the positive stage is absolutely unattainable till the negative work is done.

With all who shrink from the rougher and grimmer aspects of radicalism, we confess to a great measure of sympathy. But it is just as impossible that Free Religion should come to its growth in the womb of Christianity, as it was impossible that the American Republic should mature under the sway of the British Empire. Development has been going on for many centuries, slow and unnoticed; now is the hour of crisis. There is to be, must be, will be, a great breaking with Christianity in this generation; the religion of the future is not to come with the gentle fall of a rose-leaf, but with the suddenness and force of a thunder-bolt, shattering the ancient temple and cleaving it to its base. It is time to look for rain; it may yet tarry, but it is wise to be prepared.

HORACE GREELEY'S BELIEF.

One of the most intimate and valued friends of Mr. Greeley desires us to make in THE INDEX the following statement respecting his religious belief: "Horace Greeley did not believe in plenary inspiration, nor in the Trinity; that is, Jesus was not equal to the Father, God, the Great First Cause. The truth is, Mr. Greeley was a Liberal in the fullest, best sense of the word. He did hold in some vague sense that Jesus was more than a man, or at least ordinary man. I believe that of him, and of other men. If Mr. Greeley had had time to give to the subject, he would have been a Rationalist or Free-Thinker, and no mistake. No man ever impressed me as he did, that he felt the eye of God was ever on him, and that he must hourly do his best. I believe there was not a pure man at heart living than he. I don't want the Orthodox to claim he was such because he said on his death-bed, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.'"

So far as we know, the Orthodox have not yet begun to claim Mr. Greeley; but, if we may judge by their usual habit, it is only a question of time. President Lincoln was far less of a believer than Horace Greeley; but the Evangelicals have laid stout grasping hands on him. The above testimony, coming from a gentleman who enjoyed the best possible opportunities of knowing the exact truth on the subject, may be of value hereafter; and we are glad to be enabled to put it on record in THE INDEX.

"It is possible," said James Bryce, "to play the part of a demagogue to a ruling as well as to a subject class; and he who demands that the voice of the poor should be heard in the councils of the State is not so dangerous to the public peace as he who flatters the insolence of wealth, and bids it maintain a system which secures its own ascendancy." This sentence, which we find quoted by Captain Maxse, admits of adaptation to American affairs. He who demands that the voice and vote of the free thinker shall count for as much politically and weigh as much morally, in the administration of the government, as the voice and vote of the Orthodox Christian, is less of a demagogue, agitator, or incendiary, than he who bids the dominant Orthodoxy hold fast to the unjust power it now wields over the public funds and public schools. Whoever would act the part of pacificator will counsel the speedy and voluntary abandonment of a usurpation which must terminate in some manner at no distant day.

Serenity of spirit ought to be the heritage of every free mind. Something is wrong with us if the stream of our inner life grows muddy with irritability.

"THE STRUGGLES OF A DROWNING CREED."

This is the best term the Pall Mall Gazette can find for the preaching of Maurice, Robertson, Arnold, and Whately. Their life, it says, was "a passionate effort to reconcile truth and the Gospel." They all illustrate the fact that, "the point of view from which clergymen of eminent power and honesty are obliged to look at speculative questions is so peculiar, that their views become obsolete with strange rapidity." The Gazette points out in illustration of this, that Whately, by far the ablest of these men, is now remembered by his works on logic and political economy, not by his theology. "Who in these days cares to know what was Arnold's theory about Church and State, or what he thought about the admission of Jews to Parliament?"

The criticism is not new. Hawthorne, musing among the books in the garret of the "Old Manse" at Concord, remarked this rapid death and disappearance of the theological books of a past generation,—so infinitely less interesting than an old almanac! Yet the trouble does not lie in theology itself, which, in any high sense, is the most interesting study in the world. The really original books on this lofty theme never wear out—the Bibles of the world are constantly being reprinted. It is the petty commentaries and criticisms and controversies that die so soon. Even the sects dismiss their old sectarian literature, after awhile, or else duly reprint it and leave it on the shelf unread. And the trouble with the rationalizing men in each sect, is that they die by the very effort they make to be independent and conventional at the same time; and they, like these Englishmen, only exhibit "the struggles of a drowning creed."

Is there any man living, for instance, under forty years old, who now knows the difference between Taylorism and Tylerism; who could read Norton's "Statement of Reasons," or the controversial writings of Stuart and Beecher? The Unitarian or Universalist discussions seem already as remote as "The Great Awakening." When Emerson said, in 1838, "The assumption that the age of inspiration is past, that the Bible is closed—the fear of degrading the character of Jesus by representing him as a man—indicate with sufficient clearness the falsehood of our theology," he began a new era, at least in American thought. Any attempt to reconcile this attitude with the old theory of an infallible book or guide is the struggle of a drowning creed. It is not merely the Trinity or the Atonement which is concerned,—it is the whole theory of supernaturalism. When one says, "Christ was God," we know where to find him. When another says, "Jesus was a man," we know where to find him. But all attempts at an intermediate position are soon forgotten, and this because, even while they are remembered they are unintelligible.

Bushnell and Murray, Brooks and Clarke, are not newer or profounder men than were Arnold and Maurice. For a little while their new point of view, whatever it may be, affords a temporary resting-place for little bands of followers—eager, like their teachers, to "reconcile truth and the Gospel." But it is merely a half-way-house. It does not last beyond the persuasive or ingenious teacher who invented the new compromise. The creed drowns just the same, and all these intellectual contrivances with it, unless they are cut adrift betimes.

When one thinks of the brave and generous spirit which often marks such men as these—how earnestly they try to do their duty and to furnish a doctrinal basis on which duty may rest,—there seems small need to quarrel with their opinions. But for the sake of the many young men and women who are torturing their intellects and wasting all manner of ingenuity in the effort to follow,—for the sake of these one ought to speak. Two and two make four: there is the single fact; and it is pathetic to see the passionate zeal with which many good men labor to convince themselves that there is some "higher sense" and some "living Christian synthesis" by which two and two make only three-and-a-half. The practical work done by such men may be very good,—and, if good, will live; but the point of view from which they are obliged to look at speculative opinions is so peculiar that "their views become obsolete with strange rapidity."

T. W. H.

CHRISTMAS.

It is Christmas day; I have just come from church. Not from one of the grand Romanist or ritual churches where the people throng to hear the music and see the pomp; for even the princeliest dumb-show has become wearisome past endurance, and going to church merely to gratify the vanity of professional singers was always distasteful to my Puritan sentiments.

But the instinct of the multitude is true. Christmas has a place only in mythology, and it is quite proper to bring to its celebration the least intelligent form of the imagination. The festival commemorates not the birth of Jesus,—to that it scarcely makes allusion,—but the incarnation of the Redeemer. It is a pagan festival which can be enjoyed only by the pagan mind. The smallest intrusion of intelligence spoils it by breaking the illusion. Hence the pomp and parade of the Church, the dramatic service, the ecclesiastical glamor; hence the demand for priests. The prayers are fittest in Latin; the music is always in Latin virtually, for the listener catches no words. It is better without a sermon; for the sermon must address itself to the understanding, and the charm is destroyed.

In the church which I attended, the effort was made to combine mythology with thought,—to celebrate at the same moment the birth of Jesus and the mystery of the incarnation; and the process was trying to the constitution of the human mind. The choir performed a fine Te Deum, leaving out the central clause in regard to the miraculous conception. The "long" prayer was reverential, devout, tender; but the minister, as if conscious of the awkwardness of his position, in attempting to speak in the name of the Church of the Christ and at the same time as a lover of the man of Nazareth, ran into theological disquisition, and bewildered the hearers whose sentiments he appeared to be voicing. It being Christmas day, he felt impelled to make special acknowledgment of the gift of the Redeemer, to whom he could not make intercession. He could not pray to the Christ as the Church did, and, being unable to do that, the gratitude on account of him missed its point.

The sermon was still more perplexing. The preacher started on the assumption that Jesus was the Christ, the Savior. The usual distortions of thought ensued,—the strange misreadings of history,—the surprising statements in regard to the condition of the world before the Christ, and the altered state of affairs since,—the ascription to Christianity of every good thing in modern civilization, including the post-office and the electric telegraph. The historical Jesus had to be left out of view completely, and as completely all rational consideration of the world as it is.

The Christian Church understands its business better. It is careful, on the day that commemorates the incarnation of its God, to keep the thought as far as possible away from all reference to rational things. It is mythological and nothing else. The harmony of its observance is by this means preserved; the fiction is left in all its poetic beauty. Nothing interferes with the complete surrender of the fancy to the illusions of antiquity and authority.

The Puritans discountenanced the observance of Christmas on the ground that it was an ecclesiastical, in other words a heathen festival, fraught with spiritual danger through the influence of the priesthood. They believed in the incarnation, but preferred dramatizing it to the mind rather than to the senses. The Unitarians revive the observance on grounds of sentiment, using it for purposes of color in their rather bare edifice. But it will not do. The paint is too expensive as well as too thin. The knowing ones perceive at a glance that it is only paint that will not bear examination.

Nothing will convince a thoughtful person of the immense difference between Christianity and the religion of the first three gospels (the religion of Jesus), than a Christmas service in a Unitarian meeting-house. Nothing will make it more evident that the two cannot be put together, that the birth of the Christ and the birth of Jesus cannot be commemorated in unison, that they who profess a religion of the heart and the intelligence must abandon wholly the religion of the imagination—the pictorial religion which, by whatever great name dignified, is mythology.

O. B. F.

SHOCKING.

"Please don't say such things, Cousin Jack, they sound so wicked!"

The protest came from a girl of seventeen; a thoughtful damsel, the daughter of radical as well as liberal parents who had educated her with great care and with special reference to a love and reverence for truth. Though of Quaker family, her imagination had been carefully nurtured and developed; no one, however, would call her superstitious.

What wicked word had her cousin spoken, thus to shock her sensitive nature? She had faith enough in his goodness to believe that he would not willfully utter a profane word, and I can testify to his dislike for the self-conceit and mental narrowness that delights in dogmatism. He does not belong to the class of "reformers" whose assumed mission is to preach "in season and out of season."

I have met men, and quite as often women, who profess to delight in "shocking" the religious sentiments of other people; they regard it as a duty to let their friends know that the kingdom of heaven is within THEM, and their logic or conviction (as they are fond of calling it) requires absolute agreement; they must knock down or overwhelm all opposition, and annihilate all difference. They believe the whole truth is with them, and it matters not who is shocked or grieved when they proclaim it. Their motto is, fiat justitia, ruat cælum; and they interpret it: "Think as I do; agree with me; if you do not, you are a scoundrel."

A close observer of these "radical reformers" (this is the modest title they lay claim to) will be apt to discover that the heavens do fall, and fall to a pretty low depth, before such justice is satisfied. In the early days of antislavery warfare, the good cause was often imperilled by these egotists. I remember hearing one of these say from the platform: "If Jesus Christ should come here and say, 'Slavery is right,' I would cry out, 'Away with him!'" Perhaps nine tenths of the audience regarded Jesus as God; and, indeed, the religious feeling of most of them would probably have been less outraged, had the speaker insulted God instead of the memory of Jesus. The hall was soon emptied, save a few seats; and then, though I do not recollect the sequel, I am quite sure the speaker denounced the people he had driven from his presence, as proslavery bigots who could not refute him and therefore were afraid to listen to him. This man doubtless hated the slavery he was attacking, honestly and cordially. He was, as I remember him, a kind-hearted enthusiast; but was narrow and bigoted, and as truly a slave to his own conceit as any negro was a slave to a South Carolina planter.

But to return to our children. Cousin Jack, as has been intimated, was not a radical of the "shocking" school. Educated in an Orthodox college, but subsequently emancipated from Orthodox theology, he had learned that true reform, especially in what I may term religious sentiment, is a development of thought and character, an unfolding and revelation of the religious instinct that asserts the divine possibilities and realities of humanity. He believed in rooting as well as uprooting, and in growth quite as much as change. I have heard him say that successful revolution is the result of development rather than the cause of reform. When talking with this young girl, he supposed he knew his ground; for, though hitherto they had been separated, he had known her parents for many years, and from their tone of thought and conversation he inferred, without much consideration, that the children were free from the ordinary superstitions of the popular religion. What wicked and atrocious words had he uttered? What idol in this child's heart had he unwittingly disturbed?

The talk was about religious reformers and philosophers, and more especially their limitations. Theodore Parker had been mentioned; Luther, Melancthon, Socrates and Plato, Plutarch and Epictetus, and finally Jesus. When the young man was rebuked, he had just said: "It has often occurred to me that one great deficiency in the experience of Jesus was his ignorance of domestic life. He was never a husband; he was without children; and how impossible it is for a bachelor to understand, to apprehend, much less to comprehend, the duties and responsibilities, the joys and sorrows, the pleasure and sacrifice of married life! I wish Jesus had fallen in love with Martha; and if we knew the whole story of his life, I do believe we should find he was engaged to Mary."

It was at this point that his Cousin Mabel broke in with her, "Please don't, it sounds so wicked!" Of course Cousin Jack retreated precipitately, and, as well as he could, explained how much he regretted his mistake; quietly, however, expressing the hope that Mabel would, in time, consider the whole subject of religions carefully, and would tell him in after years, that from that moment she began to suspect herself of superstition, whereas, until then she had prided herself upon her freedom.

The conversation soon drifted into other channels, but not until after Mabel had said: "Our teacher is an Episcopalian, and nearly all of the girls go to the Episcopal Church; they think I'm awful because I don't believe in the atonement, and because I once told them I believed Jesus was a 'perfect man.' Kate Lewis actually cried when she found I play on the piano on Sunday. At first she said, 'Oh yes, you play sacred music,' but I answered, all good music was sacred to me, and I should rather play Strauss's Blue Danube, while Madge and Fred waltz, than a Te Deum. I know she went home and prayed for me."

Cousin Jack related this incident to me, telling me what more he would have said about Jesus and his exalted but incomplete life; and at another time I may repeat some of his crude notions to the readers of THE INDEX. The story however suggests another train of reflection.

Do we, men and women who have come to think of Jesus as a human being, and who perhaps regard Christ-worship as detrimental to spiritual growth,—do we sufficiently realize our responsibility to the rising generation? Do we see to it that our little ones have a fair chance in the world,—a fair start? It may be good to speak from the Free Religious platform, and to write learned essays for the magazine; but it is far better to plant the seed in the rich soil of our children's minds and hearts. We send them to schools where they listen to the reading of the Bible, not as a school book, but as a divinely-inspired volume, and where often times they are taught, even obliged, to say their prayers "for Jesus' sake." The social influence outside of the immediate home is almost entirely in the direction of the Church, Unitarian or Quaker possibly; but in every case they learn to "stand up for Jesus;" and quietly but surely the idol is builded upon the pedestal in their hearts. Meantime we are busy reforming the world; and, when by some chance we learn that our own flesh and blood is offended by our heresy we are amazed and confounded. Too late we learn that, busy with the public welfare, or it may be led by a false idea of liberalism, we have neglected a plain parental duty.

It would be impossible, and quite undesirable if possible, to restrict children to the society of any class or sect; but it is very proper to avoid sending them where they will be taught the popular superstitions and Christian dogmas, and where the instruction is perhaps enforced by the respect and love with which every true teacher inspires her pupils. It is entirely practicable for us to be intimate with our children, and through this intimacy to counteract such outside influence as seems to us to be prejudicial to proper growth and perfect freedom.

Let every one who has the control of children consider to what extent he is responsible for the false idols that have crept into his own household, and what he is doing to save his children from the mental struggle and spiritual agony which so many men have experienced in their effort to escape the influence of early religious education.

R. P. H.

THE RELATION OF FREE RELIGION AND SOCIAL REFORMS.

II.

What are the methods and what is the spirit of Free Religion, which we propose to apply to all the social problems of life, in contrast to those of absolute authority and ecclesiastical prescription, which we condemn?

The term Free Religion itself is often criticized as being vague and unsatisfactory, and wanting in positive expression. It is thought to be aimless and barren of results, because it does not declare to us what special doctrines it will enforce, nor what institutions it will sustain or supplant.

Those who lay stress upon religion do not acknowledge the necessity of freedom, while those who have been so galled by restraint that their only cry is for entire and absolute freedom, object to the substantive religion as being in itself a hindrance and a fetter to the human mind. The words might just as well be reverted, and then we should have religious freedom, which has a more familiar and popular sound.

But in whatever order the words stand, do they not represent very well the broad comprehensive character of the movement which now, having passed beyond its revolutionary and destructive stage, must include within itself, in order to have any creative or vital power, the two opposite modes of all action—Freedom and Religion, Liberty and Law, Independence and Loyalty, Discipline and Spontaneity? All these fine words, though seemingly opposite terms, really express that polarity of mental forces which is just as necessary to their harmonious action in all human life, whether social or individual, as the balance of the centripetal and centrifugal forces is to the harmonious revolution of the planets around their centres.

In an absolute government there is no law, only Will prescribing regulations for the convenience of its exercise. The Emperor does not seek the organic law of society; he imposes his will upon it; and hence, though there may be outward calm, there is neither real order nor peace. Accident may at any time destroy all that tyranny has accomplished. The assassin's knife is powerful in Russia and Turkey; but how little did the bullet of Booth affect the institutions of America!

In the anarchy of savage life there is as little real freedom of development; no man can do what he wills from fear of his neighbor, who is perpetually hindering and injuring him. He has nothing, because he is liable to be despoiled of it by any one who is stronger than he. It is only when the true inward law is found and organized, that every man is free; that is, in true relations, and able to work out the real desire and purpose of his being.

Free Religion, therefore, recognizes by its first term the entire liberty of inquiry, expression, and action; but in its second, it also asserts the inward and eternal law of right to which everything must ultimately be referred. It does not make this law, nor does it even declare it on authority; it seeks for it and gives it fitting expression, and endeavors to apply it in practice as far and as fast as it is discovered. It believes this law to be, not imposed by any arbitrary will, but to inhere in the very nature of things; to be the expression and result of the perfection of power, wisdom, and goodness in the creative energy.

To refer to my chemical illustration—it is impossible for the molecules, say of muriatic acid and sodium, to unite until they are restored to a condition of freedom by solution or heat; but then they will unite according to the law of their affinities, and no amount either of solution or of pressure can bind them in a lasting chemical union in any other than their due proportions.

So we believe it to be with the human heart and with human society. We have faith in an eternal law of right and good according to which all conditions and all acts should be adjusted. It is the province of religion to discover, enforce, and apply this law by the use of all the faculties of the soul; by the heart and conscience, the intuitive perceptions, and active imaginations, as well as by the logical understanding. But in order to secure this knowledge and application of this law, perfect freedom of inquiry is necessary, and every individual must be allowed to trust his own convictions.

These two principles of freedom of inquiry and allegiance to truth are expressed in the name of Free Religion. They are opposed to the doctrines of binding ecclesiastical authority, which maintains that the individual must not reason out his convictions, but accept the doctrines given him by his superiors. They are equally at variance with the idea of an established Church to which it is lawful to give assent, without belief. The true free religionist is as passionate a lover of truth, and should deem it as imperative a duty to bear his testimony to it, as the Puritan or the Quaker. Indifference to truth is the great evil of established religions; and so mischievous has been its influence on intellectual veracity, that all the coarse opposition to religion and harsh materialism of the last century seem to have been needed as its counterpoise. When Henry Ward Beecher says that, if he had positive conviction that there is no future life, he would conceal his knowledge, because he believes a seemingly comfortable delusion is better than the knowledge of the truth, it is refreshing to hear the plain talk of avowed atheists, who have too much faith to conceal their unbelief.

It is in this spirit of independence and loyalty, it is by this method of free inquiry and entire fidelity to truth, that we hope to obtain a solution of all those trying questions which now agitate society. This work will not be done by any one body or set of men called by any name, but by all, in every church or sect or party, who are really working in this spirit, although they may vary in the means they use and the results they produce. Next best to a success is an honest failure, and with freedom and loyalty no effort can ever be wholly in vain. This method is not a rapid one. Time is needed for all processes of solution and recombination; but if the method be correct, the final result will preserve all that is valuable in the past, as well as secure all that we hope for in the future.

The results may often be very startling; we may find that many of our cherished opinions are not well founded, and that some revered institutions are not worthy of preservation. Such phenomena may lead us to revise our processes and make sure of our calculations, but they should never make us despair of our future nor distrust the great principles of truth and freedom. Let us not mistake the fumes and effervescence of our escaping gases for the real power that is at work. After those have passed harmlessly off, we shall find the purer crystals of truth remaining, healthful as the salt which nourishes us, and brilliant and beautiful as the diamond which is the symbol of purity and light.

E. D. C.

EVENING NOTES: THE BOSTON RADICAL CLUB.

AN ACT OF FAITH.

The parlors at No. 13, Chestnut Street, were crowded with people young and old, eager to hear Mr. Weiss. To do him justice I should transfer his essay entire to my report; but to that proceeding he might take exceptions, so he and all readers of THE INDEX must suffer what degree of harm the document receives at my hands.

"What a great part," said Mr. Weiss, "has been played by the word Faith upon the world's stage since the old Aryans in Northern India separated into two tendencies, one of them to develop the religions of Brahma and of Buddha, the other to carry the Empire of ideas westward through so many forms! Human feeling has put the word into italics in every European language. Kings may be as profligate as they please, only they must be defenders of the Faith; and the subjects of each may love each other as Christians ought; but they are bound to hate and fight, as only Christians can, the opposite believers. Moral and industrial development has been postponed to the exigency of this word, which flowed out of a conviction that a man's heart may be pure, but his soul cannot be saved unless his mind shows the orthodoxy of one or the other party. Wherever a sincere conviction reigns, that eternal welfare depends upon a holding of certain opinions upon invisible objects, it becomes a very grave matter to force the right opinion, graver than to insist upon good conduct; and any means may be resorted to, whether the souls to be saved relish the proceeding or not. If a man is just sinking for the third time, pluck him by the hair, grapple him anywhere with a boat-hook at the peril of maiming, to keep life in him. And this instruction has been strictly heeded, with a fulness of purpose such as only some passion for sincerity can raise in the human breast. It is a long and mighty story, filled with groups picturesque, imposing, pitiful, but more contemptible so long as we view them remembering that Faith was a matter of life and death, the only true concern."

Mr. Weiss proceeded to state that daylight has penetrated within the narrow conception, disenchantment has rolled up the screen, and asks, "Was Faith involved with it, and has that too disappeared?"

The question interests us none the less because the old misguided sincerity has been so honey-combed by the climate of moral and industrial progress. But what kind of Faith is it that prevents our modern life from growing contemptible, and our heroism less than sublime?

You expect to go to heaven; you expect to rejoin departed friends; you expect a general system of beneficence to rule the other world; you expect some compensation for the ills of this. But what you have no evidential reason for expecting, you have no right to call an object of Faith. You surmise that the Creator is a person, either because you feel your own distinct volition and mental purpose, and perceive Nature's tendency to unity; or you surmise that God is impersonal, because your feeling of distinct personality is faint, and you seem to be a phenomenon of the correlating forces which rule Nature and give her an appearance of design. You surmise that the finest attributes of your own soul must have pre-existed in an Infinitesoul, and perhaps you are bold enough to surmise that your worst attributes must be derived from the same source; or, on the other hand, your surmise is that the complex of forces in your lines of inheritance have developed you from the animal world, and that you are a case of Nature's unconscious selection. Which of all these surmises are so perfectly derived from evidence as to constitute an act of Faith? Not one of them. Some one of them may turn out to be true, but in the meantime we possess only the strong presumption towards one or the other. Mankind cannot even be a unit in one act of presumptiveness. In general we may say that no presumptions that tend towards the invisible, and undertake to make niches in it for definite objects, can correctly be called achievements of Faith. The vastest human comprehension cannot name, perceive, posit, and interpret Deity. We can only draw conclusions from what we know, and that provides us no equivalence to the fact, but leaves the fact continually open. A man stands where his intelligence can have sure footing—on the earth, or in the untrampled depths of the sky; nothing is so remote that cannot yield to his analysis, and, when it does, his person is to that extent enlarged. As fast as we invent the tools of research, more space surrenders to us: the atom is not too deep, nor the nebula too remote. Thus we learn to follow preconceived lines, and pitch our camp in fresh places every day. But what is this camp in which we live? It is the intelligent method which our brains have learned from an observation of Nature which has continued for thousands of years; it has convinced us at last that remote things are not invisible, but that their causes are. And as we become aware of this, an act of Faith appears to be the expectation which arises from observing, not the surmising that comes of instinct. We have a right to expect that, whenever in any direction the world responds to the course which our minds have taken up with a sincere hope of discovery, it will continue to respond, and like a magnet bristle with congenial facts. The ground for an act of Faith is furnished gradually by discovering how this world is constructed, for it is the stem on which our souls blossom. If we begin by teaching man the whole structure of this world, we can afford to leave the next world and the whole region of the invisible to each man, a free pasture where he may wander at will and crop what theories best suit his disposition. Only one absolute condition should be uniformly enforced—that all men and women must take care to become intelligent; for the world needs inhabitants who spend their life in conforming to its laws, not in cherishing anomalies about points which used to belong to the domain of Faith. Teach laws, structures, point out the tendencies of facts, bring the farthest and the minutest atom into the horizon of thought, banish from schools everything that warps the mind into the old direction, though it be called a Holy Bible, for one day in the week is quite enough for teaching superstition. See to it that the other six days are so spent in the society of the world's great laws, that Sunday itself will let the Bible loose to speak its natural language of piety and righteousness, and forbid it to lisp a word to contradict the immutable consistency of the Universe. Then our earnest expectations which set forth to take possession of the future will all be colored and sweetened with this wholesome earth-sap which knowledge draws into our veins. Knowledge is the most subtle of all chemists. It serves this earth as though it were a drop submitted to its analysis, and it precipitates that black juice which used to set men's blood on fire, and make them mad with each other because this man's God was not a Trinity, that man's Christ not supernatural, these people's bread and wine not his body, their heaven not judiciously balanced with a hell. That bitter drop of gall, distilled from all the earth's poisons and poured into the porches of man's ear while his intellect was in a drowse,

—Whose effect
Holds such an enmity with blood of man,
That, swift as quicksilver, it comes through
The natural gales and alloys of the body,"— knowledge will be a continual prohibition of its manufacture. What is knowledge but a great act of faith? The expectations which are bred by it are worthy to be covered by that name. The human soul is not going to be put out because knowledge is turned into it. We need not whimper much about the soul. As soon grow melancholy with a doubt that music, if transcribed from the old four-stringed lyre of the Greeks to the manifold complexity of the modern orchestra, was going to fall into decay. Anticipate an expansion like that, which will call out of the soul new combinations, and group her variety with harmonies of truth and emotion compared with which the old music of religious faith is a twanging on one string.

In concluding, Mr. Weiss considered the need of the republic for a religion that should teach it how to consecrate acts of Faith. What are the elements by which we live? The material has by this time accumulated so richly, as contributions from every quarter come to spots where knowledge would fain build, that it is time to begin. We want, for instance, to engage the wisest brains to contrive, upon the basis of the law of co-operation, an adjustment of labor and capital. It will be a sublime day for religion that shall dawn over a whole republic formed, mined, forged, rivetted, bridged, aqueducted, shod, clothed, and tinkered, by co-operation. The country is not crying for a tract. It wants abatement of moral nuisances, protection for the unprotected, a compulsory spelling-book for every child. We want the greatest number of people introduced into as large a number of opportunities as possible,—not church extension, nor running in debt to outdo each other in parade of brick and mortar piety; but we want extension of rights, and of respect, and of municipal usages over the whole world: we want liberty and safety put into an equation.

Our expectation is for improvement, but we can only have faith in facts. They are the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen.

Mr. Sargent was the first to break the silence after the applause following Mr. Weiss's address. He did so by expressing his cordial assent to what had been said. But the time belonged to others, and he summoned Dr. Bartol to the stand to bear his testimony. Dr. Bartol was not sure that he might not be performing an act of self-sacrifice rather than an act of faith, for he had to confess that seems to run in the same lines with the essayist's. He did not mean to offer a criticism, but the independent view of another mind. His main thought was that faith is genesis and not revelation. Faith hangs on the breasts of Imagination, is suckled by it alone. Faith is too great to be a conclusion.

I have to confess with regret that it was impossible for me to hear Dr. Bartol distinctly enough to report him, the fault, however, being neither his nor mine. Always at the end of the essay there is a general movement; some are taking their leave, while others move forward to fill the vacant places that they may the better hear, so that the result is, no one not in the immediate neighborhood of the speaker can well keep the drift of his remarks. It is not improbable that Dr. Bartol will find some fitting occasion to present at length his views of Faith; and I shall then strive to secure them for THE INDEX. This is, however, only my own expectation, for which I have simply a basis in the nature of the case. But the case justifies so good an expectation.

At the close of Dr. Bartol's remarks, after a few remarks from Miss Peabody, Mr. Frederick Douglas and Professor Fiske were invited to speak, but declined. Mr. Towne responded to an invitation, and expressed his belief that fidelity was a better word than faith for modern use. He was not disposed to be always looking forward: the present had its claims, so that, were we but faithful to the demands of to-day, the tomorrow would find us ready for its revelations. We need not be so anxious to get a knowledge of the universe, as to make the kingdom of God a reality in our own little universe. To be faithful to the covenants of life is the sum and substance of religion.

The thought that Miss Peabody enlarged upon and illustrated was that with which Mr. Weiss's essay closed: "Life is so noble that we decline to suspect. Thank heaven that the act of living is an act of Faith."

Literary Department.

NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS.—All books designed for review in these columns must be addressed to THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

RECEIVED.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY. By O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York: DAVID G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place, 1873. 16 mo. pp. 328.

ROME AND THE PAPACY. A History of the Men, Manners, and Temporal Government of Rome in the Nineteenth Century as administered by the priests. Including the Life of Gian-Marco Mastai, now Pope Pius IX. Being Commentaries on "The Roman Question" of E. ABOUT. By F. PETRUCELLI DE LA GATTINA. Translated from the French by ROBERT E. PATRICKSON, M. D., Philadelphia; T. B. PATRICKSON & BROTHERS, 300 Chestnut Street. 12 mo. pp. 317.

INSPIRATIONS. Rhymes Few and FIDAL.—IMPRESSIONS. Lines Chiefly Personal.—INCEPTIONS. Fragments.—AN HOUR WITH EDWARD CAPERS. An Address.—All by W. ORMOND. Bristol (England); J. B. TAYLOR & SONS, Printers, Thomas Street.

SCIENTIFIC AND INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION. Its Importance to our Country. Lecture in behalf of the Toledo University of Arts and Trades, in Odeon Hall, Toledo, Ohio, December 30, 1872. By G. B. STEPHENS, of Detroit, Michigan. Detroit DAILY POST BOOK AND JOB PRINTING ESTABLISHMENT, 1872.

THE YEAR-BOOK OF THE UNITARIAN CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES FOR 1873. With Calendar adapted for use throughout the Country. Boston: AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION, 42 Chauncy Street.

THE FREEMASON. December, 1872. St. Louis; G. F. GAULEY, editor.

MENSCHENTUM. BLAETTER FÜR FÜRER SITTICHES LEBEN. Philadelphia, December 1, 1872.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW. January, 1873. Boston; L. C. BOWLES.

DER JESUITISMUS GEHEIM NACH DER NATUR GEZEICHNET VON EINEM BEKEHRTEN JESUITEN (Jesuitism, faithfully drawn from nature by a converted Jesuit). Leipzig, 1872. 8vo. pp. vi, 116.

BEITRÄGE ZUR AUFKLEARUNG UEBER DIE GEMEINSCHAFTLICHKEIT DES JESUITENORDENS. Von GRAFEN FRANZ DEYM. Zweite Auflage. (Contributions to the Enlightenment of the Public concerning the Perilous Character of the Order of the Jesuits. By Count Francis Deym. Second Edition). Leipzig, 1872. 8vo., pp. 52.

Ever since Pius IX. issued his famous Encyclica with its Syllabus Errorum, the attention of the civilized world has been largely directed to the operations of that mighty, sleepless, and utterly unscrupulous power, the Society of Jesus—whose organic principle is despotism by means of religion, and whose purpose is the destruction of all the fruits of modern culture and the reduction of mankind to a state of permanent slavery under the Dalai Lama at Rome. The Papal manifesto of December, 1864, was neither more nor less than the platform of the Jesuit party in the Catholic Church. The Jesuits were the inspirers of it, as they had been of the dogmatization of the immaculate conception ten years before; and when the whole enlightened world united in expressions of indignation and disgust at its shameless arrogance, they were the first to leap forth to its defence. Never before had they ventured to make, either directly or by proxy, such a complete and defiant public declaration of their theories and aims. We may be sure it was not done without long premeditation and most careful and thorough preparation. The dogma of the immaculate conception was the first throw of the dice by these bold gamblers. When all the opposition to the definition fell flat, and when, after the fatal 8th of December, 1864, this astounding anachronism was accepted and applauded by the Catholic world as the very truth of God, they might well feel that the whole power of the Roman Hierarchy was already, to all intents and purposes, in their hands. The second throw, bolder far than the first, was the promulgation of the Syllabus, and the third, bolder still, was its dogmatization in 1870. Inflated by this series of brilliant successes, and emboldened by the complete intra-ecclesiastical triumph over all their adversaries, they now looked confidently towards the realization of their ambition in the extra-ecclesiastical world of politics.

The most dangerous and persistent opposition to the machinations of the Jesuits had come from Germany. The greatest obstacle in the way of the Romanization of mankind, the one which must be removed before any further progress could be made in that direction, was in Germany. Germany, as united and strong politically as it was free and powerful intellectually, was more to be feared by the Jesuitized Church than anything else on the face of the earth. To prevent the real unification of the German people was an object to the accomplishment of which the Company of Jesus bent its mightiest energies. After the events of 1866 there was everywhere a systematic stirring up of dissensions between Catholics and Protestants, and especially between the Catholic and semi-Catholic States, on the one hand, and those decidedly Protestant, on the other. The Catholic pulpits, the Catholic press, and the Catholic casinos and associations of every sort, were used almost exclusively for this political purpose. Finally, when everything seemed ripe for a fatal blow, the next and boldest throw of the dice was made. France was precipitated into a war which it was hoped would effectually divide the sympathies of the various German States, and result in national overthrow, in the reestablishment of the old petty factions, the return of former political importance, and the ultimate social and intellectual degeneracy of the people. But it soon became evident that political and especially military forces were not quite so easily controlled in the interest of mediæval ideas as ecclesiastical councils. The war ended quite otherwise than was expected. Still the children of Loyola did not despair. They still hoped to retrieve by success in the forum what they had lost by defeat in the field. Systematic political agitation was again taken up with renewed vigor, and every measure which looked towards the completion of political unity was opposed both in the legislature and out of it, with the utmost vehemence. Conflicts of jurisdiction were fomented between Church and State, and no stone was left unturned in the effort to make it appear that the government was making war upon the Catholic religion. The consequence of all this was a defeat even more disastrous than the first—the expulsion of the Order of the Jesuits from the German Empire.

The events thus rapidly and imperfectly sketched have produced a flood of books, pamphlets, and printed addresses of various character and calibre concerning the origin, history, principles, practices, and tendencies of the Jesuit Order. So much has already been written on these topics that, apart from the history of recent operations, there is probably little that is new to be learned. The chief value of the best of the works which have lately appeared consists in the presentation of known facts in a more popular and more accessible form. This is the great merit of the anonymous little book the title of which stands above. It is evidently just what it purports to be—the production of an ex-Jesuit; and is really a mine of popular information concerning both the internal organization and the external activity of the Society. It is based largely upon the "constitutions" and regulations of the Order, and upon personal experience as to their practical working. The brochure by Count Francis Deym is also valuable as a record of personal observation and experience, particularly in regard to the training of Novitiates and to the course of education in Jesuit Colleges.

It is a laudable quality in both writers that, while exposing the perniciousness of the Order, they mean and endeavor to be perfectly fair in their representations, preferring to err on the side of leniency rather than on that of severity. In one instance, however, there is either an excess of charity or a want of thoroughness. Both writers unite in deprecating the charge that the Jesuits sanction the maxim: "The end sanctifies the means." On this point the ex-Jesuit is very positive. He says:—

"As of universal applicability, this maxim is not accepted by the Jesuits either theoretically or practically. The learned Fathers are neither so imprudent nor so irrational; and their opponents, by imputing this maxim to them, have helped them not a little, since it was easy enough for the Jesuits to demonstrate the absurdity and odiousness of such a charge. Thus the famous preacher, Pater Roh, could recently promise one thousand thalers to any one who was able to show that the above maxim was contained either literally or substantially in any Jesuit work, and in spite of manifold efforts no one has yet earned the prize." (p. 5).

Now, this is really an important matter, and if the facts in the case were correctly given, it would certainly be a point gained for the Jesuits. But, fortunately or unfortunately, the case does not stand as put by this author. In reality, Pater Roh (nomen omen) never had the remotest intention of making an honest proposition to the above effect; that is, he never meant to pay the money if the task were performed. The alleged offer was simply a piece of impudent bravado, first uttered at the close of a series of protracted meetings (a so-called "mission") held by the Jesuits at Frankfurt-on-the-Main in 1852. The language used, as reported by Roh himself (vide "Das alte Lied," p. 3), was: "To any one who will exhibit to the Law Faculty of Heidelberg or Bonn a book written by a Jesuit, in which according to the judgment of the Faculty the infamous maxim, 'The end sanctifies the means,' is contained, either in these words or in words of like meaning, I will on order of the Faculty pay 1000 florins Rheinish currency." The dishonest thing about this was that Roh never applied to either of the above-named faculties to decide the point, in case any such work should be presented, well knowing that without such personal application on his part no faculty would have anything to do with it, and he could not be held for the money. This is the kernel of the whole swindle. It is a fine specimen of the brazen effrontery for which the Order is notorious.

As a matter of fact, Jesuit authors have again and again commended the maxim in question, both as correct in theory and justifiable in practice. It may be found, for instance, in Busenbaum's Medulla Theologia Moralis (Lib. iv, cap. iii, dub. vii, art. ii), a book which more than a century ago had already gone through upwards of two hundred editions. The form in which the maxim occurs is: cum finis est licitus, etiam media sunt licita. In Escobar's Untv. Theol. Moral. (vol. iv, lib. xxxiii, sec. ii, prob. 65, n. 300, p. 338), occurs the following: Finis enim dat specificationem actibus, et ex bono vel malo fine boni vel mali redduntur (For the end gives to actions their specific character, &c.). In connection with this passage, the following authors are cited as teaching the same doctrine: Sotus, Toletus, Navarrus, Vasquez, Sayro, Lessius, Sanchez, Sylvester, Zumella, and others. It would be easy to adduce a large number of passages from Jesuit authors to the same effect; but the foregoing are sufficient to indicate the reason why Pater Roh did not choose to put his one thousand florins in any real peril.

With the exception, however, of this one point, we have no hesitation in recommending both the above books as faithful and forcible statements of fact.

FINE AT THE FAIR, and other Poems. By Robert Browning. Boston: J. R. Osgood & Co. Toledo: Brown & Faunce.

The "other poems" are but two in number, "Hervé Riel," at the end of the volume, a short and simple story vigorously rendered, and "Prince Hohenstiel-Gehwangau, Savior of Society," filling more than a hundred pages, and presenting the late French Emperor pleading his own defence at the bar of history. The plea in substance is, that to save what society already had was his sufficient mission, and that he had only obeyed the logic of this mission, and failed more by fate than by fault. He admits, however, that it is far easier to "talk inside the soul" in explanation of motives and actions, than to put the plea into words, which "somehow deflect, as the best cannon ever rifled will." The interest of the poem, though, is less in this plea than in the constant depths of thought in the poet's own mind, which we look into while he is personating Napoleon. Thus it is clearly Browning himself who says of Delly:—

"I know that he is there as I am here,
By the same proof, which seems no proof at all,
It so exceeds familiar forms of proof."

So of this suggestion about individuality:—

"I have his bidding to perform; but mind
And body, all of me, though made and meant
For that sole service, must consent, concert,
With my own self, and nobody beside,
How to effect the same; God helps no else."

To other men, to each and every one,
And to the law: what likeliest? God, perchance,
Grants each new man, by some as new a mode,
Intercommunication with himself.
How it succeeds, he knows: I only know
That varied modes of creaturship abound,
Implying just as varied intercourse
For each with the Creator of them all.
Each has his own mind, and no other's mode."

The "Savior of Society," though aiming at "no such proud task" for himself, is made to assure us that—

"History shows you men whose master-touch
Not so much modifies as makes anew,
Minds that transmute, nor need rest at all.
A breath of God made manifest in flesh
Subjects the world to change from time to time,
Alters the whole conditions of our race
Abruptly, not by unperceived degrees,
Nor play of elements already there,
But quite new heaven, leavening the lump,
And liker, so, the natural process."

Popular divinity gets a thrust in the following:

"How thanklessly you view things! there's the root
Of the evil, source of the entire mistake:
You see no worth! the world, Nature, and life,
Unless we change what is to what may be;
Which means,—may be! the brain of one of you!"

A life to live,—and such a life! a world
To learn, one's lifetime in,—and such a world!
How ever did the foolish pass for wise
By calling life a burden, man a fly
Or worm, or what's most insignificant?"

To these wise fools, who cry out upon man's littleness by way of reverence to the power shown in the universe, the poet says:—

"There are two things! the world still wiser folk Accept,—intelligence and sympathy."

I'll tell you: all the more I know mankind,
The more I thank God, like my grandmother,
For making me a little lower than
The angels, honor-clothed and glory-crowned.
This is the honor,—that no thing I know,
Feel, or conceive, but I can make my own
—know, by use of hand or head or heart:
This is the glory,—that in all conceived,
Or felt or known,—I recognize a mind
Not mine, but like mine,—for the double joy
—making all things for me, and me for Him.
There's folly for you at this time of day!
So think it! and enjoy your ignorance
Of what—no matter for the worthy's name—
Wisdom set working in a noble heart.
When he, who was earth's best geometer
Up to that time of day, consigned his life
With its results into one matchless book,—
The triumph of the human mind so far,
All in geometry man yet could do,—
And then wrote on the dedication page,

In place of name the universe applauds,
"But, God, what a geometer art thou!"

Of the great man's work we read:—

"When old things terminate, and new commence,
A solitary great man's worth the world.
God takes the business into his own hands
At such time: who creates the novel flower
Contrives to guard, and give it breathing room."

Both philosophy against common life, and religion against philosophy, are sharply hit in the following pithy verses:—

"Be Kant crowned king o' the castle in the air!
Hans Slouch—his own and children's mouths to feed
I! the hovel on the ground—wants meat, nor chews
'The pure Critique of Reason' in exchange."

Do not mistake me! You, too, have your rights.
Hans must not burn Kant's house above his head
Because he cannot understand Kant's book;
And still less must Hans' pastor burn Kant's self Because Kant understands some books too well."

This again has a keen edge:—

"See the sage, with the hunger for the truth,
And see his system that's all true, except
The one weak place that's stanchioned by a lie!
The moralist, that walks with head erect
I! the crystal air of charity so long,
Until a stumble, and the man's one mire!
Philanthropy undoes the social knot
With axe-edge; makes love room twist head and trunk!
Religion—but enough; the thing's too clear!"

The poet speaks of reverence as

"The quality imperative in man," and suggests that it is the underlying power in superstition. He asks for freedom in thought and candor in comparing thoughts:—

"Who thinks,—would he have no one think beside?
Who knows,—who does,—must other learning die,
And action perish?"

Show me the great man would engage his peer
Rather by grinning, "Cheat, thy gold is brass!"
Than grunting, "Perfect piece of purest ore!"
Still is it less good mintage, this of mine?"

Once more, he says:—

"For truth and right, and only right
And truth,—right, truth, on the absolute scale of God,
No pettiness of man's admeasurement,—
In such case only, and for such one cause,
Fight your hearts out, whatever fate betide
Hands energetic to the utmost!
Lie not! Endure no lie which needs your heart
And hand to push it out of mankind's path!"

In the longer poem of "Fifine," Mr. Browning draws a man's heart feeling the temptation to wander from the pure fidelity of marriage. Don Juan and his wife Elvire walk through the scene of a strolling show, in which Fifine is the vulgar female attraction. He argues about Fifine's character and low life, very subtly suggesting that beneath the vice which is her business she preserves in her own fashion a pure individuality, with some sacred instincts of her nature. But instead of hoping from this her rise to a better general life, he permits the doubt whether he might not, just for the experience of it, go down to her level, as one would try a swim in the sea. Still his mind comes clearly back to the truth of fidelity, admitting that the theories which he has spun are word-bubbles, and the conclusion of meditative discussion is:—

"So shall the seasons fleet, while our two selves abide:
E'en past astonishment how sunrise and springtide
Could tempt one forth to swim; the more if time appoints
That swimming grow a task for one's rheumatic joints.
Such honest, elastic house, behold, constitute
Our villa! Be but flesh and blood, and smile to boot!
Enter for good and all! Then fate bolt fast the door,
Shut you and me inside, never to wander more!"

Yet, at the last moment, despite truth settled, the man slips away to find Fifine, just for five minutes—or for sale! The epilogue shows him deserted and miserable, until by Elvire's return and forgiveness he takes a new and unmerited lease of life. He had looked to death as the end, but Elvire utters this last word:—

"I end with—Love is all and Death is naught."

The effect of the poem is distinct and strong enough, yet much of the expression is too obscure for common understanding. It is the jewels of occasional pure thought which will most reward the reader. Take, for instance, these verses, embodying the poet's clear looking into the human background of Fifine's low life:

"I want put down in black and white
What compensating joy, unknown and infinite,
Turns lawlessness to law, makes destitution wealth,
Vice virtues, and disease of soul and body health."
"An infant born, perchance, as sensitive and nice
As any soul of you, proud dame, whom destiny
Keeps uncontaminated from stigma of the sty
She wallows in! You draw back skirts from filth like her."

Who possibly braves scorn, if scorned, she minister
To age, woe, and disease of parents one or both;
Nay, peradventure, stoops to degradation, loath
That some just budding sister, the dew yet on the rose,
Should have to share in turn the ignoble trade."

"No creature's made so mean,
But that, some way, it boasts, could we investigate,
Its supreme worth; foibles, by ordinance of fate,
Its momentary task; gets glory all its own;
Tastes triumph in the world, pre-eminent, alone."
"As firm is my belief, quick sense perceives the same
Self-vindicating flash illustrate every man
And woman of our mass, and prove, throughout the plan,
No detail, but, in place allotted it, was prime
And perfect."

"Death reads the title clear,
What each soul for itself conquered from out things here."

These again are reflections which show a just estimate of many deep things:—

"Alack, our life is lent,
From first to last, the whole, for this experiment

Of proving what I say,—that we ourselves are true!
I would there were one voyage, and then no more to do
But tread the firm land, tempt the uncertain sea no more!"

"Life means—learning to abhor
The false, and love the true,—truth treasured snatch by snatch
Walks counted at their worth."

"When finger finds out finger in the dark
O' the world, there's fire and life and truth there, link but hands
And pass the secret on! till, link by link, expands
The circle, lengthens out the chain; and one embrace
Of high with low is found uniting the whole race."

"Food o' the soul, the stuff that's made
To furnish man with thought and feeling, is purveyed
Substantially the same from age to age, with change
Of the outside only for successive feasters."

"We must learn to live,
(use-hardened at all points, not bare and sensitive,
But plated for defence, nay, furnished for attack,
With spikes at the due places, that neither front nor back
May suffer in that squeeze with nature we find—life."

"I found one must abide One's scorn of the soul's case, distinct from the soul's self."

A HAND-BOOK OF CHEMICAL TECHNOLOGY.
By Rudolph Wagner, Ph. D. Professor of Chemical Technology at the University of Würzburg. Translated and Edited, from the eighth German edition, with extensive additions, by Wm. Crookes, F. R. S. With 338 illustrations. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Toledo: Brown & Faunce. 1 Vol., 8vo, 761 pp.

The application of science to the varied forms of industry, the learned name for which is technology, may lead us into mechanics, or mechanical technology, which deals with outward changes of materials, as the making of iron rails, spinning of wool, &c.; or into chemistry, or chemical technology, which deals with internal changes of materials, like the brewing of beer from barley and hops, the making of soap from oils and fats, the turning of iron into steel, the making of gas from coals, and a hundred other processes of the greatest practical importance. Dr. Wagner has been for many years an eminent and standard authority upon the subject of his book, and the work as now edited is accepted by experts in this knowledge as the best in the English language. Eight editions since 1850 at once prove the success of the publication and assure us that it has followed the progress of investigation, and now represents, with the translator's additions, the latest results of research. To all who are engaged in any industry which involves the application of chemical knowledge, the volume cannot but be indispensable, while to students of science and studious readers, it will serve as an admirable cyclopædia of one of the most interesting fields of applied science. E. C. T.

PHILOSOPHICAL PAPERS.

II.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

A DOCTRINE OF INFINITY.

FROM AN ARTICLE ON "THE CONDITIONED AND THE UNCON-DITIONED," IN THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW
FOR OCTOBER, 1864.

There has been much misapprehension of the doctrine that the Infinite is only negatively known. The words infinite and absolute have been wands of necromancy in the hands of philosophical sorcerers. They denote attributes, and represent objects by metonymy alone. Infinite expresses the attribute of illimitability; as applied to Space and Time, Absolute expresses the attribute of totality (incomposite unity or indivisibility), and, as applied to God, the attribute of independent existence. Their use as ambiguous middle terms has given rise to unwarrantable conclusions; what is true only of the attributes has been transferred most illogically to the objects in which they inhere. Thus, because we have only negative knowledge of the infinite, it is inferred that we have no positive knowledge of God. We shall treat hereafter of this sophism; at present we shall consider the true interpretation of the doctrine that our cognition of infinity is purely negative.

It has been argued by Fénelon, that finitude, not infinitude, expresses the real negation; that nothing is so negative as a limit; and that to deny all limit is to make a double negation, which is tantamount to a positive affirmation. This ingenious argument confounds Being with Knowledge. All existence, whether finite or infinite, is real; the distinction of positive and negative belongs to thought alone, and arises solely as the product of the act of comparison. In real being, the attributes of finitude and infinitude co-exist in different objects; in thought they may also co-exist in different objects, but become mutually exclusive, like all contradictories, in relation to the same object. But this tentative application of predicates to objects can take place only in thought; hence the terms positive and negative express simply the results of an intellectual process. The question is not, then, which term, finite or infinite, expresses a real negation in being; for such a question is either meaningless, or convertible into the self-answered question—which term expresses a real limitation? But the true inquiry is,—which term denotes a positive attribute, and which the simple absence of this attribute, in thought? Now any attribute is cog-nized as positive in relation to an object in which it inheres; and the same attribute is cognized as negative in relation to an object in which it does not inhere. That is, all attributes which are positively cognizable at all, must be cognizable in actual presentations of experience; and, inasmuch as a comparison of these presentations shows that the same attributes do not characterize them all, the distinction of positive and negative, that is, present and absent, is developed in consciousness. With reference to any particular object, a present attribute is called positive, an absent one is called negative; but in the latter case, the positive attribute itself, as formerly cog-nized in other objects, must be first conceived, and constitute the basis of the negative conception. It is the character of the predication alone, as copulative or disjunctive, which determines the positive or negative character of the attribute.

Hence the question at issue is, which of the two attributes, finite or infinite, is presentatively cog-nized in experience, and thus becomes the basis for the conception of the other? It needs but to remember that every object whatever of presentative cognition is limited, and that the term finite expresses this universal attribute of limitation, in order to decide the question. Limitation alone is positively cognized in experience, while illimitation is a deduction of the reason. Presence of limitation constitutes the finite, absence of limitation constitutes the infinite. The former is positive, the latter is negative; but positive limitation is the basis of both conceptions. This is necessarily the case with human intelligences, to which the finite constitutes the primordial data of knowledge; while to the Divine Intelligence such reasoning is altogether inapplicable.
Our stand-point is the finite, not the infinite; to us, therefore, the infinite is a negative idea. But this, as has just been shown, is very far from being the "negation of thought."

The idea of infinity, thus interpreted, originates neither in the faculties of sensuous presentation and representation, nor in those which cognize relations among relations of whatever degree of abstractness; in short, it cannot in any wise be deduced from the finite. But it is contained in those ideas of the higher reason which reveal the absolute and necessary correlates of things, and without which intelligence itself would be impossible. It was shown in our former article, for instance, that infinity is an integral element in the triple synthesis which constitutes the idea of Space, as distinguished from Extension; the antithesis of finite and infinite, therefore, is seen to be a priori necessary. The perfect clearness of the idea of infinity is lost only when the imagination attempts to realize it in a sensuous conception of some imaginable object, and thus creates a gratuitous and perplexing antimony. Abandoning all attempts at sensuous representation, the mind finds no difficulty whatever in comprehending the meaning of illimitability.

Passing from the nature and genesis of the idea of infinity, taken in its abstractness as a pure attribute, let us consider it in relation to the existences of which alone it can properly be predicated. The consideration of this problem involves the necessity of a philosophical classification, without which certain distinctions in the applications of the predicate cannot be made apparent.
The nomenclature adopted must be, from the nature of the case, inadequate, and, though not proposed at random, may perhaps be supplanted by a better one; for while the existences of which we predicate infinity transcend all empirical cognition in and by themselves alone, the only terms by which we can express the necessary distinctions must be derived from knowledge empirically acquired. Still, by criticizing our own terms and defining them by means of the requisite qualifications, it is hoped that the danger of misapprehension will be forestalled and obviated.

Infinity, then, is of two kinds, Quantitative and Qualitative. Quantitative Infinity is so called, not because it is the attribute of a quantity (for an infinite object is raised absolutely above the category of quantity), but because it is the attribute of that which is the necessary condition and correlate of quantity. It is a primary predicate or immediate attribute, and is expressed by the adjective infinite. It is subdivided into Statical and Dynamical, both of which designations are unsatisfactory on account of their physical or material associations; yet they point to a profound distinction which no human language could adequately express. Statical Infinity is the attribute of Space; Dynamical Infinity is the attribute of Time. It is customary to express this distinction by the statement that Space is infinite in three dimensions, Time in only one dimension. But this statement, for the following reasons, we regard as not merely inadequate, but as incorrect.

In the first place, it brings these transcendental objects under mathematical categories, namely, number and mensurability; and this illegitimate only of their concrete determinations in finite existences.

In the second place, allowing such an application of mathematical categories as legitimate, the distinction still fails to maintain itself. With regard to Space, from any assumed point as a centre countless radii may be conceived, any one of which is as much a dimension of Space as any other. What is true in the assignment of only three dimensions to Space, is simply this:

from a single point but three straight lines can be drawn which shall be mutually at right angles with each other, or, only three rectangularly intersecting planes can pass through a given point.
But this is no law of the absolute vacuity in which no lines or planes are conceived to exist (pure Space); it is merely a law of the lines and planes themselves, cognate with the law that two straight lines can only intersect in one point, and, like all mathematical law, belongs to that un-conditioned Nature of Things which, admitting of no explanation, is the ultimate terminus of all research. Geometric mensuration implies several fixed points, and fixed relations between at least two extensions, magnitudes, or forms. You cannot, therefore, predicate dimensions of Space, except in virtue of what you in imagination arbitrarily put into it; but into pure Space you have no right to put anything. Neither is it more allowable to predicate dimension of Time. The popular image of Time as a line or a stream is purely sensuous and philosophically false; for it reduces the present to a mere point, whereas the present is infinite in the sense of existing throughout the infinity of Space. All symbolism of Space and Time, regarded as existences apart from the emblems which symbolism must necessarily employ, leads inevitably to confusion and contradiction. It is sufficient to say simply that Time can be measured only by means of fixed dates, determined by relations of duration and succession among existences and events. Space and Time have no dimensions per se, but are the sine qua non of all dimension.

In the third and last place, it is unscientific to distinguish Space from Time in terms of itself.
If we contrast the infinity of Space and of Time as Tridimensional and Unidimensional, we distinguish them in terms of Space; for dimension presupposes Extension, and Extension presupposes Space. If such a procedure were admissible, it would be better to distinguish the infinity of one from that of the other as respectively Synchronous and Diachronous, which would state the distinction in terms of Time; for, merely positing the infinity of Space as actual at each moment of Time, and the infinity of Time as actual only in its own totality, this distinction does not involve any allusion to mathematical categories. But we regard either distinction as unphilosophical. Following strictly the same conception which justifies the term Quantitative as applicable, not merely to quantity itself, but also to the conditions of quantity, we have preferred to designate the infinity of Space as Static-cal, as the condition of statical quantity (extension, magnitude, &c.), and the infinity of Time as Dynamical, as the condition of dynamical quantity (force, motion, progression, &c.). No definition could be more suggestive than that of Schelling,—Space, "Pure being with the nega-tion of all activity"; Time, "Pure activity with the negation of all being." Perhaps another definition might be equally suggestive,—Space is Infinity at rest, Time is Infinity in motion.
Such definitions, however, though forcible from their very self-contradiction, are mere paradoxes unsusceptible of analysis.

Qualitative infinity is a secondary predicate, that is, the attribute of an attribute, and is expressed by the adverb infinitely rather than by the adjective infinite. For instance, it is a strict use of language to say that Space is infinite, but an elliptical use of language to say that God is infinite. Precision of speech would require us to say, God is infinitely good, wise, or great; or, God is good, and his goodness is infinite. The distinction may seem trivial, but it is based on an important difference between the infinity of Space and Time on the one hand, and the infinity of God on the other. Neither philosophy nor theology can afford to disregard this difference.
Quantitative Infinity is illimitation by quantity,
Qualitative Infinity is illimitation by degree.
Quantity and degree alike imply finitude, and are categories of the finite alone. The danger of arguing from the former kind of infinity to the latter cannot be overstated; God alone possesses Qualitative Infinity, which is strictly synonymous with absolute perfection, and the neglect of the distinction between this and Quantitative Infinity leads irresistibly to pantheistic and materialistic notions. (See some acute remarks in Calderwood's "Philosophy of the Infinite," 2d ed., p. 183 et seq.) Spinozism is possible only by the elevation of "infinite extension" to the dignity of a divine attribute. Dr. Samuel Clarke's identification of God's "immensity" with Space has been shown by Martin to ultimate in pantheism. From ratiocinations concerning the incomprehensibility of infinite Space and Time, Hamilton and Maass pass at once to conclusions concerning the incomprehensibility of God. The inconsequence, however, of all such arguments is absolute; and if philosophy tolerates the transference of spatial or temporal analogies to the nature of God, she must reconcile herself to the negation of his personality and spirituality.
Such putative analogies have no theological application whatever. We have no room to dilate on this topic, but will simply point out a double neglect which has generated paradoxisms by myriads in speculations concerning "the Infinite": 1. neglect of the distinction between the attributive and the metonymical use of the term infinite; 2. neglect of the distinction between Quantitative and Qualitative Infinity.

The reciprocal relations of Space, Time, and God are veiled in impenetrable darkness. Many minds hesitate to attribute real infinity to Space and Time, lest it should conflict with the infinity of God. Such timidity has but a slender title to respect. If the laws of thought necessitate any conclusion whatever, they necessitate the conclusion that Space and Time are each infinite; and if we cannot reconcile this result with the infinity of God, there is no alternative but to accept scepticism with as good a grace as possible. No man is worthy to join in the search for truth who trembles at the sight of it when found. But a profound faith in the unity of all truth destroys scepticism by anticipation, and prophesies the solutions of reason. Space is infinite, Time is infinite, God is infinite; three infinities co-exist. Limitation is possible only between existences of the same kind. There could not be two infinite Spaces, two infinite Times, or two infinite Gods; but while infinities of the same kind cannot co-exist, infinities of unlike kinds may. When an hour limits a rod, infinite Time will limit infinite Space; when a year and an acre limit wisdom, holiness, and love, infinite Space and Time will limit the infinite God. But not before. Time exists ubiquitously; Space exists eternally; God exists ubiquitously and eternally. The nature of the relations between the three infinities, so long as Space and Time are ontologically incognizable, is utterly and absolutely incomprehensible; but to assume contradiction, exclusion, or mutual limitation, to be among these relations, is as gratuitous as it is irrelevant.

To recapitulate our distinctions, and present them at a glance, we exhibit the following synopses:—

INFINITY	QUANTITATIVE	Statistical SPACE.
		Dynamical TIME.
	QUALITATIVE	GOD.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

VOLTAIRE'S DEATH.

SALEM, Ohio, Dec. 23, 1872.

MR. EDITOR:—Having noticed your remarks on the request of a correspondent that you should give the facts concerning Voltaire's death, I beg leave to offer the following, which may be found in Carlyle's Essay on Voltaire, Critical and Miscellaneous Essays and Reviews (New York, 1864, p. 153, note):—

"On this sickness of Voltaire, and his deathbed deportment, many foolish books have been written, concerning which it is not necessary to say anything. The conduct of the Parisian clergy, on that occasion, seems totally unworthy of their cloth; nor was their reward, so far as concerns these individuals, inappropriate: that of finding themselves once more bilked, once more persiflés, by that strange old man in his decrepitude, who in his strength had wrought them and others so many griefs. Surely the parting agonies of a fellow-mortal, when the spirit of our brother, rapt in the whirlwinds and thick ghastly vapors of death, clutches blindly for help, and no help is there, are not the scenes where a wise faith would seek to exult, when it can no longer hope to alleviate! For the rest, to touch further on those their idle tales of dying horrors, remorse, and the like; to write of such, to believe them, or disbelieve them, or in anywise discuss them, were but a continuation of the same inaptitude. He who, after the imperturbable exit of so many Cartouches and Thurtells in every age of the world, can continue to regard the manner of a man's death as a test of his religious orthodoxy, may boast himself impregnable to merely terrestrial logic. Voltaire had enough of suffering, and of mean enough suffering, to encounter, without any addition from theological despair. His last interview with the clergy, who had been sent for by his friends that the rites of burial might not be denied him, is thus described by Wagnière as it has been by all other credible reporters of it (Italics mine):—

"Two days before that mournful death, M. l'Abbé Mignot, his nephew, went to seek the Curé of St. Sulpice and the Abbé Gautier, and brought them into his uncle's sick room; who, being informed that the Abbé Gautier was there, 'Ah well!' said he, 'give him my compliments and my thanks.' The Abbé spoke some words to him, exhorting him to patience. The Curé of St. Sulpice then came forward, having announced himself, and asked of M. de Voltaire, elevating his voice, if he acknowledged the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ! The sick man pushed one of his hands against the Curé's ca-lotte (coif), shoving him back, and cried, turning abruptly to the other side, 'Let me die in peace!' (Laissez-moi mourir en paix.) The Curé seemingly considered his person soiled, and his coif dishonored by the touch of a philosopher. He made the sick-nurse give him a little brushing, and then went out with the Abbé Gautier."

In the text Carlyle also quotes Wagnière upon the closing scene, the falling of the curtain upon the finale of that great Life-Drama, as follows: "He expired about a quarter past eleven at night (May 30th, 1778), with the most perfect tranquility, after having suffered the cruellest pains, in consequence of those fatal drugs which his own imprudence, and especially that of the persons who should have looked to it, made him swallow. Ten minutes before his last breath, he took the hand of Moraud, his valet-de-chambre, who was watching by him, pressed it and said, 'Adieu, mon cher Moraud, je me meurs (Adieu, my dear Moraud, I am gone)'. These are the last words uttered by M. de Voltaire."

It will not be necessary, I presume, to add anything explanatory of the authority of my author. Carlyle was no lover of Voltaire, but who will question his integrity? What he has said will not be disputed by any one worthy of a denial. And I take the liberty to offer this reply to your correspondent because, while it is the policy of the Church to blacken the memory of Voltaire, and all such World's Men, it should be the policy of liberals to keep the truth before the people, even though it is old and does seem to make more of dead men than they are actually worth to the living present.

Cordially yours,
C. H. ELLIS.

[We thank Mr. Ellis for the above very interesting extract, and are glad that our little note has proved so serviceable to our readers as to call it forth.—ED.]

THE "A POSTERIORI" ARGUMENT FOR A DEITY.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Some of your correspondents, I notice, make use of the "Design Argument" for a Deity, as though it were entirely conclusive and satisfactory. Permit me to show wherein I think it is unsound and fallacious.

The order, harmony, and adaptation observable in Nature, it is said, prove design; design is evidence of a designer; and a designer must be an intelligent being. It is absurd, we are told, to suppose that this orderly world, containing such admirable adaptation of means to ends, can exist independently of a Being who constructed and governs it. It is evident, therefore, from the order, harmony, and adaptation in Nature, that there is an intelligent God. Let us examine this famous argument.

God is something or nothing. To say he is nothing is to say there is no God. If he is something, he is not merely a property or quality, but an existence per se, an entity, a substance,—whether material or immaterial is unimportant. If he is a substance, there must be order, harmony, and adaptation (or fitness) in his divine nature, to enable him to perceive, reflect, design, and execute his designs. If Deity does not cogitate or reason, but perceives truth without the labor of investigation, he must still possess an adaptation or fitness thus to perceive as well as to execute his designs. To say God is without order, harmony, and adaptation is to say he is a mere chaos. If a Being or substance without order, harmony, and adaptation, or a divine chaos, can create an orderly universe, there is no constancy in saying unintelligent matter could not have worked itself into the forms we behold. If order, harmony, and adaptation do exist in the divine mind (or in the substance which produces thought and design), they must be eternal; for that which constitutes the essential nature of God must be the eternal basis of his being. If the order, harmony, and adaptation in God are co-existent with him, are eternal, they must be independent of design; for that which never began to exist could not have been produced, and does not therefore admit of design.

If order, harmony, and adaptation are independent of design in the divine mind, it is certain that order, harmony, and adaptation exist, which are no evidence of a pre-existent designing intelligence. If order, harmony, and adaptation exist which were not produced by design, which are therefore no evidence of design, it is unreasonable and illogical to infer designing intelligence from the fact alone that order, harmony, and adaptation exist in Nature.

If the order, harmony, and adaptation in Deity to produce his thoughts and to execute his plans are eternal, why may not the formation of matter into worlds, and the evolution of the various forms of vegetable and animal life, be the result of the ceaseless action of self-existent matter in accordance with an eternal principle of adaptation?

Is it more reasonable to suppose that the universe was created or constructed by a Being in whom exist the most wonderful order and harmony and the most admirable adaptation (which order, harmony, and adaptation had no beginning) than to hold that the universe in its entirety is eternal, and the self-producing cause of all the manifestations we observe? Is it wonderful that matter should be self-existent, that it should possess the power to form suns and planets, and to construct that great ladder of life that reaches from the lowest forms of the vegetable kingdom up to man? How much more wonderful that an infinite Being should exist without any cause—a Being who is infinitely more admirable than the universe itself?

Again: the plan of a work is as much evidence of designing intelligence as the work which embodies the plan. For instance, the plan of a steam-engine in the mind of Fitch, of a locomotive in the mind of Stephenson, was as much evidence of design as the piece of machinery after its mechanical construction. If God is an infinite Being, if he knows everything, if no addition can be made to his knowledge, his plans must be eternal, without beginning, and therefore uncaused. If God's plans are not eternal, if from time to time new plans originate in his mind, there must be an addition to his knowledge; and if his knowledge admits of addition, he must be finite. But if his plans had no beginning, if like himself they are eternal, they must like him be independent of design. Now the plan of a thing, we have already seen, is as much evidence of design as the object which embodies the plan.

Since the plans of Deity are no proof of a designing intelligence that produced them (for they are supposed to be eternal), the plan of this universe, of course, was no evidence of a designing intelligence that produced it. But since the plan of the universe is as much evidence of design as the universe itself, and since the former is no evidence of design, it follows that design cannot be inferred from the existence of the universe.

The absurdity of the a posteriori argument for a God consists in the assumption that what we call order, harmony, and adaptation are evidence of design, when it is evident that, whether there be a God or not, order, harmony, and adaptation must have existed from eternity, and are not therefore necessary proof of a designing cause.

The reasoning of the theist who employs this argument is precisely like that of the Hindu in accounting for the position of the earth. Whatever exists must have some support, he said. The earth he imagined resting upon the back of an elephant, and the elephant upon a huge tortoise. He forgot that his own premise, that whatever exists must have some support, required that the tortoise should rest upon something. The inconclusiveness of his reasoning is apparent to a child.

The theist says order, harmony, and adaptation are evidence of a designing intelligence.

The earth and its productions show order, harmony, and adaptation.

Therefore the earth and its productions are the result of designing intelligence.

Just as the Hindu stopped reasoning when he fancied the earth upon an elephant and the elephant upon a tortoise, so the theist stops reasoning when he says God made the world. But as surely as from the premise that whatever exists must have some support, follows the conclusion that the tortoise rests upon something, as it rests upon the elephant, does it follow from the proposition that order, harmony, and adaptation are proof of an intelligent designer; that the order, harmony, and adaptation in a supposed Deity are evidence of an intelligent designer who made him, as the various parts of Nature, adapted or fitted to one another, are evidence of an intelligent designer who produced them. If we grant the premise, we are led to the conclusion that there has been a succession of creative and created gods in the beginningless past.

Men who attempt to explain the mysteries of the universe by the theory of an intelligent Designer, and who argue from the order and fitness in the world, remind me of the ostrich that, having buried his head in the sand so as to render itself invisible to its pursuers, fancies there is no further need of exertion to escape from the dangers and difficulties that surround it.

"Design represented as a search after final causes, until we come to a first cause and then stop," says F. W. Newman, "is an argument, I confess, which in itself brings me no satisfaction."

Respectfully,

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

DUBUQUE, Iowa, Dec. 12, 1872.

A prison chaplain was lamenting the want of success attending his ministry. Of one man who had been condemned to death he said he had great hopes, the prisoner having been most assiduous in the study of a Bible he had given him. The chaplain, after great exertion, obtained a commutation of the sentence. "I called to inform him of my success. His gratitude knew no bounds; he said I was his protector, his deliverer. 'And here,' he added, as he grasped my hand in parting, 'here is your Bible. I may as well return it to you, for I hope I shall never want it again.'"

SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

(From the Scientific American.)

One of our late semi-religious exchanges contains an editorial, in which the modern scientists, Huxley, Spencer, Darwin, et cetera, are taken to task for not being the same orthodox believers in the different dogmas of Christian theology as were Isaac Newton and the scientists of his time. The question is asked if the fame of the modern scientists would not be just as great, if, in religious matters, they had the faith of Newton; as if the opinion of a thinking being concerning such subjects was a matter of choice. The simple reason why men like Huxley are not as orthodox as similar men in the time of Newton, is that we live now in the end of the nineteenth century, and that the world has progressed since Newton's time. The best half of the present civilized population of this earth has commenced to see that blind faith in matters of religion is by no means a virtue, as was formerly believed; but that reason is a Divine gift to mankind, the use of which it is highly sinful to despise.

We may as well ask why so many prominent modern theologians, and even laymen (we will not mention names), are now-a-days not so orthodox, and why they have not the same views on many important points of doctrine as those of a few centuries ago. We may as well point to the fact that the blind faith of the middle ages is no more to be found in the Christian world, except perhaps in the Leonine city of Rome; and even there the motives of that faith are open to strong suspicion that it is not a faith adhered to for its own sake, but instigated by self-interest.

The effect of the whole editorial referred to does not amount to anything, as in place of giving a single argument against the tendency of modern science, it consists of a long-winded lamentation that religion is not made as much of, by the modern scientists, as it used to be in olden times; and that science, in place of being the handmaid of theology, has since those times frequently arrogated itself to contradict its teachings. And this is true.

THEOLOGICAL ERRORS CORRECTED BY SCIENCE.

Theology taught that the earth was flat, and supported on rocks, below which there were immense dark caves or spaces, the abode of evil spirits, while the firmament above was an arched vault supporting another immense space, full of light, the abode of the good spirits; science taught that the earth was round, in fact a sphere floating without support in space, and that the firmament was not an arched vault but surrounded the whole earth, and was an infinite space, full of suns and worlds.

Theology maintained that the earth was a stationary center around which the whole universe revolved; science took the conceit out of theology and mankind in general by proving that the earth was a comparatively insignificant globe, floating in the immensity of space, and revolving like a small inferior wheel in an immense piece of highly complicated machinery. Theology maintained, on the authority of a translated, mutilated, and obscure tradition, that the whole universe was created in six literal days; in fact theology made the absurd assertion that the Unchangeable Divine Being could have existed for all eternity without doing anything, and then suddenly changed his mind and in less than a week created a universe, set it all going, and then needed rest like a frail human body, suggesting the blasphemous idea that the Divine Creator was tired out. Science proved that, as far as concerns this earth, it was formed many millions of centuries ago, and went through different stages of transmutation, each lasting immense periods of time, and that the Divine power was active all the time as it is now, and will be for ever. Theologians maintained, on the ground of the same tradition, which they continually have been misunderstanding and misinterpreting, that this single creative act took place six thousand years ago; but science produced relics of plants and animals which must have lived millions of years ago, while the circumstances and localities in which they were found proved that other millions of years preceded them.

In all these, as in every other instance, science has been triumphant, while theologians had to give in and acknowledge, however reluctantly, these triumphs; and notwithstanding they at first cried that religion was in danger, that they accused the scientists of Radicalism, Delism, Atheism, and hurled at their heads other accusations of the same sort, the only activity they exercise now consists of attempts at reconciliation between science and theology: and this indeed is their legitimate calling.

In all the tumult created by this antagonism, which is unwisely kept up by a certain class of theologians, there is one great consolation. It is the consideration that the relative positions of theology and science have been changed since the time of Newton. Then the spirit of the tribunal which condemned Galileo still prevailed; every new scientific theory was tested by the teachings of the theologians of the day, and if these men decided that it was contrary to their doctrines, it was condemned; this being the spirit of the society which was under the tutelage of the clergy, no man, not even Newton, dared to be anything but Orthodox. No doubt this had a great deal to do with the difference in the apparent theological opinions of the scientists of that time and of the present day, when science, by experience made conscious of her superiority, has lifted up her head, and in place of being the handmaid of theology, and being judged by theologians, has placed herself in position to judge the teachings of theology, and to decide which are true and which are erroneous. Let the reader keep in mind that we speak of theology and not of religion.

We maintain that a scientist who devotes his life to the study of God's own handiwork has more true religion and a more exalted idea of that mysterious Divine Being, who, with such wisdom, power, and superior conception of the truly beautiful, presides in the management of the infinite Universe, than the so-called theologian who, neglecting the study of God's own handiwork, confines himself to the discussion of old obscure literary traditions. For our part, at least, we must confess that our religious feelings of awe for the Creator have often been severely shocked by visits to a certain theological seminary, on hearing the professor expatiate before his class of theological students, on the classified properties of God, what he is, and what he is not. To the scientist such a lecture is nothing but arrogance and blasphemy, and such lectures are, alas, occasionally propounded in some of our Orthodox churches.

A. HUNKER'S EPISTLES.

WHAT IS A CHRISTIAN?

I have just had a bitter dispute with my wife in defence of the Christian religion. That is, the dispute was bitter on my side, and I plainly told Mrs. Samantha Hunker that I doubted the salvation of her soul.

This controversy arose from her canonization of the late Charles Dickens—a man who lived and died, not as a church-member, but as a novelist.

Here, again, is the whole question of faith and works. Is every man to be saved now-a-days simply because he smooths and brightens the rugged pathways of this world, instead of pointing to the golden harps and streets of the next world? I reject the heresy in self-defense. I should be a brand in the burning if I counted on being saved from any good I have done here below. We are all miserable sinners, and I am the chief among ten thousand. But I have made a good deal of money out of it.

I fear, however, that Mrs. Hunker represents the religious tendencies of the age more closely than I do. Radicalism has gone through everything. There is no Bible as it used to be. During the crusade, for instance, of the early American Abolitionists, it was plainly proved by such holy men as Bishop Hopkins, that the Gospel upheld the institution of Slavery. I remember, with pious horror, the terrible reply of Theodore Parker to that conclusion. "Does the Bible uphold Slavery?" he asked. "It does not. But if it does, what then? Not so much better for slavery, but so much worse for the Bible." At that time I joined in prayer with numerous divines, to have the great preacher of New England rationalism taken from the earth. The petition was answered only eleven years ago; but now that very rationalism is applied to every creed and to every man that dies. "Did Charles Dickens make the burdens of humanity lighter by his life? Did Abraham Lincoln broaden the prospects of the human race? These are the questions that even pulpits are asking now; and if an affirmative answer is given, then Lincoln and Dickens are virtually pronounced better Christians than I, who have constantly repudiated good works, and made faith my all.

Where are the great religious doctrines that were instilled into my youthful mind at old Princeton? Where is the doctrine of Total Depravity? I have taken great comfort in it, as I have wandered through the devious pathways of the world, that I might pick up a dollar wherever I could find it without incurring the penalties of human statutes. When I have had poor and sick tenants, who were a burden upon my real estate, I have been better able to turn them out into the cold, and thus protect my property, as I have felt how naturally depraved was the human heart, of which all unrighteousness should be expected. Yet although I pay well toward maintaining the most conservative church in Hunkerville, it is almost impossible to get any minister to preach a good old-fashioned sermon on Total Depravity.

I have long been a Presbyterian—of the old school—as I said in a former Epistle. But the other evening I thought I would attend St. Matthew's Episcopal church, being assured I could hear, in that communion, a discourse on religion unmixt with the usual jar of philanthropy. St. Matthew's church is the most fashionable house of God in Hunkerville. Its lightest pillars are worth forty thousand dollars, and the worship of its attendants is always conducted in full dress. There, I fancied, my weary soul would be led away from all social relations and duties, and that heaven alone would be pointed out in the far distance. The lesson was read, and it was the curse of David upon his enemies. I was greatly encouraged by it, as it had no bearing on any recent ides. But immediately after it, the text was announced, and it was, "Bear ye one another's burdens." I got up in pain, and left St. Matthew's temple, before the special charity of the evening was brought to my attention.

Is religious doctrine, then, to lapse away, and are merely the moral notions of justice and brotherly kindness to be esteemed as Christianity? Is the heart of the epoch to follow Henry Ward Beecher, as he accepts the fellowship of anybody that believes barely the Sermon on the Mount?

Mrs. Hunker asserts that such is precisely the tendency of the present thought and life. "While the Pope of Rome," she says, "is claiming the infallibility of the Church, theological dogma is the butt of science, and is practically ignored in the affairs of nations. It is laid aside, with their old battle-axes and coats of mail. Nobody cares much about it one way or another. Conscience is of age, and has become its own guardian. Sensible Protestantism doesn't worry itself about 'Popery,' and sensible Catholicism has given up the task of extirpating heresy. The main point is the Right of Private Judgment. But that is established. It asks no favors. The politics and commerce of the civilized world are mortgaged for its protection. Meanwhile, the welfare of man on earth is the problem of the present; and the age grows impatient even of religion, if it mumbles a creed instead of doing a work. Beecher may well bless Dickens. In his way, too, he brought peace and good will to man. That is now the Christianity which all understand and none dispute."

I don't know what all understand and none dispute; but I know I don't understand the weaker vessel at the head of my household. Here is Madam Hunker apparently satisfied with a circle, of which Private Judgment is the centre and Good Works the circumference. Yet I have always heard her say that we live in an age of shallow materialism and unfinished scepticism, which is to be followed by an ultimate reconciliation of faith, reason, and beneficence.

Well, never mind. I shall be dead long before that time, and I am scarcely sorry for it. In an age of universal faith, reason, and beneficence, what would money be worth in the market? I don't believe I could get five per cent. for it.

A. HUNKER,
HUNKERVILLE, June 16th, 1870.

THE FIRST PRAYER IN CONGRESS.

In Thatcher's Military Journal, under date of December, 1777, is found a note containing the identical "first prayer in Congress," made by the Rev. Jacob Duché, a gentleman of great eloquence. Here it is—an historical curiosity—

"O Lord, our Heavenly Father, high and mighty King of kings, and Lord of lords, who dost from thy throne behold all the dwellers of the earth, and reignest with power supreme and uncontrolled over all the kingdoms, empires, and governments—look down in mercy, we beseech thee, on the American States, who have fled to thee from the rod of the oppressor, and thrown themselves on thy gracious protection, desiring to be henceforth only dependent on thee. To thee they have appealed for the righteousness of their cause; to thee do they now look up for that countenance and support which thou alone canst give. Take them, therefore, Heavenly Father, unto thy nurturing care. Give them wisdom in council and valor in the field. Defeat the malicious designs of our adversaries; convince them of the unrighteousness of their cause; and, if they still persist in sanguinary purposes, oh! let the voice of thine own unerring justice, sounding in their hearts, constrain them to drop the weapons of war from their unnerved hands in the day of battle. Be thou present, O God of wisdom, and direct the councils of this honorable assembly. Enable them to settle things on the best and surest foundations, that the scenes of blood may be speedily closed, and order, harmony, and peace may be effectually restored, and truth and justice, religion and piety, prevail and flourish among thy people. Preserve the health of their bodies and the vigor of their minds; shower down upon them and the millions they here represent such temporal blessings as thou seest expedient for them in this world, and crown them with everlasting glory in the world to come. All this we ask in the name and through the merits of Jesus Christ, thy Son, our Savior. Amen."

HOW MINISTERS KEEP HOLY THE SABBATH DAY.

—It seems like a perpetual sarcasm to hear these overworked men thanking God for the day of rest! Rest? Why, half the ministers sat up half the night of Saturday to prepare their sermons; they rose on Sunday with throbbing temples; they wrought in their studies till the bells tolled; they officiate in the most exhausting services for an hour and a half; they rest one or two hours, and then return for another exhausting service of like duration; and at evening, being now strung up to the highest nervous tension, conduct an evening prayer-meeting or perhaps preach a third time. Then the man lies awake all night, sleeps a few hours on Monday morning, and on Monday afternoon or Tuesday wakes up in the purgatory of ministers' blue Monday! This is charmingly entitled a Day of Rest!—Beecher.

In speaking of the burning of Chicago the editor of The Advance, a religious newspaper, says:—

"God's wisdom and love saw the blow to be necessary in the interest of righteousness and of his holy and moral government, and he had the firmness to inflict it. There is something sublimely solemn in such an act of God, which to the thoughtless and wicked seems heartless; but which in reality is the supreme grandeur of moral courage, which dares to do a right thing at immense cost."

Talk of sending missionaries to the heathen! A man who can thus condescendingly compliment his Creator for the display of moral courage needs the attention of the whole Board of Foreign Missions.—Boston Courier.

THE series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of forty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says: "I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lectures on the Bible," by Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. Abbot; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. T. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Rev. O. Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by P. U. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. Abbot. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

THE EXAMINER.—A limited number of the four numbers for sixty cents. Nos. 1, 2, and 3 for 40 cents. Nos. 1 and 2 for 20 cents, No. 1 for 10 cents. What remains of full sets are reserved for binding. Zion's Herald says:—"The boldest heretic of to-day. The Independent says:—"The most pronounced radical in the land." The Chicago Post says:—"Equal to the intemperance of Theodore Parker." Address THE EXAMINER, Winnetka, Ill., where the numbers for sale remain.

THE RICHEST MEN IN AMERICA.—There are no more happy than those who earn their own living, and who read the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, published at $5 a year by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

TOBACCO.—By saying that which would be lost in smoke, one may procure the reading of the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL a year at $3, and thus learn what calling in life he may be best fitted for. Young men should try it. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Cultured Free Thought.

The Index Association,

With offices at 142 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 86 Dey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,
A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHAS. VOYSEY, London, England.
Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, Weston super Mare, England.
Rev. M. D. CONWAY, London, England.

ABA K. BUTTS is Advertising Agent for the Index Association. All letters to him on business matters, relative to the paper, should be addressed—"THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio."

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exponent of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Back Numbers of The Index!
FOR 1870 AND 1871.

IT is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Parturition Without Pain.

A Code of Directions for escaping the Primæ Course. Edited by M. L. HOLBROOK, M. D., Ed. tor of THE HERALD OF HEALTH.

"This Treatise is one of sterling excellence, and should be very widely circulated not only among wives but husbands as well."—The Index.

"Contains suggestions of the greatest value."—Tilton's Golden Age.

"A valuable book for women."—Liberal Christian.

"An interesting and plausible argument. The course recommended cannot fail to be beneficial."—Beecher's Christian Union.

Price, by mail, $1.00. Agents wanted.
Address WOOD & HOLBROOK,
15 Light St., New York.

"The Greatest Luxury in the World."

TURKISH BATHS.

& 38 COLUMBIA HEIGHTS, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Three minutes' walk from Fulton Ferry.

A series of these Baths will relieve, if not cure, nearly every form of disease. The beauty and simplicity of their action consists in the perfect adaptability, either mild or powerful, of this method of treatment to each and every case. It cleans the body, purifies the blood, and equalizes the circulation, thus arousing dormant functions, and restoring the highest measure of health possible to the individual.

Innumerable references can be given to cases cured by the Bath, and the proprietor will freely advise with those who desire any information regarding its proper use.

First-class rooms and board at moderate prices.
CHARLES H. SHEPARD, M. D.

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,
25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

HERALD OF HEALTH

FOR 1873.

(Three Numbers of 1872 Free to New Subscribers.)

READ WHAT IS SAID BY THE PRESS.

The N. Y. Evening Post says: "We can always commend this Journal without qualification."

"It contains," says the Scientific American, "more sensible articles than any other magazine that comes to our notice."

A SPLENDID CHROMO,
WORTH $10.00,

Given free to every subscriber. It is an original picture of

A BEAUTIFUL GIRL,

Beautiful in form and face, on a mission of love to the cottage of a poor family. She stands with her supplies of good things knocking at the door, clad in a handsome costume, with a face expressive of the highest qualities the heart possesses, the perfect picture of health and beauty. This chromo is handsomely colored

IN TEN COLORS,

WILL PLEASE AND DELIGHT

all who possess it.

Every Home Should Have One.

It will give daily pleasure, and be a constant lesson of good to every one who looks on it.

Send your subscription for next year at once, and thus obtain the picture to exhibit to others when you are forming a club, and three numbers of 1873 free.

The January number contains a remarkable paper on the

CONDUCT OF LIFE,

written 346 years before Christ by Isocrates, and well worthy the attention of every liberal thinker. The February number will contain a well written article entitled,

The Physiology and Hygiene of Marriage.

The March number will contain an Essay entitled,

Do Mothers Mark their Children?

It is the aim of the publishers to make their Journal thoroughly useful and fill it with the productions of sound writers.

In short, the Herald for one year contains matter enough to make eight or ten dollar-and-a-half books, and yet it is sent with a picture worth $10 for the small price of $3.00.

The Herald for 1873 will be

RICH AND ROYAL

With the very best matter from the best writers, and each number will be worth the full subscription price—

$2.00 a Year

(12 cents extra for postage on premium). We will send the HERALD OF HEALTH, with the splendid Chromo, and any $1.50 magazine, or paper, with their premiums, post-paid, for $3.25. The HERALD OF HEALTH and its Chromo, and any $4 magazine, for $5.12, or the HERALD and Chromo, and New York Times or Tribune, for $3.50.

Agents wanted. Liberal commissions given.

Address

WOOD & HOLBROOK,
15 Light St., New York.

THE BABCOCK
FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against Fire."

SURE,
SIMPLE,
SELF-ACTING.

Used by the Fire Departments of the principal cities of the Union.

F. W. FARWELL, Secretary,
407 Broadway, New York.

"Over Twelve Hundred Actual Fires put out with it."

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,
25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents Wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than in anything else. Particulars Free. Address G. B. INGRAM & Co., Portland, Me.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS

for the

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES; an historical summary of the origin, growth, and perfection of the chief industrial arts of this country. 1,300 PAGES, AND 500 ENGRAVINGS. WRITTEN BY 30 EMINENT AUTHORS, including John B. Gough, Leon Case, Edward Howard, Jos. B. Lyman, Rev. E. Edwin Hall, Horace Greeley, Philip Hopley, Albert Brisbane, F. B. Perkins, etc., etc.

This work is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufacture, etc., in all ages. It is a complete encyclopedia of arts and manufactures, and is the most entertaining and valuable work of information on subjects of general interest ever offered to the public. It is adapted to the wants of the Merchant, Manufacturer, Mechanic, Farmer, Student, and Inventor, and sells to both old and young of all classes. The book is sold by agents, who are making large sales in all parts of the country. It is offered at the low price of $3.50, and is the cheapest book ever sold by subscription. No family should be without a copy. We want Agents in every town of the United States, and no Agent can fail to do well with this book. Our terms are liberal. We give our agents the exclusive right of territory. One of our agents sold 188 copies in eight days; another sold 368 in two weeks. Our agent in Hartford sold 597 in one week. Specimens of the work sent to agents on receipt of stamp. For circulars and terms to agents address the publishers,

J. E. BURE & HYDE,
Hartford, Conn.,
CHICAGO, ILL., or CINCINNATI, OHIO.

W. A. FAUNCE,
Laid with Henry B. Stebbins.

BROWN & FAUNCE,
BOOKSELLERS,

STATIONERS,

AND DEALERS IN

Window and Wall Papers,

(Successors to Henry B. Stebbins.)

115 SUMMIT STREET, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Keep constantly on hand a fine stock of standard and current literature, embracing books upon Science, Art, and Religion, and are in receipt of new books from publishers as fast as issued. Books sent by mail post-paid on receipt of publishers' price, and promptly ordered when not in stock.

Out-of-date and rare books furnished when procurable in this country or in England. Orders by mail solicited.

ROBERT WALLIN,

No. 453 North Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Keeps on hand a variety of LIBERAL BOOKS and PAPERS—THE INDEX, and Index Tracts; also, an assortment of Stationery.

YOUR WIFE OR YOUR SWEET-HEART would thank you for a beautiful lady's gold watch; good time-keepers. Why not make her a present of one? A few subscribers for the PERENOLOGICAL JOURNAL at $3 each; for the SCIENCE OF HEALTH, at $2 each, will secure one from the makers through S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

GOOD FOOD AND GOOD FUEL are indispensable to health and comfort. Good reading matter instructs and improves the mind. All leading magazines and newspapers are clubbed with the PERENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, at $3, and the SCIENCE OF HEALTH, at $2, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BRYANT & BENTLEY,

Manufacturing Jewelers. Rings a specialty. 356 patterns hard solder rings, stamped and warranted 16 carats fine. 18 carat Bracelets, Cameos, Coral, Roman, and engraved sets; Masonic Jewelry, etc. No. 12 Maiden Lane, New York (up stairs).

DAVID G. FRANCIS,

DEALER IN

NEW AND OLD BOOKS,

17 Astor Place, and 140 8th St., New York. Priced catalogues of books in stock, issued from time to time, will be forwarded free to any address.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy. Published Quarterly in St. Louis, Mo. It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription,

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents.

Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in marlin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $3.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V., in marlin, $5.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,
Box 3308, St. Louis, Mo.

A TREASURE—NOT TRASH—THE PERENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, for 1873, will contain just such information relating to "self-culture," as every individual, old and young, ought to read. It is only $3 a year. S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

GUNS FOR THE PEOPLE.

Breech-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $500. Double-Barrel Shot-Guns, $35 to $150. Single Guns, $25 to $200. Breech-loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers, $5 to $25. Pistols, 75c. to $5. Gun material, fixtures, and ammunition of every kind very cheap. Send Stamp for Large Illustrated and Descriptive PRICE-LIST to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Samuel Johnson's Work on India. Sent on receipt of price, $5.00.

Address S. H. MORSE,
25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

Send to same address for Catalogue of other scientific and religious works.

KELLER, SAITER, & CO.,

Manufacturers of RICH JEWELRY. EYEGlasses a specialty. Office, 51 Maiden Lane. Factory, Bleeker St., cor. Bowery, New York.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH.

The first volume having been sustained beyond expectation, the Publishers are prepared with additional facilities for making the next volume respond more fully to the popular demand for it. Independent HEALTH MONTHLY. Ample arrangements have been made to render each department a welcome and instructive visitant to its reader, and educate the people in all that relate to PRESERVING AND PROMOTING HEALTH.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH will not be the organ of any person, business, or institution, but a independent, earnest Teacher of the LAWS OF LIFE AND HEALTH; the exponent of all knowledge by which HEALTH, STRENGTH, and LONG LIFE may be attained, by using and regulating those agencies which are vitally related to HEALTH and the treatment of DISEASES strictly hygienic principles.

TERMS.—$5.00 a year; Single numbers, 25 cents. Ten copies, $35.00, and an extra copy to agent. Please address S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, New York.

YOUNG MEN AND YOUNG WOMEN who would know what they are good for, what they can do best, should read the PERENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. A new volume begins with Jan. No., and may be ordered at once from S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

NEW TRACTS!

INTENDED TO TEACH RELIGION WITHOUT SUPERSTITION.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 10.
SECOND SERIES.....No. 11 to No. 20.

Either Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cts.

Address CHAS. E. WHIPP,
19 PRICKETT ST., BOSTON.

Hall's Magic Shade Fixture

An ingenious arrangement by which a S may be rolled down from the top, or raised the bottom of the Window, or both, at the same time, thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, and at the same time COMFORT and privacy in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for inside Blinds. Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store fronts.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE CO.

145 SOUTH CLINTON ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

F. J. SCOTT, J. H. STOPE
ARCHITECTS,

75 MADISON STREET (Near Boody & Tolbo, Ohio).

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, JANUARY 18, 1873.

WHOLE No. 160.

HOW IS YOUR HEALTH?

If good, you are living right; if not, you should study the LAWS OF LIFE AND HEALTH by reading the SCIENCE OF HEALTH, a new and thoroughly practical Health Journal. Its teachings are based on Hygienic Principles, presenting the best interests of the individual, the Nation, and the Race. THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH is independent of medical schools or sects, and seeks only to teach the reader "how to live" so as to regain and retain Health.

A GOOD NUMBER.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH for January contains matters interesting and important to all readers. Ladies should read "What My Corsets Cost Me," "Early Marriages will interest both sexes; Holiday Visits, What to Select and How to Cook," a timely article, looking to luxurious and healthful food; Dress of Uncivilized Women; Three Classes of American Boys, with Illustrations; Popular Physiology, with Illustrations; Ague and Fever, the Cause and Cure; Scarlatina; Bronchitis; Health of Teachers; Women Doctors. In answer to correspondents, we have—How to Feed the Baby; Gray Hairs; Sick Headache; Bilious Fever and Ague; Magnetic Waters. Concluding with Excellent Health Lectures, teaching Cold Feet; Headache; Cramps; Lumbago; Heartburn; Dyspepsia; Neuralgia; Palpitation; Impure Blood; Corns and Bunions, Bowel Complaints; Constipation; Sleep, etc., with remarks on "Prayer and Medication," making a capital number with which to begin the new volume and the new year. Price 30 cents, or $3 a year.

Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THE (ORIGINAL) CONTINENTAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.

of Hartford, Conn. Incorporated May, 1863. SAM'L. E. ELMORE, President, JOHN S. RICE, Vice President, FRANCIS D. DOUGLASS, Secretary, H. R. MORLEY, Actuary.

The CONTINENTAL, especially commends itself, by its past experience and present management, to those who desire to place their insurance in a conservative company, conducted on the principle of furnishing RELIABLE AND ASSURED INSURANCE at the most reasonable cost as consistent with perfect security.

EP A few first-class Agents wanted for unoccupied fields.

BABCOCK FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against fire."

USED BY RAILROADS, STEAMBOATS, HOTELS, FACTORIES, ASYLUMS, FIRE DEPARTMENTS, ETC.

F. W. FARWELL, Sec'y, 407 Broadway, New York.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

The Science of a New Life.

By JOHN COWAN, M. D. A radical work on Sexual Physiology and the laws necessary to the elevation of the Human Race. Recommended and endorsed by O. B. Frothingham, Dr. Die Leno, Robert Dale Owen, THE INDEX, and other prominent writers, physicians, religious and secular papers. Every copy sold helps in the direction of the coming "millennium." Agents wanted everywhere. Send for circulars. Sold only by subscription and by the Publishers, COWAN & CO., 129 Eighth St., New York.

A GREAT OFFER! HOLIDAYS!

HORACE WATERS, 481 BROADWAY, N. Y. will dispose of 100 Pianos, Melodians, and Organs, of three first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during the HOLIDAYS. New 7 octave first-class Piano, modern improvements, for $275 cash. The Concerto Parlor Organ is the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Price, for $185, $180, $175, and $160 cash. Other Organs and Melodians for $45 and upwards for each. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

J. F. RUGGLES, BIBLIOPOL, 71 Bowdoin, MICHIGAN. Dealer in English and American Free Thought Literature.

GOOD BOOKS FOR ALL.

"BOOKS WHICH ARE BOOKS."

Works which should be found in every Library—within the reach of all readers. Works to entertain, instruct, and improve. Copies will be sent by return post, on receipt of price.

NEW PATRISMOLOGY; or, Signs of Character, as manifested through Temperament and External Forms, and especially in the "Human Face Divine," with more than One Thousand Illustrations. By S. R. WELLS. Price $3.00.

THE FAMILY PHYSICIAN.—A Ready Prescriber and Hygienic Adviser. With Reference to the Nature, Causes, Prevention, and Treatment of Diseases, Accidents, and Casualties of every kind. With a Glossary and copious Index. By JOHN SNEW, M. D. Illustrated with nearly 300 Engravings. One large volume, intended for use in the Family. $4.00.

HOW TO READ CHARACTER. A New Illustrated Handbook of Phrenology and Physiognomy, for Students and Examiners, with a Chart for recording the sizes of the Organs of the Brain in the Delineation of Character, with upwards of 170 Engravings, latest and best. Muslin, $1.25.

THE PARENTS' GUIDE; or Human Development through Inherited Tendencies. By Mrs. HENRIETTA FENSTER. Second Edition revised and enlarged. One vol. 12mo. Price $1.50.

CONSTITUTION OF MAN: Considered in relation to External Objects. By GEORGE COMAR. The only authorized American Edition. With Twenty Engravings, $1.75.

THE HYGIENIC HAND-BOOK: A Practical Guide for the Sick-Room. Alphabetically arranged with Appendix. By R. T. TRALL. One vol. 12mo, 300 pp. Muslin. $2.00.

"How to Waite," "How to Talk," "How to Behave," and "How to do Business," a Hand-Book indispensable for Home Improvement. In one vol. $2.25.

WEDLOCK; or, the Right Relations of the Sexes. Discussing the Laws of Conjugal Selection, and showing who may and who may not marry. A Guide for both Sexes. $1.50.

ORATORY—SACRED AND SECULAR; or, the extemporaneous Speaker. Including a Chairman's Guide for conducting Public Meetings according to Parliamentary forms. $1.50.

MANAGEMENT OF INFANCY. Physiological and Moral Treatment. By ANDREW COMBES, M. D. With Notes. $1.50.

HISTORY OF SALEM WITCHCRAFT: "The Planchette Mystery," and "Modern Spiritualism," with Dr. Doddridge's "Dream." In one vol. Price, $1.00.

GEORGE'S FABLES. The People's Pictorial Edition. Beautifully illustrated with nearly Sixty Engravings. Cloth, gift, beveled boards. Only $1.00.

THE RIGHT WORD IN THE RIGHT PLACE. A New Pocket Dictionary and Reference Book. Embracing Synonyms, Technical Terms, Abbreviations, Foreign Phrases, Writing for the Press, Punctuation, Proof-Reading, and other Valuable Information. 75 cents.

Inclose amount in a Registered Letter, or in a P. O. Order, for one or for all of the above, and address S. R. WELLS, Publisher, No. 389 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted.

THE BUTLER HEALTH LIFT.

LEWIS G. JONES, MANAGER.

Principal Office—New York, Park Bank Building, 214 Broadway.

ALSO, BROOKLYN, 158 RENSSEN STREET.

"This kind of exertion not only increases muscular power but refreshes exhausted nervous energy."—H. D. NOYES, M. D., Professor in Bellevue Medical College.

Apparatus for private use of the most perfect construction, and at the most reasonable prices.

Refer to Rev. O. B. Frothingham, Rev. Dr. Bartol, D. S. Rogers, and many others.

Visitors Always Welcome.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S NEW BOOK.

The Religion of Humanity,

By O. B. Frothingham. Contents.—I. Tendencies; II. God; III. Bible; IV. Christ; V. Atonement; VI. Power of Moral Inspiration; VII. Providence; VIII. Moral Ideal; IX. Immortality; X. Education of Conscience; XI. The Soul of Good in Evil; XII. The Soul of Truth in Error.

One vol., 12mo. $1.50. Sent free on receipt of price. DAVID G. FRANCIS, Publisher, 17 Arthur Place, New York.

MUSICAL GIFT BOOKS!

"Gems of Strauss."

The "Gem" of the season is having a remarkable sale. Contains all of Strauss' best music; 250 large pages.

"Musical Treasure."

Latest collection of choicest Vocal and Piano Music.

"Wreath of Gems."

Entirely Vocal Music. Songs, Ballads, Duets, etc.

"Piano Forte Gems."

Entirely Piano Music. Nocturnes, Dance Music, etc.

Price of any of the above, $2.50; or, in Full Gift, $4.

MUSICAL LITERATURE.

Mozart (by H. Ran) $1.75

Beethoven (life of) 2.00

Mendelssohn (life of) 1.75

Chopin (life of) 1.75

Beethoven's, Mozart's, Mendelssohn's Letters, each..... 1.75

Ritter's History of Music..... 1.50

Moore's Encyclopedia of Music..... 6.00

Any one of the above sent, post-paid, for retail price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

The Illustrated Phrenological

JOURNAL. This Magazine has been before the public so long and become so well established, that the Publisher hardly feels called upon to more than announce a new volume. Its name has become a household word in all parts of the country. It will as heretofore be devoted to all that will improve men Physically, Mentally, and Morally. Containing all that is new on Phrenology, or the Brain and its Functions; Etymology, or the Natural History of Man; Physiognomy, or the Signs of Character exhibited in the human Face and Form; Psychology, or the Science of the Soul; Sociology, or Man in his Private and Public Relations; History and Prophecy, or Man in the Past and in the Present.

Terms.—$3.00 a year. Single Numbers, 30 cents; Ten Copies, $2.00, and an extra copy to agent.

Premiums.—Besides the above Club Rates, we are offering the most liberal Premiums, a List of which will be sent on application. Local Agents wanted everywhere and cash commissions given. Please address

S. R. WELLS Publisher, 389 Broadway, New York.

Are You Going to New York?

If so, and you wish to stop where you can FEEL AT HOME, and get GOOD FOOD HEALTHFULLY PREPARED AND PLENTY OF IT.

Go to the Hygienic Institute,

Nos. 13 & 15 Light Street.

Horse Cars pass near the door to all parts of the city, making it a very convenient stopping place for persons visiting New York, either spontaneously or pleasure. Open at all hours, day and night. Board by the day or week, at reasonable rates. Rooms can be secured in advance by writing.

Address WOOD & HOLBROOK, Prop'rs.

Nos. 13 and 15 Light Street, New York.

HEALTH, EXERCISE, AND

LIFTING CURE. 225 FIFTH AVENUE. "As a means of retaining and, in certain chronic cases of disease, of regaining health, I regard it as of GREAT VALUE."—F. J. Burnet, M. D., College of Physicians and Surgeons.

"Admirable in its results, and of the greatest benefit to those frames weakened and diseased by civil life and sedentary habits."—Edward Sayard, M. D.

Parents who have feeble children can have them placed under our care with the assurance that all we can do to make them robust will be done.

Send stamp for a circular.

M. L. HOLBROOK, M. D., 225 Fifth Ave., New York.

Refer to Cyrus W. Field, Asa K. Butler, O. B. Frothingham, E. P. Dalton.

HARLAN P. HYDE.

REAL ESTATE AGENT,

AND

Negotiator of Mortgages.

95 1-2 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

"THE GALAXY" is about as near perfection as anything can be."—Daily Register, New Haven, Conn.

THE GALAXY

FOR 1873.

It is the best American Magazine. No family can afford to do without it. It gives more good and attractive reading matter for the money than any other periodical or book published.

THE LEADING NEWSPAPERS PRONOUNCE

THE GALAXY

The Best and most Ably Edited American Magazine.

THE GALAXY

Meets the Wants of Every Member of the family.

It contains thoughtful articles by our ablest writers.

It contains sketches of life and adventure.

It has serial stories by our best novelists.

It has short stories in each number.

The new department of SCIENTIFIC MISCELLANY appears in each number.

What the Leading Papers say.

"First of all in attractions we place 'The Galaxy.'"—Standard, Chicago.

"Well sustains its reputation for vigorous and racy writing."—N. Y. Tribune.

"The Galaxy" is always more a magazine than any, and more varied in its range than any other."—Independent.

"A model periodical; a credit to American periodical literature."—Philadelphia Press.

"There is not a dull page between its covers."—N. Y. Times.

"The variety of its contents, their solid worth, their brilliancy, and their great interest make up a general character of great excellence for every number."—Post, Boston.

"Always ably edited, and remarkable for the good judgment displayed in the selection of current topics for discussion. In this way quite eclipses the more conservative periodicals of the day."—Boston Journal, Mass.

"We are inclined to believe that more downright good literature is crowded between the covers of 'The Galaxy' than any other American magazine can boast of."—Chicago Times.

"Sheldon & Company have opened a mine of interest in their magazine, 'The Galaxy,' by drawing to it the communications of prominent public men upon questions of general interest."—Age, Philadelphia.

"The reported increase in the circulation of 'The Galaxy' is hardly to be wondered at, for it is certainly the best of American magazines."—Express, Buffalo, N. Y.

"The Galaxy" is one of the fullest, and, taken altogether, richest, of the many monthlies which have given such an enviable name to our American magazine literature."—Sunday-School Times, Philadelphia, Pa.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

PRICE 25 CTS. PER NUMBER.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $4.00 per year.

CLUBBING TERMS.

THE GALAXY will be sent for the year 1873 with any one of the following Periodicals at the prices named: With "Harper's Weekly," or "Harper's Bazar," or Appleton's Journal, $7; the regular price is $8. With "Every Saturday," $8; regular price $9. With "Our Young Folks," $5.50; regular price $6. With "Littell's Living Age," $10; regular price, $12. Address

SHELDON & COMPANY,

677 Broadway, New York.

New England Thought!

JOURNAL OF PROGRESS AND REFORM.

"THE COMMONWEALTH,"

OF BOSTON, MASS.,

Now in its ELEVENTH YEAR, gives a cordial recognition to all the progressive movements of the age, and with its attention mainly upon

POLITICS,

LITERATURE,

ART AND NEWS,

has free and unbiased columns for their elucidation. $3.00 to Boston subscribers; $3.50 to mail subscribers. Send for specimen copies.

CHAS. W. SLACK & SON, Publishers.

45 Bromfield St., Boston.

A SWEET PURE BREATH DEPENDS ON CERTAIN BODILY CONDITIONS, WHICH ARE EXPLAINED IN THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH, A NEW INDEPENDENT HEALTH MONTHLY, AT $2 A YEAR. PUBLISHED BY S. R. WELLS, 389 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

Published by the Index Association at No. 142,
St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio, with Branch
Office at No. 36, Day Street, New York City.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.

T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.

W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.

W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

F. W. NEWMAN, England.

CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

M. D. CONWAY, England.

THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth especially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A new LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MORSE, late editor of the RADICAL, whose EVENING NOTES will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 36, Day Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. F. DINSMORE, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post office money order.

Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A UNIQUE PREMIUM.

Photographs and Autographs

LEADING WRITERS

THE INDEX.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

W. J. POTTER.

W. H. SPENCER.

F. W. NEWMAN.

CHAS. VOYSEY.

A. W. STEVENS.

F. E. ABBOT.

☞ The PHOTOGRAPH of any ONE of the above-named persons will be mailed post-paid to any NEW subscriber who shall remit $3.00 for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

☞ To any one who shall send a list of names of from one to eight NEW subscribers and $3.00 for each, a corresponding number of Photographs shall be mailed post-paid, to be given to these subscribers; and the same number of Photographs shall also be mailed, post paid, as premium to the sender himself.

☞ To any one who shall send $3.00 for three years' subscription to THE INDEX in advance, a full set of the Photographs shall be mailed post-paid.

☞ The Autograph of each of the above American writers will in all cases accompany the corresponding Photograph; but no Autograph can be sent with the Photograph of the English writers.

☞ These Photographs are well executed, are not on sale anywhere, and can be obtained in no other way. In offering them as premiums, the INDEX ASSOCIATION rely on the good will and active co-operation of all friends of THE INDEX.

☞ All orders for Photographs and remittances of money should be addressed to
THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A SYNOPSIS

PAUL GOWER,

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a Story of English and American Life; the localization being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not in-curious.

It is, also, in the very warp and weft of it, an heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potent with the acquiescing and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfilment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, didactically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is emphatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loom, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER,

Secretary.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, JANUARY 18, 1873.

WHOLE No. 160.

ORGANIZE!

LIBERALS OF AMERICA!

The hour for action has arrived. The cause of freedom calls upon us to combine our strength, our zeal, our efforts. These are

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmations under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be stricken, and that all laws shall be conformable to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Let us boldly and with high purpose meet the duty of the hour. I submit to you the following

FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in —:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice-President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

Liberals! I pledge to you my undivided sympathies and most vigorous co-operation, both in THE INDEX and out of it, in this work of local and national organization. Let us begin at once to lay the foundations of a great national party of freedom, which shall demand the entire secularization of our municipal, state, and national government. Send to me promptly the list of officers of every Liberal League that may be formed, and a standing list of all such Leagues shall be kept in THE INDEX. House, then, to the great work of freeing America from the usurpations of the Church! Make this continent from ocean to ocean sacred to human liberty! Prove that you are worthy descendants of those whose wisdom and patriotism gave us a Constitution unimpaired with superstition! Shake off your slumber, and break the chains to which you have too long tamely submitted!

TOLEDO, O., Jan. 1, 1873.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

An Inference for December 22.

PREACHED IN WEST CHURCH, BOSTON.

BY C. A. BARTOL.

"Pilgrims on the earth."

HEBREWS, XI. 13.

With what sincerity as humility this confession of the old worthies is put! Let me urge it too as the lesson of those we call our pilgrim stock. We build their monument, such as the "Standish Memorial," to rival Bunker Hill: do we emulate their worth? We have discussed their faults,—some sternness, intolerance, exclusiveness, disparagement of beauty in art and injustice to part of our humanity in their laws; but, among these faults, we do not find dishonor or untruth. If any Puritan minister in the flesh answered to Mr. Hawthorne's character of Arthur Dimmesdale, in the Scarlet Letter, he was a rarity. There are more such smooth monsters now. We have heard the fictitious name freely applied to some modern and recent examples, while the transcendent American novelist does not verify his picture by any historic caric. Our sires, forefathers, and pre-mothers, had this grandeur,—what they meant was above-board, in open day. All came out and challenged the judgment of mankind. It is a matter of pride to have their blood in our veins; the aristocracy of New England, to trace one's line by both parental branches to their source. But, says the Apostle, they are not all Abraham's who were of his seed; and Jesus cried to the Pharisees, "Say not ye have Abraham to your father; for these stones God can raise up children to Abraham."

It is not enough to celebrate and commemorate our ancestry, though in the eloquence of Webster or Everett or Choate, with "the labor of an age in piled stones," or with zeal for the preservation of buildings like the Old South Church, over which society and trade, by laws we cannot withstand, alike march in their course, and from which only a sentimental vanity pretends we derive any regenerating sanctity; all this is not enough. Unless we inherit the excellence we praise, it is but idolatry, the worship which hypocrisy can pay. It is said to be difficult to find Plymouth Rock, so much is said about it; it is dissipated, a piece here and a piece there; but no broad and solid basis appears. Where is the rock of that sincerity, built on more than the granite ledge by those landers, in 1620, on the wintry shore? A great religious society in another city calls its institution Plymouth Church; does its faith or ministration demonstrate the veracity, that truth to their light, of those it is operated by and composed of, which the name implies? These are dispassionate, but searching and terrible questions, which duty puts, from a perception that the community is honey-combed, eaten into, rotten, hollow-sounding and crumbling to our tread with insincerity; so diseased 'tis doubtful if the patient could survive the operation of cutting it out.

But what is sincerity? Willingness to be known, having nothing in thought or act to be ashamed of; or to run from after committing, like Adam among the trees of the garden. What is there in us for truth to scare, like bats at the light?

There are privacies that belong not to others' eyes. I do not bathe or go to bed in the street. Napoleon said, we do not wash our dirty linen in public. But to be sincere is not to wish to secrete any deed, transaction, or relation for immoral or discreditable reasons. It is to have no reserves of what cannot bear the light of the sun. It were pleasant if not important, in the way of association, to preserve an old building of our ancestors: I feel like going to a funeral when it falls. But the old building and the old theology preached in it must pass; only let the old principle remain and abide,—and that principle is their sincerity.

Blasphemy expels the Jesuits from Germany; and we protestant republicans are tempted to rejoice at the intolerant and yet impolitic act. But are the Jesuits only there? Are they all Romish? Is there no Jesuitry in America? What is Jesuitry but disguise, dissimulation, feigning what we do not feel or dissembling what we do, as mere tools in others' hands. And of this what store, more than heaps of things in warehouses, on hand in State and Church! A famous clergyman, in a lecture to young men, candidates for the ministry, in Yale College, tells them: "When it comes to preaching, if you have not the feeling, you must act as if you had, that you may carry your congregation with you." Is not that Jesuitical teaching, likely to make a Jesuits' College, even in Connecticut? Is not that to turn the church into a theatre, the preacher into an actor, the pulpit into a stage? But it is not good counsel even for the dramatic art. The performer of a play—Booth or Kemble—does not best when he simulates, but when he is possessed with the sentiment of the character he impersonates and would represent. Does the minister, then, whom Orthodox and radical and Unitarian liberal critics in our newspapers pronounce the greatest preacher in the land, himself pretend to when he is not touched by the emotion appropriate to the passage in his discourse? "Assume a virtue, if you have it not," bitterly says Hamlet to his mother: does he, the captivating lecturer, assume the alpha, gestures, facial expressions, tender or piercing looks of love, lowliness, justice, frankness, when the qualities are far from him? And in prayer take on the posture, air, and manner of gratitude, penitence, pleading entreaty, ardent devotion, when, so far as the inward experience is concerned, it is all a masque and a farce? Rather than do it, my friends, let me cut off my hands and put out my eyes, and have my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth! God forgive, if done it I ever have! Better the palsy than such humbug and quackery,—charlatanry alike in the lyceum or the sacred desk. The imposture of Colorado diamonds, speculation at the capitol involving Congress in the Ring, is no worse.

Not the personal bearing of this or any individual man is my point, but the moral concern for the whole community; and when I learn that sixty thousand copies of such instruction, without a note of remonstrance, have been spread through the land, I feel that the humblest voice should be raised to warn of the corrupting influence.

But the probe of ecclesiastical, as of political, editorial, legal, or medical, and all social insincerity, must go deep and wide. I have read with interest the account of the installation services of another distinguished pastor; and it has been circulated through the country by the daily secular and the weekly religious press with marked effect on the public mind. The Evangelical Council, composed of many denominations, excluding only the Unitarian and Radical, were moved to tears by the tale which the convert to their views from a more liberal faith told of the mental unrest, agitation, and dissatisfaction he had suffered for years before making up his mind that he must leave the ranks of his old friends. Did he mean to declare that, till the new light of a retrograde belief broke on him, and he exchanged the freedom of the spirit for the bonds of a creed, he had been insincere? Was all the former pre-eminent unction put on? Was his frequent and ardent profession of the peace and joy of religion false? Did he win and with conscious innocence swindle young men into the fold and the ministry, as aware of the little capital for such operations he had, as that famous American firm of bankers in Paris, which has just gone by the board, covered by failure with disgrace? How far can honest delusion in such matters go? After a deception so dreadful as to play the part of a leader of the old body, with protestations of loyalty and fidelity, earnest as a magistrate's oath to support the constitution, or a soldier's engagement to follow the flag,—may he possibly be mistaken now, and only entering into a series of wanderings through the spiritual world, or the many devious arches and alleys of this huge coliseum we call Christendom? May not some wicked commentator suspect that want of success and reduction of pay mixed with the motives of change, as in other cases they have done? Denominations are the worst prisons. Doubtless any man, under fresh conviction, may justly alter his creed and his place; but he should, if he can, shun the necessity of confounding his earlier course, accusing his antecedents, shaming his spiritual parentage, defiling his record, or fouling the nest where once so softly he lay.

Not to whet criticism, but illustrate our own experience, I depict insincerely the gap worse than Horace Greeley's "bloody chasm" between seeming and being; between the man in private and in public; between our conversation or action and our thought. When the mantle of dissimulation or pretension is once woven, no bigger than a kerchief lifted to the face, even in a speaker's affectation of what he does not feel, because he fancies it good for an assembly for him to carry at least a semblance of fine emotion, reverence, thankfulness, pity, zeal to interest and edify the folk and entertain the hour,—what lies may not that innocently esteemed mantle cover! The Pharisee, sensualist, cheat may be under that cloak. We shall not know whether anything is true-hearted that he says or does, or all but one great comedy, as some think the world is,—“a stage, and the men and women merely players.” It was said of a certain habitual jester, long since gone to his sober account,—“We don't know when he is in earnest, or if he ever is.”

There is no virtue, comfort, security, but in sincerity. Is there not something insincere in the proposition now so much debated to erase the names of battles from, or not continue them on, the army-register and the regimental flags? The motive may be good, to introduce an era of good feeling. In the breast of our great and unwisely censured Senator I doubt not this is the aim. But would that be the effect? What but absurd, all this tinkering and patching of reconciliation? God and time are the reconcilers. No brave man of the South wants to forget the war in which he was beat; and the attempt at oblivion is foolish and impotent save to make recollection more flagrant and intense. I speak, as said a British orator, with the freedom of history, and I trust without offence; for he that undertakes to abolish history one jot or tittle labors in vain at a mendacious task. When by a party vote in the United States Senate, some thirty years ago, a former resolution of censure against General Jackson for lawless assumption was expunged from the record, the censure and facts it was founded on, so far from being destroyed, were but emphasized and repeated a thousand times, were the removal of the deposits right or wrong. So we must accept in our annals and in every natural fit reminder, avoiding all taunts, the events of our civil strife. No taunts did your dead sons and brothers fling! I lament your omission of the intended memorial pane. But, commemorated or not in any special way, their deeds and sacrifices, noble as any of their fathers, will cry from the ground like the blood of Abel, as their spirits call from heaven; and blazon themselves for posterity in immortal story, and more than silken and gilded cloth be against new peril both our banner and our shield.

When I complained of theological insincerity, my friend said: “It is something that people and priest are getting to be aware of, to see the gulf between their practice or profession and their belief.” I answered: “This very consciousness, unless we repent, makes what was before unconscious depravity to be real positive sin.”

Be truthful; for frankness is beautiful and beneficial too. I hate the disguised opinion, the lip-smile, skin-deep, and covert act. A returning traveller informs me that the German mind has about given up the notion of a personal immortality or God. Well, let the German tongue say so! Whoever, in America, though my dearest friend thinks so, let him say so; truth, though heaven fall and God with it, as he cannot being truth. We shall know then what ground we stand on. We shall stand on the Pilgrim ground, and on the ground of that Declaration of Independence which so boldly proclaimed the views of our revolutionary statesmen to mankind. But, lacking this grace of openness and courage to stand by our convictions, we cease to have the old sublime Puritan and Hebrew feeling of being pilgrims, strangers, sojourners in the earth; like the freedwoman that sang her pilgrim song to me on the St. John, while the water sucked under the steamer's keel, and we might well say in the language of Elijah, which we only hear sung for amusement in an Oratorio: “O Lord, now take away my life; for I am no better than my fathers;” for surely in the grand virtue we are not half so good, and without it life is nothing worth.

The peril is greater because not only the individual but society is insincere. Protection of manufactured goods? We are a joint stock company to protect certain vices. It is thought smart to cheat the revenue, to swear falsely at the custom-house, to bribe officers, to buy votes, to stuff ballot-boxes, voting early and often (witness the election of Mayor in Boston), to get our gloves and silk dresses free of duty; and, if one merchant is convicted of wrong entries, invoices, cheating on a great scale, the excuse is that others do the same on a small one, that the iniquity is common, and everybody would like to have a hand and take a share. We think nobody too good for it. “You declare too much,” said to me the officers. When eminent persons are charged with improprieties, there is an interest to shield them, to suppress the witnesses and their testimony. But, be their accusations true or not, they are thus spread more widely to undermine character, all the more because Ludlow Jail is opened or Music Hall shut, than by any allowing of free speech, as well as free trade, to be met, of course, with refutation or frank reply. Prisons are whispering-galleries, muzzled-mouths louder than cannon; and closets let out their soft-spoken secrets in the reverberation of house-tops. Sincere dealing with moral truth or personal reputation alone is safe. Be it Alexander Hamilton, Daniel Webster, or any contemporary, report only exaggerates, till remorseless justice drags out the guilt that is concealed.

Be open; own your errors; “confess your faults one to another;” tell what you have done; shrink not from having a window put into your breast; it must be looked through sometime! Samuel Johnson and Lord Herbert of Cherbury acknowledged their weakness in yielding to temptation; and, when the enemies of Mr. Hamilton hinted that he was unpatriotic because he had been impure, he sublimely repelled the imputation on his love of country by admitting with a blush, as he expressed it, his private fault. O my friends, do nothing that you will want to hide!

Such the inference from the Pilgrims for ourselves: this the height and port of those men: what they appeared they were! Was their virtue one of circumstance more than merit? They needed but to be supple compromisers, and remain in the old cathedrals and the luxurious social circles of their English home; they needed but to be revolutionists to stay and with Cromwell heard the Monarchy on the question of civil and religious liberty and fight it out. Their sincerity was but attested, not created, by other conflicts in this western wilderness with savage Nature and savage man. When the wise and witty Dr. Kirkland was reproached for the 22d of December sumptuous dining of the New England Society, while the Pilgrims had been reduced to parched corn, he answered, “They got the best they could, and we do the same!” They were obliged on this spot once to live on roots, acorns, and clams, till a vessel arrived with provisions in the harbor amid drifting ice; then the grateful, godly men appointed for all the colonies a solemn day of Thanksgiving. We cannot preserve some of their laws; we would not mimic their manners; nor do I exhort you to imitate their virtues, for a borrowed is a spurious excellence, diamond turned to paste; but our contemplation may be assimilation of what was noble in their spirit.

All is concluded in two counsels: Be true to your light, and have no secrets to be ashamed of! Then you are right and safe. The Pilgrims at least made a clean breast. They had not much light of science, of matter or mind, but were true to all they had,—and to the great Light of Duty and God's word as it spoke to them. How they were led by cloud and fire! We have a great deal of light: how true to it are we as their sons?

SPEAKING THE TRUTH.

The London correspondent of the Christian Register mentions with just praise a periodical published by the “Manchester District Sunday School Association,” whose aim is to tell children the plain truth. He says:—

“It is known as the Sunday School Teachers' Manual, and appears once in three months. The four numbers for the present year are exceedingly rich in the variety and extent of information given, suggestions made, and of just such help as almost every Sunday-school teacher stands in conscious need. Its editors say—one of whom is an excellent practical teacher, and the other as excellent a scholar—‘Our object throughout has been to make our Manual as popular and easy as is compatible with thoroughly sound treatment of the subject matter; but we feel most strongly that our teachers ought no longer to be put off with science a century old, and that views of Scriptural history, theology and criticism, which are considered antiquated in our studies, ought not to be offered to our scholars as if they still kept their place. Any gain in apparent simplicity and ease we should consider very dearly bought at a loss of scientific accuracy or intellectual and spiritual straightforwardness.’ In a series of lessons upon Hebrew Literature, the Old Testament Scriptures, Rev. Mr. Carpenter and Rev. Mr. Wicksteed manfully say, ‘The teacher must take especial care not to let his scholars suppose that the stories and legends are historically true; for if he does so, he is only preparing for them a very painful and perhaps dangerous shock when the time comes for them to discover that they have been misled, but is acting dishonestly as well.’ In fact, the whole spirit of this excellent periodical, which costs here but two pence (four cents) a number, is read in these words: ‘No true reverence can be the fruit of want of honesty. No thought of consequences ought ever to interfere with speaking the truth. Teach children the truth from the first, and there will be no false beliefs for that truth to shock in after times. Silence is bad, but untruth is worse. Let every one teach what he believes, or else not teach at all.’”

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER I.

AN OLD LADY AND GENTLEMAN OF THE OLD SCHOOL.

An old lady and gentleman sat together in the parlor of their own house, in London, one September day, at sunset.

The house stood in a dull street, contiguous to and parallel with the lower part of the Hampstead Road. At the date of its erection its back windows had commanded a pleasant prospect of fields where cows pastured, hedge-rows, and green lanes,—the expanse including what was then Marylebone Fields and is now Regent's Park, and stretching northwards to the breezy heights of Hampstead. It had been purchased while in an unfinished condition, by its present occupant, as an agreeable suburban retreat from business, to be completed according to his own taste and convenience; but the omnivorous metropolis soon absorbed the spot and its environs; and, years before the time of which I write, miles of streets, rows, crescents, and villas lay between it and any green field.

The street had gone down in the world, become utilitarian and shabby of aspect. There were small shops in it; tenements once sacred to competence and citizen-gentility had degenerated into many-belled lodging-houses; beer was licensed to be drunk on the premises at the street-corners; and, opposite the abode of which I write, a gin-palace flared nocturnally. The house itself had grown grimy with half-a-century's smoke; its back-garden, erst terminating in a wicket-gate, whence children used to sally forth on summer-afternoon rambles to Primrose Hill, was blockaded by stables abutting on a “mews,” shut in by walls and neighbored by a brewery. Its two pear-trees had long been cut down, leaving unsightly stumps in the sparse and sickly grass or dirty gravel; its few flowers appeared late in the season and, as if despairing of the attempt to cheer so sombre a spot, died early; while the vines on the sooty trellis exhibited a greater crop of “blacks” (as Londoners call the peculiar, carboniferous deposit of their innumerable chimneys) than grapes. Whether viewed from front or rear, the house was as common place and uninviting as any of the thousands of its class in the British metropolis.

Nor did its external aspect belie its interior. It would have been very easy to imagine a more cheerful residence. Silence reigned in its shady upper chambers, and when the sunlight came through their half-closed blinds, it seemed to shine with chastened splendor appropriate to the place. Family portraits had faded into dimness on the walls; old prints of old preachers stared severely, or lifted their hands in testimony against you, out of frames as sombre and unornamental as their own visages; and the great, gloomy book-cases—mausoleums of serious literature—looked as if their dusty contents were as little disturbed as any philanthropist would have desired, in tenderness to his species. The furniture was not old enough to have borrowed a charm from antiquity, and had a desolate air of disuse about it; while the cumbrous bedsteads involuntarily associated themselves with the idea of solemn death-hours, rather than healthful slumber, or the hopes, fears, and endearments attendant on the entrance of human life into this world. All of these, however, and much more, both of joy and sorrow, the old rooms had contained in their day; inasmuch that to some of their occupants the very echoes seemed to have grown sad and thoughtful; though a girl's voice sometimes surprised them into temporary gladness, and their creaking floors still vibrated to the hopeful tread of youth.

I have said that an old lady and gentleman sat together in the parlor of this house, at sunset. It was a back room. The sun-light, streaming in through a bay-window, looking westwards, made long shadows on the sober-colored druggist which covered the carpet, while the corners of the room grew darker for the contrast. The large-seated, oval-backed chairs; the ponderous old sofa; the paintings and engravings on the walls; the great, time-stained Bible-map depicting the wanderings of the Israelites in the desert, and the battles and sieges of the old Testament, with its quaintly-delineated armies, tents, and cities, were already half-invisible. As the floor grows dusky, the light, stealing upwards, reveals three large and heavily-framed portraits, the centre one almost a full-length, and excelling the others in execution as in size. It represents a burly man in black, with an unprepossessing, coarse, brown face, heavy features and jowl, and a coal-black wig cut straight across and ungracefully hiding his limited forehead. This was a likeness of the once-notorious William Huntingdon, a popular preacher, whose rugged pulpittings raised him from one of the lowest conditions in life to be hailed as a God-sent messenger, or derided as a fanatic or vulgar impostor, during the latter part of the last and the earlier years of the present century. It had been painted by an Italian artist of some merit and celebrity, at the request and cost of the old gentleman, whose own portrait hangs on one side of it, and that of his wife on the other. As the originals of these performances are present, I transfer attention to them from the canvas.

They sit to the right and left of the fire-place, which, in recognition of the season, is ornamented with a parti-colored chimney paper. The old gentleman reclines in an arm-chair, in a corner, immediately opposite the door, which, when opened, always admits a strong draught, especially if the wind blows from the east, to which grievance Mr. Gower is as sensitive as the majority of elderly Englishmen; but his having assumed the place as master of the house, forty years ago, is, of course, an insurmountable reason for never changing it, until he shall require chairs no longer. His crossed legs rest on a foot-stool; his Bible and spectacles are on a bracket, convenient to his right hand; and there is a little table at his left, with a special candle upon it, ready for lighting. He could not be in a better position for having his portrait taken, and here it is:—

He is a handsome old gentleman—seventy-six on his last birthday—with a hale, placid face and a massive, bald head, fringed with thick, white hair. His nose is large and prominent, his mouth spacious and tranquil in expression, his eyes rather deep set, light blue in color, but too small in size, and over-arched by very white, bushy eyebrows. When he walks abroad, at nearly his full height of six feet, dressed in black of a by-gone fashion, with a broad-brimmed, low-crowned hat, silver-buckled knee-breeches and gaiters, people generally take him for a clergyman of the old school, not at all to his dissatisfaction. Crossing-sweepers have been known to quote Scripture to him, on the strength of his personal appearance, thereby obtaining another penny. Indeed, he has preached sermons in his day—though, to tell the truth, exceedingly poor ones—as a disciple of his late friend and pastor, William Huntingdon, who rather disapproved of it when Mr. Gower first took his opinion on the subject, and advised him to make very sure of his "calling" before assuming ministerial functions; but subsequently consented to ordain him, after the manner of his sect, and let him travel about the country, in his own gig, at his own expense, neglecting his own proper business, for the very dubious benefit of chapels of the Independent persuasion. He seldom preaches now, however, except when the trustees of certain "Rooms" in Grafton Street, Fitzroy Square (a seceded branch of Whitfield's Tabernacle), are a very hard run for a Wednesday evening's discourse, when they know that Mr. Gower is always available.

The old lady has rather a stately air, and though she wears spectacles, her eyes look sharp and shrewd under her old-fashioned cap. She sits very erect, with the large table drawn up in front of her. There is a picture in a corner (to the right as you enter the room) representing her as a little girl with a smiling face, clear hazel eyes, a lace cap, and a moss-rose in her bosom; but more than sixty years lie between that and the old lady of to-day. Time has rifled the roses of her cheeks with but little less ceremony than that with which he despoiled the real flowers of half a century ago; and, if her eyes are still sharp, her nose is the same, and likewise her temper; while her lips are thin and withered, though they have not forgotten to smile, if they do so more rarely than of old. Compelled by the fading light, she has put aside her needle-work, and seems to be fidgetting a little; for her black silk dress rustles, as if the activity of her mind communicated itself to her body. Presently she speaks, and the sound of lightly-touched piano-forte keys, which has accompanied our physiognomical observations, ceasing in the adjoining parlor, a slender, handsome girl of seventeen appears at the half-open door. Notwithstanding her remarkable beauty, however, she looks as if something had, not very long ago, occurred to sadden it, and impart a tone of unmistakable depression to what would otherwise have been an equally lovely and happy countenance.

"Did you call, grandma? Shall I light the lamp?"

"Not yet, my dear. I wanted to ask you something, that's all. Did you let Paul in, last night?"

"Yes, grandma,"—uttered with a little constraint, as if the speaker were desirous of avoiding an unpleasant subject.

"I thought so! Past twelve again, and you a visitor! Pretty goings on, night after night!—there, I'm not cross with you, though it's enough to give you your death. Do you know if he intends coming home at anything like decent time this evening?"

"He said something about going to Kennington with—Mr. Sabin," the girl replied, reluctantly, but by no means timidly; indeed there was a suggestion of latent antagonism in her voice.

"Hm!" ejaculated the old lady fiercely. "Mr. Sabin, indeed! That'll do, Ruth, you may go back to your piano—and shut the door. Mr. Gower!"—the old gentleman had sunk into a brown study—"I want to speak to you."

"Well," he said, composedly, "what is it?" "What sort of people are these Sabins whom Paul is so taken up with? He goes to their house three or four times a week, I'm sure, instead of coming straight home, as he ought to do. A nice place it must be, to encourage young men in staying out to all sorts of improper hours! And what's his business at Kennington, I should like to know?"

"I'm sure I don't, my dear," was Mr. Gower's answer.

"Why, I thought you'd met this Mr. Sabin at Mr. Bligh's?" said the old lady, peremptorily. "A painter, wasn't he, or something of that sort?"

"Yes; I believe so. And a very worthy man he appeared to be, though (as I am given to understand) he is not too prosperous in worldly matters."

"Hm! does he paint pictures or houses?"

"Pictures, my dear, pictures! and cleans and restores them. Paul must have got acquainted with him and his family through young Sabin—that tall young man, you know, who called here once. He was with Mr. Bligh some time, but didn't like the business."

"An idle fellow, I dare say!" cried the old lady. "I remember him—coming asking for Paul, with moustaches and a nasty cigar stuck in his mouth—in the morning, too! I don't approve of such acquaintances!"

To which sentiment her husband offering no response, the conversation flagged for a minute or two. It was resumed by Mrs. Gower.

"Do you know that Paul will be out of his time in a month?" she asked.

"Ay?" Mr. Gower raised his bushy eyebrows in tranquil surprise. "He must be near one-and-twenty, then; he was article—let me see—on his sixteenth birthday."

"He's twenty-one next sixth of November," said the old lady emphatically; "day after Guy Fawkes' day—I always remember it by that."

"We must be thinking of doing something for him, my dear."

"That's his business, I suppose!" Another pause, broken as before by Mrs. Gower.

"He'll have to depend upon himself for his position in life, I believe. If he doesn't know that by this time, it's high time he did!" And the speaker nodded her head, again and again, vigorously and angrily.

Her husband did not reply. As if gathering energy from his silence, the old lady kept on.

"Young people who have nothing to look forward to but their own exertions should be obedient, persevering, ambitious, industrious. They should try to deserve the good-will of their elders to whom they owe everything, and plan and scheme to get on in the world more than they do, and then they'd be helped. Instead of which they seem quite indifferent, and waste their time with a pack of people whom their friends disapprove of. And they must take the consequences! Friends are all very well, and acquaintances are all very well, but they're not business! And business is what young people ought to give their minds to, always. We shall see what their Sabins"—with the bitterest emphasis on the word—"will do for them when the time comes."

"Well! well!" said Mr. Gower, who always spoke with deliberation and seemed apprehensive of over-stating himself; "young people will be young people, you know, and we mustn't expect to find old heads on young shoulders. Paul ought to come home earlier, of course, but Mr. Bligh doesn't complain of him."

"He's a great deal too easy and doesn't trouble his head about any of 'em!" cried the old lady.

"Don't tell me! I know how things go on at that office. I was against his going there, at first; he'd much better have been put to a linen-draper's; then he'd have begun to earn money at once, and been kept in out of mischief. But that was your doing and Mr. Blencowe's: I wonder how he'd like to have to keep him, if he doesn't find a situation! That would worry him worse than that nasty, deceitful clergyman who behaved so badly to poor dear Ruth. However, I've quite made up my mind about Paul; he shall either come home at proper hours, or stay out altogether. Night after night! Night after night!—he was very different once—before he knew these Sabins. And I'll find out the reason of his going there, if I have to go to the house on purpose. And so I shall tell him—pretty sharply, too!"

As this was, perhaps, the fiftieth time that Mrs. Gower had relieved herself by similar declarations, her husband listened with true matrimonial resignation and without further remark; so the conversation ended. Nor was a word uttered till twenty minutes later, when the old gentleman proposed ringing the bell for tea, and called Ruth to light the lamp. Just then a double knock at the street door, and the appearance of a maid servant announced a visitor.

CHAPTER II.

NEWS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

"A gentleman to see you, sir. I asked his name, but he says you don't know him."

"Tell him to walk in, Rebecca." The old lady adds a hurried caution relative to the safety of the hats and coats in the passage.

A tall man of about forty, muscular in figure, without superfluity of flesh, his face sunburnt and rather handsome, but unpromisingly hard and keen in expression. His black hair was cut very short, his upper lip and the sides of his face were shaven, but he wore a beard, the peculiar metallic lustre of which was evidently produced by the application of old-fashioned, inferior dye—they have made such improvements in the article nowadays that there is really no detecting it, when scientifically applied. If he had let his moustaches grow, as well as his beard, it would have improved his personal appearance by hiding his mouth, which, without being either too thick or thin-lipped, was large and so unpleasantly indicative of self-will that one couldn't help suspecting that it might look cruel, on provocation. The visitor's dress consisted of a loose summer coat of the thin, black material denominated alpaca, a silk waistcoat of the same color, what the wearer would have called dark "pants," a white hat, and very shiny patent-leather boots.

"I have undertaken the delivery of a letter to you, sir," he says, in a strongly-accented nasal voice—after politely saluting Mr. and Mrs. Gower—"from the United States."

"I'll take a chair, sir!" And the old lady nervously rubbed the glasses of her spectacles, and hastily settled them upon her nose, in order to scrutinize the stranger; her husband, meanwhile, taking the letter and drawing the candle, which Ruth had just lighted, towards him.

Not so much in consequence of observing that the stranger's bright dark eyes were fixed on her grand-daughter's countenance, as from a rising anticipation which made the old lady's heart beat fast, did she tell Ruth, in an agitated manner, to leave the room.

The girl hesitated, paused, and then said frankly and decidedly: "I beg your pardon, grandma, but if this gentleman comes from my father, I should like to stay." Mrs. Gower motioned her to remain.

"My dear," she then inquired of her husband, "is it from John? I'm sure it's from John! Don't keep it from me! Do you know him, sir?"

The stranger's look made his assent superfluous.

"It is from our son," the old gentleman answered, turning with tremulous hand to the signature of the letter.

"I thought so! I knew it! Thank God for it!" The old lady clasped her hands tightly over her breast, laughing and crying. "My poor child! my darling! Oh, sir! how kind of you to bring the news! It's years and years since we have heard anything about him—we'd almost given up hoping!—but I didn't—his old mother didn't! And why hasn't he written before?" The old lady's questions and ejaculations ended in tears; she broke down, and, to employ the phrase ordinarily used by her sex on such occasions, had a regular good cry.

"I guess the doctor has posted you up pretty thoroughly in his letter," said the American, when Mrs. Gower, aided by the sympathizing exhortations of her husband, and not less interested, though more collected grand-daughter, had regained her self-control. "If I can tell you anything in addition, you're welcome, I'm sure."

"Read it out," said the old lady to her husband, who looked towards the stranger and hesitated. With ready tact and politeness, he rose, offering to withdraw into the adjoining room; and, after a little to-do in disclaiming discourtesy and ordering candles, did so, walking into the front parlor and closing the door after him.

Then Mr. Gower read the letter aloud.

It was from his eldest son, breaking a silence which had lasted nearly fourteen years. I shall tell his story hereafter. At present it is sufficient to state that he had been the prodigal of the family. His letter was a peculiar one, exceedingly characteristic of its writer. It seemed dictated by a sense of duty and strong feeling, but embittered by apprehensions of a cold reception, which past severity led him to expect, and against which he was too proud to remonstrate; though he longed for a return of affection and sympathy, and had experienced enough of misfortune to value both. It was this misfortune, he alleged, which had withheld him from earlier communication, inasmuch as it would have necessitated humiliating confessions of want of success and definite position in life, and perhaps laid him open to the suspicion of selfish motives, from the dread of which hard-earned wealth had at length absolved him. That wealth, he said, now enabled him to relieve those who had for so many years supplied his place, of the responsibility of maintaining his children, and to offer them a home in the United States, if they were willing to come, and those who had charge of consented to part with them. Accordingly he had written not only the present letter, but also to the guardian of Ruth (who, as the reader has gathered from an observation of Mrs. Gower's, was only a visitor at her grandfather's), referring the proposal to the decision of his parents and Mr. Blencowe; and, secondarily, to the inclinations of his children, who, he trusted, had not forgotten their vagabond father, notwithstanding his protracted silence. Disavowing any assumption of right or authority in the matter, as cancelled by long abeyance, he yet wished to remind his kinsfolk of his existence, and to assure both Paul and Ruth of his love and solicitude for their welfare. The former, he thought, might at least like to accept his offer, always with the consent of his grandparents. He did not, however, disguise his desire to reclaim both his children.

The letter was very earnestly written, though pervaded by a certain coldness of tone, hinted rather than openly expressed, and suggestive of latent convictions of personal injustice, modified by gratitude on behalf of the children. This appeared especially towards Mr. Gower (the letter was addressed to both parents); to his mother the expatriated son wrote with occasional tenderness, none the less touching for its involuntary sadness. You would have inferred cause for self-reproach in the writer, but a persuasion that it ought, in some degree, to be shared by others. He concluded rather abruptly, by introducing his messenger as Mr. Jesse B. Wheeler, of New York City, a friend of his, who intended crossing the Atlantic on business which required his presence in various European capitals; and with a request for a speedy answer.

Twenty minutes later, after an agitated conversation mainly engrossed by the old couple (though Ruth had her own reasons for being greatly exercised by the news), the American was recalled and warmly thanked for having executed his commission. Mr. and Mrs. Gower were profuse in their offers of hospitality, which Mr. Wheeler civilly declined, on the plea of an immediate departure from London.

"I start for Paris to-night," he said, "but will do myself the pleasure of stopping in on you in about a month's time, in case you'd like to send anything to the doctor. I shall go to New Orleans on my return to the States, and am pretty sure to see him. Is Mr. Paul Gower at home?"

"No," answered the old lady, rather startled at the suddenness of the question.

"Because the doctor made me promise him some sort of report about his children. I can tell him nothing but what will be agreeable about this young lady, I'm sure," with a smile and a bow to Ruth; "but I'd like to see her brother, too."

"If he came home in proper time, as he'd ought to—"Mrs. Gower was beginning, when her grand-daughter, addressing herself to the American, informed him of the cause of Paul's absence, adding:—

"He will be very sorry to have missed you, sir. If you don't mind going to Newman street, which isn't far, and I can give you the address—they'll tell you where he's gone, and—" here, between her desire of accomplishing the interview and the apprehension of taking a liberty, the girl came to a sudden conclusion; nor was her embarrassment at all lessened by a sharp remark from her grandmother about the value of the gentleman's time.

He came to her rescue, very gallantly. "I'd do more than that," he said, "to oblige such a young lady—and the doctor." And, blushing at the compliment, Ruth wrote out the address, Mrs. Gower looking on and sniffing disapproval.

This little transaction ended, Ruth, under the directions of her grandmother, busied herself in producing cake and wine, during which operations, Mr. Gower took advantage of the opportunity to question his visitor:

"My son tells us," he said, when the American had drunk a glass of sherry, "that he is now blest with health and prosperity (which we are naturally very glad to hear), but he does not give many particulars relative to his position in life. After so long an absence (of course very painful to us), we should like to hear as much as possible about him. I think you were good enough to offer us some information?"

I shall condense Mr. Wheeler's answer into its substantial facts. The doctor, as he styled his friend, seemed to have led a thoroughly American life in respect to variety of occupation and locality. He had practised physic and edited a newspaper in New York city, travelled in the far West as railroad-surveyor and land-agent, been a surgeon in the United States army during the Mexican war, visited the South American Republics as a photographer, resumed his original profession, and "tended store" in San Francisco, California. He appeared to have experienced all kinds of hard fortune, being the very foot-ball of the fickle goddess, until his luck had suddenly changed and taken the shape of a considerable legacy in land and negroes, bequeathed to him by a Louisiana friend and patron, in gratitude for his services during the prevalence of yellow fever on the cotton plantation of which John Gower was now owner, situate in Carroll Parish, in the northern portion of that great State, at a place euphoniously known as Buzzard's Bend, on the banks of the Mississippi.

"He was always clever," said the old lady, proudly. Like her husband and grand-daughter, she had listened to the American with as much astonishment as interest; such a variety of adventure and employment sounded half-inconceivable to their English ears. They were, besides, rather disturbed at the idea of the hero of the narrative owning slaves.

"Does my father think of returning to England?" inquired Ruth.

"To be sure he does!" cried Mrs. Gower—a little anxiously, though.

"I guess he has concluded to settle in Louisiana," replied the American: "he may come here on a visit, of course;" adding a commonplace about home and filial affection.

"Of course!" echoed the old lady, looking, like Ruth, very much disappointed. "And where is Louisiana, sir?"

Mr. Wheeler told her.

"Have you known John long, sir—and is he much altered? Why didn't he send his daguerreotype?"

The American described his friend's appearance to the best of his ability, and said he had been acquainted with him for about three years. "The doctor's a fine man and very much respected," he remarked, not as a personal but general eulogium on his character.

Mrs. Gower's heart warmed towards the speaker, whom she straightway subjected to much and minute questioning about her son's health, habits, position, and prospects; to all of which he replied with perfect good humor and patience. Satisfying her at length, he looked at his watch and rose to go.

"We shall see you again, I hope, sir, when perhaps you may favor us with a longer visit. Any friend of my son's, and particularly one to whom we have so much reason to be obliged—" and Mr. Gower completed a rather formal invitation with his hand upon the bell-rope. Declining it, but repeating his promise of calling, Mr. Wheeler politely bade farewell to all present—bestowing a parting glance of scrutiny upon Ruth, as he did so—and was shown out by the servant, leaving those behind him in a state of unwonted interest and animation.

It is unnecessary to trouble the reader with the conversation that occurred over the long-delayed evening meal; as what results accrued from it will be told hereafter. After much talking, chiefly by the old lady and gentleman—for Ruth was too much occupied with speculations about this unknown father of her's (of whom she had no personal remembrance) to be loquacious—Mr. Gower reverted to the letter, and sat silently reading and re-reading its contents, as if desirous of missing no shade of their meaning, for a long time. Presently, with something like a sigh, he re-folded and would have placed it between the leaves of his Bible, had not the old lady demanded it. To that Bible he then turned for consolation.

When Mr. Gower said family prayers that night, his listeners remarked that he dwelt with particular earnestness of supplication on behalf of those "dear to, but distant from us;" and when Ruth kissed him, before going to bed, she noticed that his spectacles were moist with tears.

Meantime the American, on leaving Mr. Gower's house, walked at a brisk pace to what was then the New, but is now the Euston, Road, and presently hailed a passing hansom.

"Hurry up, will you?" he said, giving the man the direction he had received from Ruth.

"All right, sir!" and in another moment he was rattling over the stones with all the velocity inspired by the hope of liberal fare.

Arrived at Newman street, Mr. Wheeler alighted at a house with a tarnished brass plate on the door, bearing the inscription, "John Sabin, Artist: Pictures Cleaned and Restored;" told the cabman to wait, and rang the bell, once, twice—three times—losing patience at the delay, and at a slatternly girl who came and stared at him from the area. At length, however, the door opened and he was admitted. He returned very soon, jumped into the cab and ordered the man to drive to Kennington. An elderly man of large, jolly countenance, who had appeared at the open door, watched the departure of the vehicle, and remained until a shrill cry of "Father!" from within, summoned him from the threshold.

CHURCH AUTHORITY IN EXTREMIS.

[From the London Spectator.]

There is something pathetic in the fresh evidence which every week brings that religious men in all directions are groping painfully for something which shall be at once an authority on which to lean, and no authority by which to be bound,—for an elastic authority that shall sustain them without constraining them,—for a flexible authority which shall be found pliant wherever it presses closely and painfully, but not the less shall supply by its traditional associations the place of deficient conviction wherever there is no clear opinion opposed to it. The "Old" Catholics and the French Protestants—Mr. Guizot, Bishop Wordsworth, and the "Free Presbytery" of Dundee—all betray the same wistful yearning for an authority that shall strengthen your weakness without over-ruling your positive convictions. But such an authority, pliant wherever you press, and sustaining where you wish to lean, is by no means easy to find, if only for this reason, that different minds want to enlarge their freedom in different directions; so that the party of movement in all the various churches have discovered that where they want to enlarge their liberty, their colleagues and friends are of all things anxious, if not to narrow, at least not to extend it. The "Old" Catholics have found out that just at the moment when they were wanting more room for free speculation, Rome was intent on guiding them more imperiously than ever. The rationalistic French Protestants have discovered that long after they had given up the absolute authority of Scripture, and were anxiously groping for some substitute for it in the spiritual morality which Scripture had generated, their co-religionists were anxious to pull the check-string sharply, and force them back to their allegiance to verbal inspiration. In England our Broad Churchmen find that when they try to enlarge the bounds of their communion, and, for instance, to get rid of the anathemas of the Athanasian Creed, the very Puseyites,—who on all other matters appeal to "the primitive Church," "the first four Councils," and so forth,—are horror-struck at this proposal to banish a creed dating at the very earliest from the eighth century, and accuse them roundly of unbelief for wishing to abide by the only creeds known to the primitive Church in question. And in the so-called Free Church of Scotland, no sooner does one of the most distinguished of the ministers avail himself of the fortunate vagueness and generality of the definition of the "Church of Christ" offered in that Communion, to extend the limits of Christian fellowship to a Unitarian of the most spiritual type, than all his brethren cry out on him in horror, and one of them accuses him to his face of wishing, not for "a larger fellowship of saints," but for "a fellowship of devils." In every Church the party of movement seems to be replying to the reproaches and exhortations of the conservative party in the pathetic language of the poet:—

"Come back, come back,—and whither and for what?
To finger idly some old Jordan knot?
Unwieldy to sunder and to weak to cleave,
And with much toll attain to half-believe?"

For it is half-belief, and only half-belief, and that "attained with much toll," that all semi-authoritative Churches offer you at best. Yes, even the Roman Church gives, and gives even to those who humbly accept its doctrinal infallibility most fully, little more than this; for when they come to ask what the Infallible Church really does decree on a number of vital questions—Inspiration, for example—they only find that these questions have never been put, and that it is one of the great subjects of congratulation amongst Roman Catholics that there are so many points of doctrine still left undetermined on which they are still at liberty to think as they please. And in Churches less audacious and more temporizing, it is simply pathetic to hear the explanations offered as to what the final authority is. The "Old" Catholics want to make it the general assent of the whole body of the faithful, the great recommendation of this authority being that you can never by any possibility get at it to put it to the test. So again, Bishop Wordsworth, in his affecting puzzle-headed letter to the "Old" Catholics in congress at Cologne, makes it the great merit of the Church of England that it sticks to the primitive faith and the old Councils, and that it accepts a creed of the eighth century, of which no one knows the origin; while he severely reprehends his correspondents for accepting twelve articles compiled by a Pope in the sixteenth century, making, however, no mention of the fact that the Church of England accepts thirty-nine articles compiled by all sorts of volunteer theologians of about the same date. Surely it is impossible to indicate more perfectly the quaintly subjective nature of the authority to which the worthy bishop meekly bows. He and his party lean on the authority of whatever has become a second nature with them, whatever date the symbol bears, while they recoil in alarm from that to which they are unaccustomed, whether originating early or late. The case is not different with the "Free Church Presbyteries." Read the report in the Dundee Advertiser on Thursday week (12th September) of Mr. Knight's interview with his grieved and reproachful Presbytery, and notice the tremors which pervade them all, even the most Orthodox, as to the exercise of any real authority on the part of the Presbytery. The most prudent of them, while vehemently asserting that the Presbytery has a true divine authority as a Church to admonish and condemn, are beyond measure anxious not to use it more than they can help. There is no doubt at all about the theoretic right,—the Presbytery as a Court of Christ's Church was warranted authoritatively to prohibit any course of conduct or action on the part of any one of its members which it might deem injurious to the interests of the Church and to the cause of Christ generally,— but as to the practical exercise of that right, why there is not one of the really experienced members, not even he who interjected so forcibly that Mr. Knight wished for "fellowship with devils," who does not feel anxious about it, and wish to get out of the matter with as little practical strain on the authority of the Presbytery as possible. The general feeling of the Presbytery seems to have been that their ecclesiastical authority was a capital thing to fall back upon in their own minds, but that the less it was called upon to put down actual heresy, the better. Indeed there was a universal feeling of regret that the Church should be compelled to assert the exclusion even of Unitarians as such, from the Church of Christ: not that Unitarians are any better than they should be, but that the vaguer their definition of the true Church of Christ is, the better,—the better would it be adapted to sustain weak faith without challenging sharp criticism.

Nothing seems to us more really typical of the day and more sad in itself, than the universal distrust of the very ecclesiastical authority to which so much appeal is made. From Rome, who boasts how many loopholes and breathing-apertures are left for doubt, even after her infallibility is proclaimed, to the Free Presbytery of Dundee, which asserts its authority, and in the same instant seeks in every direction for an excuse not to use it in any way that will bring its nature into debate, the characteristic cry of the conservatives in every Church seems to be for some prop on which to lean where faith is weak, without any impediment to liberty where faith is strong,—an authority not too obvious or overbearing, an authority with an uncertain but comforting sound,—uncertain enough not to interfere with what you earnestly believe, and comforting enough to help you to believe what you don't like to reject, but only half-believe. Pere Hyacinthe, for instance, is horrified at the notion of Protestantism. He converted his wife from it, and professes loudly his intention to remain a Catholic priest. But he throws off all the authority of the Roman Church, not only as to infallibility, but as to practical matters like the marriage of priests, and appeals to the "Old" (Catholicism as his standard. What the "Old" (Catholicism's standard may turn out to be, nobody knows. It has thrown off one General Council because it was not free, and has not told us which of the General Councils that it accepts was free. It decides at present to include the Jansenists, the more willingly that it has borrowed a bishop from them, and it seems inclined to include the Anglo-Catholics of this country, as represented by Bishop Wordsworth, if it can manage to comprehend them. The result seems likely to be that "Old" Catholicism will draw its line as to what sort of Catholicism is "Old," very much where it is most convenient for present emergencies to do so, and that it will contrive to put its ultimate authority as completely out of reach as if it denied all ecclesiastical authority exercised on earth altogether,—which it does not.

In short, "Authority" seems to mean the reserve force retained by Churches for the purpose of helping conservative piety to believe what otherwise it would only wish to believe. It hardly ever succeeds in preventing anybody from believing heartily what it repudiates. It hardly ever succeeds in persuading anybody to believe heartily what does not suit his state of mind; but it does just succeed in disguising from a good many persons the difference between a wistful aspiration and a real faith; between a half-faith and a whole. But even in this it does not succeed much longer. The time is approaching rapidly when religious faith will be a positive individual conviction, resting on definite spiritual grounds, in each person, or else nothing at all. Ecclesiastical authority is shrinking everywhere into insignificance except at Rome, and there it is trying its devotees more than they can bear. The "Old" Catholics prefer at present to say that there is a clearer test of what is "old," i. e., primitive, than of what is true, and that the former is a clew to the latter. But they will find, as Anglo-Catholics have found, "primitive-ness" a very roundabout and intricate clew to divine truth,—one on which it will be impossible to agree. And where reformers who insist on interpreting the Bible for themselves can have found the moral justification for any intermediate authority between themselves and Christ,—such as a Westminster Confession of Faith, for example,—we never have had the least conception, and even the Scotch Churches are beginning to quake at the utter untenability of their position now. It is a sufficiently hard duty to scrape out, each for himself, the drift of the divine revelation, but it is what we are coming to very fast. The only kind of authority which any creed will in time be able to boast, will be that a great number of religious-minded and independent men, honestly studying for themselves the records of Christian teaching, have arrived at a common result,—in short, the authority attaching to all coincidence of faith among those competent to inquire, and eager for truth alone.

The Sanctuary of Superstition.

N. B.—Brief and pithy extracts for this column will be gratefully received. Please send marked copies.

CONQUEST OF THE WORLD.—The Church is moving on the heathen world as never before. She is beginning to carry out the great command of the Master, "Go and disciple all nations." All along the lines the tramp of Immanuel's army is heard. Fall into the ranks, do your duty, and soon you will shout the world's conquest to Christ.—Boston Zion's Herald.

WELL-MEANT SOLICITUDE.—Dear reader, are you teaching any soul to hate sin? If not, begin now, begin with the sinning soul the nearest to you, and then go on as far as your influence can possibly go. Don't delay. You may die before you have the means of saving one soul, then how poor you will feel in heaven, should you ever get there.—L. Crawford, in Dover (N. H.) Morning Star.

THE END OF THE WORLD.—The end of the present dispensation must be near. Bro. B. Taylor inquires for our views in relation to the coming of Christ in 1873. We can heartily say, so far as we are personally concerned, we should be greatly rejoiced to be satisfied he would come as soon as 1873; but the evidence presented does not convince us that we shall see the Savior next year. We see a large "18" in the way. We think the evidence for 1875 much stronger. There are certain events which we think must transpire before the coming of Christ. When we see those in process of fulfillment, then we may expect his immediate coming. We do not say they cannot transpire between now and the close of 1873, but we think more time will be required. Let us all wait and watch and pray.—World's Crisis (Boston, May 8, 1872).

TOTAL DEPRAVITY.—Men do not like the term total depravity. But you might as well expect to find a man born a hundred years old, as to expect to find a man born without a depraved nature. When you shall find a child knowing all arithmetic at one year old, expert in all music at one year old, a universal historian at one year old, an athlete at one year old, full of all temporal wisdom at one year old,—then, and not before, will you find another child that is born into this world expert in all virtue, in all truth, in all moral purity, in all upward tendencies. The fact is, men are born at the lowest point of the scale, and work their way up through cycles of inexperience and mistakes and transgressions to the highest point. And it is not a slander to say that men are depraved, unless it be a slander to say that this is the method of divine creation, or that this is the way the world was organized.—Oneida Dispatch.

ONLY ONE BOOK.—Blessed be God that there is at least one thing thoroughly superhuman, supernatural, in this world; something which stands out from and above "the laws of Nature;" something visible and audible to link us with Him whose face we see not, and whose voice we hear not! What a blank would there be here, if only this one fragment of the divine, now venerable, both with wisdom and age, were to disappear from the midst of us; or, what is the same thing, the discovery were to be made that this ancient volume is not the unearthly thing which men have deemed it, but, at the highest estimate, a mere fragment from the great block of human thought; perhaps, according to another estimate, a mere relic of superstition! There is but one Book, and we shall one day know this, when that which is human shall pass away (like the mists from some Lebanon peak) and leave that which is divine, to stand out and to shine out alone in its unhidden grandeur.—Horatius Bonar, D. D.

BAPTISMAL PANTS.—Of all the advertisements in the way of "Church Furniture," which we have seen, the National Baptist is responsible for the most outrageous. The Baptists have, as most people know, a haughty air about them, sometimes called "primitive Christianity," and like to prove their immersion theories by the instance, among others, of the celebrated Ethiopian who went down into the water and was baptized by St. Philip. We do not know whether they are so far gone in ritualism that we can ask them without offence whether the garments referred to below are supposed to be the correct thing, and modelled after those of the convert in question:—

BAPTISMAL PANTS.

(Manufactured by Richard Levick, 708 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.)

FOR

16 New Subscribers at $2 50 a year, or 11 New Subscribers and $5 00 in cash,

We can give a pair of Baptismal Pants made to order. Send size of boots, size around the waist, and height of the person for whom they are intended.

—Brooklyn Catholic Review.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Nine Hundred and Sixty-Four Shares.

SETH HUNT,	Northampton, Mass.,	One Share,	$56.400
WM. H. GILMORE,	Chicago,	"	100
C. A. GREENLEAF,	"	"	100
			$56.700

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending January 11, 1873.

Miss M. E. Sawyer,	$3.00	F. G. Brandt,	3.00
Chester A. Greenleaf,	1.50	Mrs. Adam Koch,	3.00
O. W. Cook,	3.00	C. D. B. Mills,	3.00
E. W. Dickerson,	3.00	J. Henry Clark,	3.00
Nicholas Jovanovich,	3.00	Annie J. Stoddard,	3.00
Wm. A. Burnham,	1.50	S. B. A. Haynes,	3.00
A. D. Adams,	1.00	F. H. Ross,	3.00
Byron R. Carpenter,	1.00	S. Graham,	3.00
J. Via Blake,	18.00	James Atkinson,	3.00
Elisabeth H. Besmer,	.75	D. Boyd,	3.00
D. Craig,	1.70	S. Rogers,	1.00
H. J. Haight,	1.00	Mrs. C. E. Seer,	3.00
Walter P. Whitney,	.40	Mrs. L. H. Cowles,	1.00
Oliver N. Robinson,	1.50	C. B. Holloway,	3.00
James Whittier,	1.50	J. J. Nichols,	3.00
Eliza A. Babbitt,	1.50	E. A. H. Belyand,	3.00
Mrs. F. Q. Davis,	.75	Mrs. R. E. Matliska,	3.00
W. T. Carley,	.75	F. P. Sessena,	3.00
W. Elsey,	.75	W. F. Allen,	3.00
Chas. A. Hayden,	1.50	John Dedrick,	3.00
Wm. H. Farquhar,	3.00	John C. Oehlert,	3.00
Joseph McGuchnie,	3.00	John L. Woods,	3.00
A. M. Greeley,	3.00	Magnus Pfau,	3.00
Edw. Howland,	3.00	M. B. Bryant,	3.00
C. Townsend,	3.00	A. S. Carpenter,	3.00
Frank Edson,	3.00	Huldah T. Campbell,	3.00
Mary A. Ross,	3.00	D. L. Crittenden,	3.00
L. A. Gushue,	3.00	Amos Smith,	3.00
John Robinson,	3.00	Fred. Frothingham,	3.00
James M. Walton,	3.00	Geo. Kridler,	3.00
J. K. Cook,	3.00	J. H. Robinson,	3.00
A. J. Warner,	3.00	Mrs. M. J. Terry,	3.00
Joseph Post,	3.00	N. Cobb,	3.00
Joseph Barnes,	3.00	B. F. Smith,	3.00
J. D. Myrick,	3.00	Calvin Manning,	3.00
J. E. Putnam,	3.00	J. W. Thompson,	3.00
Mrs. E. R. Francis,	3.00	M. R. Robinson,	3.00
Miss M. E. Rice,	3.00	J. B. Bonnell,	3.00
R. M. Turner,	3.00	Laura Barnard,	3.00
W. J. Barnes,	3.00	Joel McMillan,	3.00
Ferrin Scarborough,	3.00	A. W. Nichols,	2.00
Celia Burleigh,	3.00	Mrs. A. F. Curtis,	10.00
Henry Palphamand,	3.00	Chas. Shepard,	20.00
L. Beche,	3.00	Jennie Dey,	1.00
S. D. Fuller,	3.00	A. S. Martin,	.40
R. D. Fyler,	3.25	P. Mellicham,	.30
O. M. Hawley,	3.00	John B. Woods,	.30
Geo. W. Weed,	3.00	J. W. Cogswell,	.30
E. Aldrich,	3.00	G. T. Beakett,	.10
C. H. Green,	3.00	Chas. H. Lindell,	.65
Francis H. Lee,	3.00	Alfred Warren,	4.50
Oliver S. Taber,	3.00	James W. Greene,	3.00
P. M. Vaughan,	3.00	David G. Francis,	12.50
W. F. Freeman,	3.00	Geo. W. Park,	20.00
C. P. Williston,	3.00	David Branson,	25.00
Lyman Cross,	3.00	James T. Dickinson,	140.00
Dyer D. Lum,	3.00	Wm. J. Potter,	70.00
Geo. W. Stevens,	3.00	Brown & Faunce,	30.00
G. H. A. Morse,	3.00	J. H. Pease,	10.00
Amos Eldridge,	3.00	E. Russell,	3.00
M. G. Kimball,	3.00	B. E. Gremshaw,	3.00
M. P. Barber,	3.00	H. V. Spooner,	3.00
Jonas Hilton,	3.00	L. O. Bass,	3.00
Chas. H. Wheeler,	3.00	Ira Smith,	3.00
Thos. Evans,	3.00	Schuyler Rue,	2.00
Mrs. C. Stratton,	3.00	J. Hartung,	.80
F. H. Bulwer,	3.00	Wm. Henry,	1.00
Jno. H. Bridge,	3.00	C. N. Harlow,	3.00
Geo. W. Robinson,	3.00	Francis Mason,	3.00
Sylvanus Hong,	3.00	E. G. Allen,	3.00
Howard Delano,	3.00	Lucy Williams,	3.00
Elizabeth N. Copeland,	3.00	R. P. Dresser,	3.00
Eliza S. Williams,	3.00	Michael Neale,	3.00
D. B. Marsh,	3.00	J. E. Wilson,	3.00
Amos Robinson,	3.00	J. T. Thornton,	4.00
R. H. Clark,	3.00	Almira L. Tracy,	2.00
John Perigo,	1.50	E. O. Avery,	3.00
John Miller,	1.00	James Anson,	3.00
David G. Francis,	3.00	S. W. Ayers,	3.00
Geo. W. Park,	3.00	A. Bate,	3.00
David Branson,	3.00	W. J. Ryan,	3.00
W. W. Moore,	3.00	I. Rigdon,	3.00
David Lee,	3.00	Geo. E. Jewett,	3.00
C. Cone,	3.00	Hugo Andreessen,	3.00
F. M. Tate,	3.00	Flake Barrett,	3.00
W. J. Cochran,	3.00	W. C. Rust, Jr.,	3.00
Lewis Porter,	3.00	S. L. Hill,	3.00
J. W. Winkley,	3.00	Wiley Britton,	3.00
Samuel Shephardson,	3.00	Wm. Wisewell,	3.00
A. Mills,	3.00	Mrs. M. M. Sherman,	3.00
A. Noss,	3.00	Eugene Hutchinson,	2.00
H. W. Warren,	3.00	M. B. Sherwin,	3.00
P. R. Wright,	3.00	J. W. Pike,	3.00
E. R. Wicks,	3.00	J. T. Blakeney,	3.00
Charles Gerlach,	3.00	Geo. H. Foster,	12.00
John G. Anthony,	3.00	Thos. R. Davis,	3.00
Geo. Blackburn, & Co.,	3.00	Wm. O. Ewins,	2.00
Thos. McClintock,	3.00	Chas. P. Tenney,	3.00
L. M. Maines,	3.00	Reuben M. Mansur,	3.00
John C. Bills,	3.00	R. H. Ranney,	3.00
Herman Block,	3.00	Kara Hamit,	3.00
Henry Severance,	3.00	A. P. Lima,	3.00
Wm. J. Godfrey,	3.00	Gabriel Crane,	3.00
Ann Horr,	3.00	Toledo Printing Co.,	10.00
James Forbes,	3.00	Emil Zeller,	3.00
Wright & Cleverger,	3.00	Jefferson Cary,	3.00
C. O. Whitman,	3.00	Hadley Fairfield,	3.00
N. P. Dudson,	3.00	Henry J. Hathaway,	3.00
R. Patridge,	3.00	Robert B. Estey,	3.00
M. Durell,	3.00	Wm. C. Donnell,	3.00
Henry Buxer,	3.00	Royal C. Clough,	2.00
Laura Wade,	3.00	A. Raymond,	3.00
Henry F. Dunkel,	3.00	Edw. Chapman,	3.00
Alex. R. Weyth,	3.00	E. A. Smith,	2.00
Harsh F. Bennett,	1.35	Chas. Bonnell,	3.00
Horace White,	1.50	Joel Sharp,	3.00
Esther Matthews,	1.00	Charles Wiley,	2.00
Daniel B. Bean,	1.00	Abraham Clegg,	3.00
J. S. Shaller,	1.00	Phineas Wadsworth,	3.00
I. S. Judd,	1.00	E. A. Kelley,	3.00
C. Bruchauer,	2.50	A. R. Hunter,	3.00
B. Gardner,	3.00	T. R. Butler,	3.00
A. T. Lilly,	3.00	A. L. Grinnell,	3.00
J. M. Davis,	3.00	L. T. Womack,	2.75
Edward L. Loomis,	2.50	David Wright,	3.00
Edward Allen,	3.00	F. E. Baker,	3.00
George Shepard,	3.00	R. J. Karz,	3.00
Henry Townsend,	3.00	J. T. Thornton,	1.00
H. C. Hard,	3.00	Sarah Emerson,	10.00
L. T. Rippey,	1.00	Miss E. Emerson,	10.00
Jacob Ruby,	1.50	Warren Emerson,	10.00
Rich'd Humphrey,	.75	Wm. P. Chambers,	10.00
N. Hayward,	1.75	Samuel L. Hill,	10.00
Jennie E. Moss,	1.50	R. H. Ranney,	10.00
		T. B. Skinner,	.30

All ends of reform are darkly shaded in the background with the accumulated vices of generations.

The Index.

JANUARY 18, 1873.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 88, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ARTHUR WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
CORRESPONDENTS: FRANCIS FRANKLIN, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. FOSTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOYSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Please send all matter intended for any particular issue of THE INDEX at least a fortnight in advance of date. We shall be very greatly obliged by attention to this request.

Our virtues should be the stuff of which our lives are woven, not bits of gaudy ribbon pinned on for show in fair weather. How much finery is stripped off by a sudden wind of temptation!

Sturdy old John Knox prefaced the Confession of Faith which he gave to Scotland with this large and liberal declaration: "Protesting that, gif any Man will note in this our Confession any Article or Sentence repugning to Gods holle Word, that it wad pleis him of his gentlines, and for Christianse cherities saik, to admonise us of the samyn in writt; and We of our honour and fidelitie do promeis unto him satisfactioun fra the Mouth of God, that is, fra his holle Scripture, or ellis reformatioun of that quhilk he sall prove to be amyss." This reminds us of John Robinson's famous declaration that "the Lord has more truth yet to break out of his holy Word." The spirit of Free Religion thus lighted up with great illumination the otherwise intolerant theology of the great Protestant Reformers.

Inquiries as to the price of the photographs advertised in THE INDEX begin to be made. It is necessary to state that the only price asked is the little labor requisite to secure new subscriptions to the paper. The photographs are not for sale. The object of the premium scheme is solely to increase the circulation of THE INDEX; and it is very doubtful if any of the gentlemen whose photographs are offered would have consented to it for any other reason. If you will only make a little exertion, you will be surprised at your own success. We hope that every one who desires any or all of the photographs will be willing to get his neighbors to subscribe, and thus secure what he wants. The purpose of the premium project would be wholly defeated, if we were to sell the photographs. Consequently we trust our friends will take the offer of the photographs as a gentle hint that we need their assistance, of which the present of a few photographs will be merely a grateful and quite inadequate acknowledgment. It will be a small thing to our subscribers, but a great thing to us, if each of them will now actively help to swell the subscription list of THE INDEX. We must therefore respectfully decline to put a price on these photographs; but they will be sent most cheerfully without price in return for a little active aid. It should be added that the expense of the plan forbids us to consider as a "new" subscriber any one whose name was already on our list at New Year.

"PAUL GOWER."

We take great pleasure in announcing that arrangements have at last been concluded for the publication in THE INDEX of a very interesting Radical Romance, which will probably continue during the year. In adding such a feature as that of a serial story to THE INDEX, we have simply been desirous to advance its general cause,—not to lower its character by catering to an appetite for sensationalism in the public, but rather to make the paper more popular in the highest sense of the word, by appealing to a wider range of sympathies than can be reached by reasoning alone. The free religious movement embraces all humanity; not merely all individuals, but all of each individual,—imagination and sentiment quite as much as the dry intellect. Hence the advantage of presenting a truthful picture of life as variously affected by various religious ideas, none the less truthful for being imaginary in incident and situation. We believe that "Paul Gower" will be found to be a work of high excellence, adapted to carry further forward in its own way the cause to which THE INDEX is specially devoted, and to bring it home to the hearts of very many who would otherwise be little interested in it. If this were not really a "rationalistic story," we should not have thought best to devote to it so much space in these columns; but, as it is, we believe that the space required could not otherwise be so advantageously filled. That this judgment will be abundantly confirmed by the readers of THE INDEX is our confident expectation.

To meet the sure demand for back numbers which will be made as the story progresses, we shall print each week a surplus of copies to a limited amount. Whoever desires to secure the story entire should subscribe at once. During the past three years it has been our uniform experience that a greater demand than could be met has been made for the earlier numbers of each year: and it will undoubtedly be the same this year. By subscribing immediately the unbroken file can be secured; and all who wish for it should act without delay. Especially to all friends who wish to increase the circulation of the paper we would say that now is the time to make vigorous efforts in its behalf. Let them send for the "Agents' Circulars," and thus become acquainted with the best plans of procedure. Now for "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together!"

AN UNLOOKED-FOR ALLY.

It is cause for profound congratulation to the liberals of this country that the Toledo Commercial (which is doubtless taken by every family in the land, from the aristocratic denizens of the metropolis to the stout yeomanry of the farmhouse and the log-but) gives its unqualified approval to the plan of radical organization sketched on our first page. In the issue of that paper for January 6, after quoting largely from THE INDEX, and dwelling upon the matter at some length, the editor thus indicates his deep sympathy with the movement:—

"We refer to this movement chiefly for the purpose of record, in order that it may be known when and where it got its start; and we will not deny that this purpose is not wholly unmixed with local pride. . . . The local distinction thus promised will very naturally enlist in behalf of this new movement no little interest with our citizens, and hence the concern they have in this announcement."

We were not, we confess, quite prepared for the bold endorsement thus accorded to our proposition by so distinguished a journal. Its vast circulation renders the aid it so generously extends serviceable in the extreme; while the great weight universally attached to the opinion it expresses, the preponderating influence it exerts over the most progressive minds of the age, and the deference invariably shown to its utterances, not only by its local competitors (the Toledo Blade, for instance), but also by the great dailies of New York, London, and Paris, combine to make the favor it confers too overpowering ever to be adequately repaid. With sentiments of the most unutterable gratitude, we frankly confess our obligation as the only way we see to pay even a poor instalment of the debt; and we refer our readers to the columns of the Commercial as likely to contain the ablest arguments and most fervid, persuasive appeals in behalf of radical organization. Although hitherto not specially identified with the liberal cause, we doubt not that the "coming man" has at last arrived, and that the editor of the Commercial, waving the glittering sword which was never yet found on the losing side, will lead the jubilant legions of radicalism to a victory that will dazzle the world.

P. S.—It is not true that the editor of the Commercial swallows the Westminster Catechism entire. Thirty years ago a doubt of the damnation of unbaptized infants flashed fitfully across his mind; and there are grave grounds for suspecting that its ghost still haunts the editorial intellect.

Napoleon Buonaparte, conversing with Bertrand at St. Helena, is reported to have used the following language: "Superficial minds see a resemblance between Christ and the other founders of religion and empire; but it does not exist. There is between Christianity and every other religion the distance of infinity. Everything about the Bethlehemite astonishes me; his march across the ages and the realms is not human. You speak of Alexander, of Cæsar, and the enthusiasts they enkindled in the breast of their soldiers; it was nothing. My armies have forgotten me even while living, as the legions of Carthage forgot Hannibal; a single defeat crushes us, scatters our power; but this dead man, with an army faithful to his memory, is making conquests yet, and from his tomb is governing more than we all did from our thrones!" We would inquire of Orthodox writers who so often quote these words with approval, whether the deeds of the Church have been and are done in obedience to the "government" of its so-called Head? If they answer unqualifiedly yes, then Jesus is responsible for all the crimes of the Church. If they answer unqualifiedly no, then Jesus is deprived of all the glory of its achievements. The Catholic would give the former answer, denying that anything ever done by the Church was a crime. The free thinker would give the latter answer, thereby denying that Jesus is the real "governor" of the Church at all, and exposing the shallowness of the ex-Emperor's vaunted tribute. But the Protestant Christian, with his usual confusion of things incompatible, would probably answer that Jesus ordains all the Church's achievements, and none of its crimes; which, considering that its crimes are an inseparable part of its achievements, leaves the whole thing in a muddle. An easy way out of the difficulty is to consider the deeds of the Church as done simply by the men who actually controlled it, on the warrant of their own ideas of what was right, expedient, or profitable to themselves. But then this spoils the imperial fustian, and shows that the great warrior did not have a very clear head in things theological.

Goldwin Smith says: "The chiefest authors of revolutions have been not the chimerical and intemperate friends of progress, but the blind obstructors of progress,—those who, in defiance of Nature, struggle to avert the inevitable future, to recall the irrevocable past; who chafe to fury, by damming up its course, the river which would otherwise flow calmly between its banks, which has ever flowed, and which, do what they will, must flow forever." Progress now demands the thorough and consistent secularization of our political institutions; to oppose this demand is to render certain a rise of the flood.

The London Saturday Review deplores the "decline of politeness." Mr. Emerson, who is now abroad, is a notable teacher on "manners." We would advise the Saturday Review (if it did not inhabit altitudes far above the reach of the human voice) to take a few lessons of Mr. Emerson in that sincere and abundant kindness which, despite some little external awkwardness, renders him a master in the fine art of courtesy. Politeness is merely kindness gracefully expressed.

CHILDREN AS "UNFORGIVEN SINNERS."

This is what the Independent—the most liberal Evangelical newspaper in America—thinks about children:—

"It is a common thing for teachers in the Sunday school to count all children coming under their care as unforgiven sinners, in rebellion against God, and having no right to trust Jesus as their personal Savior. Yet not a few of these children have for years known of Jesus, prayed to Jesus, loved Jesus, trusted Jesus. By what right do their teachers venture to deny them the fullest privileges of accepted believers? A teacher should have very good reason for addressing a child as in the natural state of sin, rather than in a state of grace—some better reason than the fact that that child was born in sin. Yet the feeling is prevalent among teachers that it is always safe to talk to a child as to one out of Christ, in the absence of professed evidence that that child has passed certain conscious stages of experience. A teacher ought first to find if that child believes in Jesus as his needed and sufficient Savior, before deciding how to treat him in class intercourse."

This "reminds me of a little anecdote." A lady whom I know was lately travelling on the continent of Europe, and one of her daughters used the expression "railroad car." An English clergyman whom they had just met in travelling said to her: "Let me give you one piece of advice. If you do not wish to be known as an American, do not say car, but carriage." Upon which the mother quietly replied: "But suppose my daughter is perfectly willing to be known as an American, what then?" The clergyman had the sense to apologize, and, as it says in novels, the conversation took another channel.

It is very kind of this good man in the Independent, to ascertain whether a child "believes in Jesus as his needed and sufficient Savior," before treating him as a sinner; but suppose he makes no pretence of any such belief, what then? A good many of the very sweetest children I have ever known have not been brought up to think that they needed any Savior except the Deity himself. They have been trained to think that their creator was himself more desirous to save them than they were to save themselves; and they have "believed in Jesus" only as a good and noble man, who had great sympathy with little children. It is not only safe, but entirely correct, to talk to these children as "out of Christ" in any proper Evangelical sense. Are you then to address them, in the phrases of the Independent, as "unforgiven sinners," "in rebellion against God," and "in the natural state of sin"? Are you, in short, going to speak to them in words that will puzzle them and stultify yourself—or how?

According to the assumption of the Independent, most of the children of Unitarians, Universalists, Hicksite Quakers and Spiritualists (to name no others) are still left outside, even by its liberal construction of its creed, and are, as Dr. Hewsey said at the recent Church of England Conference, "heathen children." Yet the most rigid zealot will not assert that these children show any more evidence of a natural state of sin than is exhibited by the proverbial ministers' sons and deacons' daughters. They do not, as Charles Lamb feared in respect to pickpockets' sons in Australia, develop any additional fingers through hereditary predisposition to thieving, nor show an unusual appetite for any other vice. On the contrary, some of them grow up into those very satisfactory types of character, described by the sturdily Orthodox Dr. Holland as "extremely lovable," though not Christians even in name. "Many Christians," he says, "prefer them for companions to those who are enrolled with them on church registers, and are puzzled to know why it is that they love them more than they do those who are nominally their brethren." Yet all this good result is accomplished on the basis of what old Dr. Beecher used to call "natural virtues."

Then, again, consider this perplexing problem of the Jews. There are some sixty thousand of these, old and young, in the city of New York alone—a body so temperate that Miss Catherine Beecher declares intoxication to be almost unknown among them, and so rigid in regard to chastity that the retribution for an offence is visited upon the third and fourth generations.

Yet even the benevolent editorial writer of the Independent must himself admit that, by his standard, every one of these ten or fifteen thousand Jewish children in New York is "an unforgiven sinner." Such a child not only does not "believe in Jesus as his needed and sufficient Savior," but would turn from any such belief with the utmost horror. Surely, then, a teacher would "have very good reason for addressing a child as in a natural state of sin" under circumstances so hopeless.

I will not follow the matter farther, nor speak of those Mohammedan children who charmed Lamartine, nor of those Buddhist children who become so interesting in the fascinating books of Mrs. Leonowens. "The moral of it is," as the Duchess says in Alice's Adventures, that good men whose charity goes beyond their own sect must soon carry it beyond their own religion as well. They must open their eyes to the fact that belief in Jesus "as a Savior" has no necessary connection with either sin or salvation, and that childish virtue is virtue, whatever catechism the child says or leaves unsaid.

T. W. H.

PRACTICAL REGENERATION.

I have been greatly interested in looking over the "Twentieth Annual Report of the Treasurer of the Children's Aid Society" in New York City. It is a little pamphlet of only twenty pages, and consists to a large extent of sub-reports in the form of statistical tables, from Industrial Schools and Lodging Houses; yet its facts and figures are more eloquent than any other form of expression could be, in behalf of the noble charity which it represents. One fact alone is worth volumes of glowing rhetoric which might be written in praise of the philanthropic work which the New York Children's Aid Society is doing. This fact is that the Society during the twenty years of its existence has removed 28,677 poor children out of the evil conditions of their homeless and nomadic life in New York City, and provided them with comfortable homes. And this Emigration-phase of the Society's work is constantly increasing. During the past year homes have been found for 3,463 children. In 1853, when the work began, 207 were thus cared for. A large portion of them are sent West and into the country, and always under the superintendence of careful agents, who see that the homes are what they should be. Nearly 1000 have been taken during 1872 beyond the Mississippi: some of them to distant Colorado.

But a more important fact than this of numbers is, that probably the larger part of these children have been saved to lives of usefulness and virtue. What they would have become had they been left to grow up in the vagrant street-life of New York, with all its evil solicitations and necessities, we can conjecture; what they have become the Society positively knows in so many instances that it may reasonably infer that the same result has followed in a large majority of cases. In fact, I believe it may be truthfully said that the Society has actually saved the larger part of these children from lives of degradation and crime. One of the agents, who recently visited a large number of homes where he had placed children five years before, reports: "He found them happy inmates of respectable homes—loving and beloved—varying now in ages from seven to twenty-three years; well, contented, thriving. Some were practically adopted into families, others quite indispensable to the happiness and welfare of those who had taken them, half in charity, a few years before." And the Treasurer in his general summing up of the twenty years work, says:—

"There are, happily, members of our large family who have become not only good and respected citizens, but some of them distinguished among men. And why not? The garret and the cellar are quite as likely as the palace in a free country to supply the notable men of the land. For everybody knows it is the self-reliant, strong-willed boy that makes the dominant man. And plenty of such boys may be found among the destitute orphans who compose our yearly emigrant parties of 3,000 and more,—our yearly emigrant parties of 3,000 and more,—make up our day and evening schools to an average of over 3,000 attendants, and fill our lodging-houses with 400 sound sleepers every night!

Any one conversant with the operations of the Society knows, too, that thousands of children have not only been helped, but positively saved and elevated by the influences which have been brought to bear upon them. Consider one powerful influence: think of seventy-two teachers being employed in our industrial schools, to instruct poor children who would be taught nowhere else!"

This last sentence refers to other good work which the Society is doing; for the Emigration-scheme is only a part of its philanthropy. It sustains twenty-one Day and fifteen Evening-schools for such children as would not receive instruction elsewhere. It supports five Lodging-houses for such as have no homes; and connected with these Lodging-houses are Eating-rooms, Bathing-rooms, Reading-room, Sunday services, and with the News-boys' Lodging-house (where there have been 8,757 boys in 1872) a Savings Bank. It should here be said that the news-boys partially pay the expenses of their Lodging-house. They paid more than one quarter of the expense the past year, besides putting $2044.43 into the Savings Bank. The Society also finds employment for the destitute, as well as homes, and restores lost and missing children to their friends. The Superintendent of the News-boys' Lodging-house, says: "During the year, 843 boys have been placed in good homes; 723 lost and truant boys (an average of two a day) have been restored to friends and relatives. Parents and others often visit us to learn about lost children. Our average of lodgers has been 160 boys nightly. We have furnished during the year 57,740 meals and 57,001 lodgings. Since the establishment of our institution, we have succeeded in providing nearly 8,000 boys with permanent homes and employment. They are to be found in every walk in life, honored and respected."

Thus it will be seen what a varied and beneficial work this Society is doing. Here is practical regeneration. And the work thus far has been free from sectarian and ecclesiastical influence. The religious element comes into it, but apparently only as it is an inspiring element to individual consecration and endeavor in the service of humanity. Such work as this, wherever it exists, should especially interest all friends of free and rational views of religion. And where it does not exist they should be the first to institute it. Liberals, if they are true to their principles, will surely not fall into the error of the churches and bury themselves with theoretical speculations, while they let such humanitarian work as this go undone. The exact nature of the service demanded will vary according to local exigencies, but everywhere there is need of practical labor for social amelioration. The Church of the future, whatever its theology or form, will be that kind of organization which stands most helpfully by humanity.

W. J. P.

THE BIBLE IN SCHOOL.

While some of the other clauses in the editorial leaders in the number of THE INDEX for Jan. 4 are open to discussion, number four, and especially the second half of it, is so entirely contrary to my idea of the true spirit of Free Religion that I must at once enter my protest against it. Its purport is to prohibit the use of the Bible in the public schools, supported by the public money and intended for the general good of all the people. Now what is the Bible that it should be made the subject of a special interdiction, such as the Pope would put upon the Lutheran or English version of it, or the Evangelicals upon the works of Thomas Paine or Feuerbach or Theodore Parker? Is Free Religion afraid of the Bible, or unwilling to trust it to free inquiry?

But, if it were so, what right has a portion of the community to prohibit the use of any book as a text-book? That the reading of the Bible in a school as an act of religious worship, or as a text-book, should not be required by law, is quite another thing, in which I should heartily agree. The schools should be entirely secular; but in order to be so it is not necessary that everything which has a moral and religious influence should be prohibited in them. A school is nothing without the vital influence of the teacher; and to secure that, the teacher must be left free to use all the materials which life and literature afford her, to influence rightly the mind of her pupils. It is unjust to enforce the reading of the Bible in school as a religious act, because a great proportion of our people do not accept it as a specially sacred book; but, if we especially prohibit it, we are equally unjust to those who do not regard it as an injurious book. By the same rule we must prohibit the Koran, the Vedas, the Classic Mythologies, everything which has stood for revelation to any people.

And again, looking at the question in its practical bearing, in the effect upon the schools, a large number of the present teachers of the schools, who are able, faithful, and useful in their calling, are professedly Christian in their religion, and do sincerely, if ignorantly, believe the Bible to be the best of books, and the direct representation of the will and mind of God. Others hold that it is a book of great intellectual and moral merit, containing the profoundest lessons of truth, love, and holiness. Now, why should we insult these teachers by singling out this book for prohibition? What teacher with any self-respect would consent to take her school thus hampered, that she might not use the story of Joseph or Abraham in illustration, as well as that of Iphigenia or Prometheus,—that, when she saw a lesson of love to be needed, she might not hold up the example of Jesus as well as of Socrates or Buddha? The teachers who, holding in their hearts a superstitious reverence for the Bible, would yet consent to serve in schools where it was prohibited, would be likely to exercise a much more injurious influence secretly than they could by reading it openly.

Girard, in his will, forbade that any clergyman should ever enter his college. A venerable gentleman of the old school, wearing a white neck-cloth, once presented himself at the gate. "You can't enter here," said the porter. "The devil, I can't!" replied the supposed clergyman. "Go in," said the porter, entirely satisfied. And yet this college, so zealously guarded by this foolish prohibition, has been notoriously under the influence of the most sectarian Evangelicals. We do not care to keep the letter of the Bible out of the schools; we only need to keep out that spirit of intolerance which makes it a hindrance instead of a help to humanity. In school or out, the Bible, like all other books, should stand on its own merits. E. D. C.

PRAYER AND ADVERTISING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—In reference to my letter in your paper of the 26th October last, on the subject of Prayer, I beg you to allow me to say something by way of explanation. I do not wish to re-open the controversy about the efficacy or reasonableness of prayer, but only to let your readers know that I have considerably changed my opinion as to George Müller's Bristol schools.

Mr. Conway has called my attention to the Thirty-third Report of the Ashley Down Institution, from which it is apparent that George Müller's success is due to a gigantic system of advertising, carried out to an extent perfectly marvellous. Attached to the Schools is a "Scriptural knowledge Institution," for the circulation of Bibles and tracts, and the support or assistance of missionaries.

When we read that "more than 3,320,000 of the tracts and books were given away last year gratuitously," we need not be surprised at some practical results in the way of money, especially when contributors are openly urged to give, "that they may lay up treasure in heaven;" and when they have given, their letters (or extracts from them) appear in the printed Reports as decoy-ducks for the rest of the superstitious crowd.

I had no conception that these means were resorted to, and I cannot but wonder at George Müller's blindness in stating: "We have obtained from him (i. e. God) in answer to prayer, without applying to individuals for help, since the establishment of the Institution on March 5, 1834, five hundred and forty thousand pounds."

The words which I have italicized are contradicted by the Report from beginning to end. In fact, there never was such an elaborate scheme of advertising, or one so calculated to succeed, as this.

His prayers, however, seem to have been unavailing to keep out the small pox from his orphan children; no doubt the attack brought in more contributions. But I say no more. I only wish it to be understood that, after reading George Müller's own account of his success, I no longer believe that it is so much an answer to prayer as an answer to his extremely clever and thorough method of advertising.

I am, sir, very sincerely yours.

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE,
DULWICH, S. E., Dec. 20, 1872.

"CHRISTIAN" TEMPERANCE.

At one of the recent Local Conferences of Unitarian churches in New England, the following resolution was offered:—

"Resolved, That, in the sense of this Conference, the drinking usages of society are opposed to the best interests of humanity and of the Church, and that we deem it the duty of every minister of our denomination to take a bold stand for the temperance reform."

On motion, this resolution was amended by substituting the word "Christian" for "bold," so that the Conference is now resolved to take a "Christian stand for the temperance reform." We are glad to know just where that Conference stands. We do not like this "glorious indefiniteness" of language which commits one to nothing but non-committalism and masterly inactivity; and so we rejoice when a whole Conference on this vital question dare say exactly what they mean. A "bold" stand, as all can see, is no stand at all, for bold is a relative term, and may mean more bold or less bold, and thus might mislead the public and the police; but the qualifying adjective "Christian" is so clear, so precise and definite, that no one can possibly be mistaken in what the Conference—say. A Christian stand must of course be a Christ-like stand on this temperance question. It cannot be understood as the stand which Christians generally take, for they generally take no particular stand. Some advocate a law against the manufacture of all intoxicating drinks, and some favor a heavy penalty against the manufacture of adulterated liquors, and some would mitigate the evil by forbidding the retail sale of liquors. Some favor the prohibition of the sale of everything between sweet elder and old Bourbon, while others would except elder, beer, and ale. Some vote prohibition for their neighbors, but secretly license themselves, or persuade their physician to recommend "regular bitters" during the spring months (some twelve or so around here). While some advocate a restricted, other persons favor a free, license, and some no law whatever on the subject; so that we cannot interpret a "Christian stand" to mean the stand which Christians take, for they are not united in standing anywhere.

Then by a "Christian" attitude toward this question we conclude that the Conference meant the stand which Jesus took. What did Jesus teach about temperance? We think we begin to get hold of something tangible and definite. We look for a temperance clause in the Sermon on the Mount; but, while we find there many blessed sort of people, we find no—"Blessed are ye who never drink any fermented or distilled liquors, for happy is the life of the temperance man, and great shall be his reward in heaven." Nothing about temperance in the teachings of Jesus. But surely he must have taught it then in his life. Was it at the marriage feast in Cana in Galilee? There the lawgiver of Christians is said to have acted as wine manufacturer on a small scale, turning twelve or fifteen firkins of water into capital wine for the wedding guests to drink. It is true that John is the only Evangelist who records this wonderful miracle, and that Biblical critics of acknowledged authority put the date of the composition of this fourth Gospel down to the middle of the second century or later. Still, as most Christians do not doubt that John wrote this gospel, and that Jesus did turn water into wine, they must at least think it is right to use wine at weddings, for the example of Jesus has sanctioned its use there. If Jesus encouraged others to drink, and even furnished the wine, is it not probable that he drank himself? There is force in the fact that he was called a "wine-bibber;" while at the Last Supper, if we may believe the account, he drank wine, "the fruit of the vine." Then, if a "Christian stand" for the temperance reform is a Christ-like stand, we infer that the aforesaid Conference recommend wine-drinking at meals, weddings, and generally whenever one feels like taking some for the stomach's sake.

But, as we think we have at last arrived at their meaning, we find ourselves doubting after all; for we believe some of the gentlemen in that Conference are teetotallers and prohibitionists, while some Christians we know who have back-slidden, and so far departed from the example of him they profess to follow that, instead of using, as Jesus did, the "fruit of the vine," they actually use chopped raisins, soaked in water, strained and sweetened, in the communion service. One Orthodox D. D. in this city declined to preach on temperance, because "Christianity has nothing to do with temperance;" and so we find ourselves puzzled to know what these Christians mean by a Christ-like or Christian stand for the temperance reform. It is a stand which we do not understand. We feel, like Stephen Blackpool, that "it is all a muddle."

To be frank, we think that was the great charm of the expression for the Conference. "Bold" was too pronounced, definite, intelligible; but a "Christian" stand—ah! that magical word Christian is so gloriously indefinite that it defines exactly nothing, and commits the whole Conference to it.

If they had resolved to take a Mohammedan stand, their meaning could not have been mistaken; for it is well known that the Koran absolutely forbids the use of intoxicating liquors, and the Mohammedans to-day set an example which the English residents and rum-drinkers in India, and generally those who are supposed to take a "Christian stand" on the temperance question, would do well to follow. But Mohammedanism is heathenism; and think of Christians taking a "heathen" stand on any question!

Heaven knows we need a reform; and we say God-speed to every one who is laboring in any way to extirpate or mitigate one of the greatest evils in our country. But in order to work together, it is certain that we must have some more definite plan or method of work than is conveyed in the canting expression "Christian" stand; for that means anything or nothing, as you like. It is a profound problem for our sociologists to deal with—how to root up intemperance; and we will hail with joy any method which promises success. But we have become sick of meaningless resolutions, windy harangues, and humbug legislation.

W. H. S.

EVENING NOTES.

BY SIDNEY H. MORSE.

BEFORE TRINITY CHURCH was burned—one blustering Sabbath morn—a couple, strange to the city, accosted a gentleman on Washington Street: "Sir, can you inform us where Trinity Church is?" As the man hesitated, the lady speaking, said: "The place where Phillips Brooks preaches." "Phillips Brooks!" quoth the man; "never heard of him. Across there is the Boston Theatre; a little way up is the Globe; still further up is the St. James Theatre. I can tell you all about the theatres, but I never bother my head with churches."

"He's a heathen, and Boston's full of them," the lady remarked to her companion, as they passed on, seeking but not finding Trinity Church until too late.

I suppose it to be true that there are a good many "heathen" in Boston; but not all are as poorly posted as regards churches as the one the church-seeking people above mentioned were so unfortunate as to encounter. Indeed, I think them quite a church-going class. Wherever you find a preacher with ideas and of liberal tendency, there you will be pretty sure to find a large sprinkling of these so-called "heathen." They are also apt to be of the most intelligent and interested of his hearers. I judge that he is not oblivious of the fact. And I have thought that often times there come to him through these "heathen" media helpful influences of inspiration and illumination. For by their presence he sets to work to see how it is with them, and his mind expands to a new truth. Appreciation is strong stimulant for preachers. However Orthodox, they soon find out that, in this "heathenish" world they have affected to despise, much of intelligence and much of the love of truth abides. One would think, too, that they apprise their flock of the fact with a certain satisfaction, as much as to say, "If you do not like these new views, there are other as good and as intelligent people who will." And often you may hear sermons preached not to the "faithful" but over their heads, being intended especially for this other class whose vision is no longer circumscribed by the old confession. And there are many "heathen" who like to listen to such discourses. Their joy in doing so is, one may guess, not unlike that recorded of the angels over sinners that repent. One does so love to have his own views seconded and shared by others! And why should these "heathen-people" not rejoice when they hear a good man and wise preach his way out of the woods towards them? And then he comes not alone: he is bringing the most intelligent part of his congregation with him! Very likely there is a touch of egotism in all this, not over agreeable; but then 'tis human nature. Everybody else feels the same way, placed in like circumstances. Because you are a "heathen"—for that reason should you feel sorry that others are moving heathen-ward? He was a shallow man, but once I heard a minister rebuke a young and zealous "heathen" thus: "I can't see how you can have the heart to spread such ideas. I should think it were enough to lose your own soul, without dragging others into the pit with you." Shallow and sad man! He did not so much as dream this young apostle of heresy had no idea of going into the "pit" himself, or of dragging any one else there. Into the pit! Is a "heathen" a fool that he does not know as a Christian which side his bread is buttered?

I HAVE BEEN LED into these reflections, by considering the fact that every church of the Protestant sort, in Boston, that is largely attended, is ministered to by a preacher of liberal and generous views. Even Dr. Fulton is not to be excepted in this count. Be his theology as blue as smoking brimstone will make it, his speech is all cordial and inspiring to the poor and friendless, and many are the colored heads that dot his large congregations in Tremont Temple. He has courage, too. It would have been policy for him to have pictured Dickens going into heaven by some special, private door. He found no such door open in his Christian Bible; and so, of course, Dickens in his opinion, having not entered the door of the church, but some other door, had gone to some other place. He said what he thought. He said, too, I believe, that the place was called "hell." Well, it was no worse to say Dickens had gone thither, than to say the same of any other man who had lived a fair sort of a life. It was a reasonable conclusion, if the Christian gospel had been rightly interpreted for ages. But it was not in keeping with modern good sense, and Dr. Fulton's honesty did not save him from being thought absurd. Dickens had but just died, which made matters worse. Independent criticism was then at fault. There were some "Independent" journals in Massachusetts which berated Horace Greeley during the campaign awfully. Greeley died. Well—they did not follow Fulton's example. Could Greeley have gone to the pit without dying, they would have declared it a fit abode for him. But he died, and they sent him to heaven. With this sort of fitting himself to the times Dr. Fulton has not to be charged. Still people like to hear a man speak his mind, be that mind great or small; and so for this reason and some others, as to numbers, he gets a good hearing.

As to the minister of the Old South Church, Dr. Manning, I think his small congregations were due not so much to the locality of the house, as his deacons appear to think, as to his manner and his matter. When I first heard of him, he was supposed to have decided liberal tendencies. Since then he has been made a Doctor of Divinity, and his prescriptions are now emphatically those of the Old School. He takes a text, and it seems as though the juice had all departed from it. Out of it Phillip Brooks would have evoked a magnificent tree clad with rich foliage and laden with fruit. But Manning deduces only Orthodox brick and mortar. His manner is precise, hard, and dry. It was cheerless enough one afternoon before the fire in that old edifice about the desecration of which so much patriotic feeling has lately found expression. The high empty pews, the dim light, the formal prayer, the unloving discourse, dwelling on the "unrighteousness of unbelief!" I have heard about the "complacency of radicals" who think they have just discovered that all the world beside is wrong, and has been from the start; but is it possible that this Christian pretence to the exclusive ownership of God and his revelations can be outdone? "We Christians believe thus and so: it is the badness of your heart that makes you believe, or try to believe, otherwise." If the discourse I heard was a sample of Dr. Manning's regular ministrations, I do not expect that the removal of his society up town will help it to increase. He will minister to a former generation, and it is passing away. It is a real consolation to know, however, that out of his pulpit, Mr. Manning is a genial, fraternal man, in sympathy with all wise reformatory movements.

TO THE RISING GENERATION of traditionally Orthodox believers, endowed with large sympathies and a respectable fund of downright good sense, another voice is calling, if not with no uncertain note, yet with occasional notes of good omen. Park-street Church is no great distance from the Old South. Every Sunday morning it is more than filled. People sit in the aisles and windows, and often stand through the service in the rear of the pews. The congregation is largely made up of young men and women. From time to time, they carry away sentences like the following:—

"Young man, if you have got a new idea, don't think you ought to be afraid of it."

"If you have got a new idea, and think it won't re-make the Church, you are mistaken: it will; that is its mission."

"Young men, it depends on you and me to build the Church of the future. God grant that we may make a better Church than the one we were born into."

"There are two ways of looking at Christianity: one is, to regard it as a block of granite so many cubits large, on which was inscribed two thousand years ago the entire revelation God had to make to mankind; the other is, to think of it as only a germ planted two thousand years ago, a little seed that was planted, and to watch its progressive growth as a tree in history. In other words, Christianity is a continuous revelation. We know to-day more of God and more of man than was possible for any one to know two thousand years ago. God has been revealing himself and his plans and purposes constantly; and two thousand years hence our boasted light will seem but as a rush-light compared with the meridian splendor of the revelation that shall then spread over the earth. And so on while the world stands."

"God is love. Love to God is Christianity. But if you say you love God, and love not your brother man, you are a liar. Strong words, but God himself, in your Bible, thrusts them right down into your face."

"I long to hail the day when there shall be no other test but love to God and love to man."

You may be sure that it is to listen to such hopeful sentiments the rising "Orthodox" generation will go to church, if at all. Whether Mr. Murray will nourish these little grains of seed until they bear their consistent fruit remains to be seen.

NOT LONG SINCE I attended the afternoon service in Trinity Church in the absence of Mr. Brooks, and listened to a stranger. Unlike Brooks, he did not rush through the service, but seemed to hang upon the words as if he would make the most of them, pronouncing "Jesus (Christ our Lord)," in the tenderest manner. There was nothing in his appearance or his voice to make one the least hopeful of the sermon. But it was a very agreeable disappointment that was reserved for those who were present. For his text, he announced in a soft, girlish voice,—"And he had a name written that no man knew, but he himself." The sermon received the closest attention. If any had settled themselves in their high-backed pews for a comfortable nap, I think they must have postponed that happiness for that hour at least. I cannot attempt to report his words nor give the full thought of the discourse, but content myself by offering the following sentences set down from memory that day on reaching home:—

"In every truly reverent heart there is an altar reserved for the Unknown God. The Infinite, the Unknown, the revelation that is to come, for which we wait, for which we strive,—it is this that preserves our souls from death and makes life enjoyable. It is not what we know, but what we do not know, that ennobles life. The mystery that lies beyond gives the present moment its zest. Mystery is the atmosphere for the wings of hope. It is not a wall of despair: it is a house in which are many mansions. Into it from every soul there is an open door. Close that door, the soul dies. Mystery is the region man has not explored: it is his vocation evermore to enroach upon its borders. An old man had lived seventy years in his native land. He expected some day to go forth and visit other countries. The king issued an edict that no one then living in that town should ever leave it. The old man died of a broken heart. The thought that he must remain there till death made his life a burden he could not support. So even the soul claims the regions of the Infinite for its activities. We leave the past, we journey away from the present. Forth into the unknown future we take our pilgrimage as into a land we own, which we have inherited from Our Father. God is before, and not behind. Let us not imprison ourselves in the creeds, the doctrines, the revelations we have. Let us not become encrusted in our traditions. Let not forms and ceremonies harden about us. For our journey lies before us into the land of the Unknown, and we pass on into that darkness bearing the torch of faith, lighting our pathway with the light of knowledge."

"Who would not despise himself if he believed that he fully comprehended himself? Who has not a self unknown, infinite, divine, whose acquaintance it is his immortal destiny evermore to make—a name written which the human knoweth not, but only the divine? This greater self, this largest, noblest self—the Christ life—is the privilege of all. But to know Christ, we are not to seek him in the past, in the seen, the known, the revealed; but in the tradition of what happened to the man Jesus eighteen hundred years ago. We must leave all that is recorded, even the cross itself, behind, and press forward; for Christ is before, and not behind us. Spiritual life is no copy; it is reality, a fact of character pertaining to each, original."

Had I listened to Mr. Brooks rather than to this stranger, I might have been told that faith must be planted in order to bear fruit. Its roots must find their nourishing soil in all that pertains to "the life that now is." I remember this to have been the burden of a discourse preached by him sometime since.

Literary Department.

NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS.—All books designed for review in these columns must be addressed to THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

RECEIVED.

SEVENTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT of the Board of Commissioners for Reform Schools, to the Governor of the State of Ohio, for the year 1872. Columbus: NEVINS & MYERS, State Printers, 1873.

INAUGURAL MESSAGE of JOHN J. BAGLEY, Governor of Michigan, to the Legislature, January 2, 1873. By Authority. Lansing: W. S. GEORGE & Co., State Printers and Binders, 1873.

PUBLIC LEDGER ALMANAC, 1873. GEO. W. CHILDS, Publisher, Philadelphia.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE, January, 1873. Chicago: M. C. BLAND & Co., 25 West Madison Street.

DIE LEHRE VON DER ZWEIFACHEN WAHRHEIT. Ein Versuch der Trennung von Theologie und Philosophie im Mittelalter. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der scholastischen Philosophie von Dr. Max Maywald. (The Doctrine of Twofold Truth: Being an Attempt to separate Theology and Philosophy in the Middle Ages. A Contribution to the History of Scholastic Philosophy, by DR. MAX MAYWALD.) Berlin, 1871. 8vo. pp. 61.

No period in the history of philosophy has hitherto received such inadequate treatment as that of the middle ages. When Hegel approached it in his lectures, he drew on, as he said, seven-league boots, in order that he might get over it as quickly as possible. His contempt for the whole scholastic period was only equalled by his ignorance of it. "Nobody can be expected to know anything of medieval philosophy from an autopsy of it," he said; "since it is as comprehensive and voluminous as it is meagre and horribly written." One needs only to glance at the "chief sources" of information concerning it which he indicates at page 123, vol. iii. of his Geschichte der Philosophie (2d ed.), in order to see that his knowledge of it could not have been anything but the most superficial. Following their master, the whole Hegelian school have treated scholasticism with utter disdain. Schwegler in his compendium has even improved upon the seven-league boots. He goes through the thousand years from the sixth to the sixteenth century by "lightning express," with only a side-glance now and then from the window. In the larger works of the older German historians of philosophy—Brucker, Tiedemann, Tennemann—far greater space is devoted to the middle period; there is abundant presentation of material, but with little criticism and absolutely without insight. Ritter, in his voluminous and careful history, attempted to do justice to medieval speculation, and really made a great advance in this respect upon all his predecessors; but even from him one gets only a very imperfect view of the various influences which were at work in this long age of transition from the old to the new. There are one or two late works in German on the philosophy of the middle ages, by Roman Catholic authors, but it was not to be expected that they would add much to our light. Then there are in French the volumes by MM. Rousselot, Haureau, and Munk, which are really valuable aids to the study of this subject. Much assistance may also be derived from Ueberweg's painstaking manual. In English, on the other hand, there is little that will repay the trouble of reading. Maurice's book is genial and appreciative, but, like all that author's works, it is slight and unsubstantial. Mr. Lewes has shown in the later editions of his history a remarkable waking up to the fact that in the writings of the Spanish-Arabs and the Christian Schoolmen there are things which it would be well to know about, if the knowledge did not involve life-long devotion to the investigation of the "monstrous and lifeless shapes of a former world, having little community with the life of our own." But Mr. Lewes has not the patience for such work, and finds it difficult to conceive how any scientific mind can have.

Altogether the most important contribution to our knowledge of medieval philosophy was M. Renan's Averroës et l'Averroïsme; and it is in the direction of monograph upon special topics that increase of light must come. The matter is not yet ripe for treatment in the bulk. The labor is too great for any individual; therefore it must be divided; and there must be some general understanding among investigators as to the points which most need elucidation. There are some excellent hints, apparently accidentally given, in the recent editions of Mr. Lewes' history, as to the place of the speculations of the middle ages in the historical development of philosophy. When, for instance, he says that the peculiarity of this period is "the constant struggle of Reason to assert and justify her independence," and, in another place, admonishes us not to forget that "to Scholasticism we owe the emancipation of Philosophy," he indicates, almost by a stroke of genius, the main point of view from which in future the whole subject must be studied. It has hitherto been very generally regarded as a settled fact that, during the whole medieval period there was no such thing as independent philosophical research. It has been thought that in the hands of the Schoolmen philosophy was merely the bond-servant of theology; that, the limits of all investigation being fixed dogmatically beforehand, the results determined, and the whole recognized business of thought being the interpretation and justification of the doctrines of the Church, no progress in the matter of philosophy was possible. Having free play only in the form, it was inevitable that it should degenerate into mere formalistic inanities.

This is the usual theory, but, like many other still current theories, it is based upon an insufficient induction of the facts. It might, one would think, have been concluded even a priori that, the greater the ecclesiastical pressure in favor of uniformity of opinion, the more serious would be the reaction against it in men of powerful mind. The more violently open heresy was persecuted, the more luxuriantly heresy would grow in secret. Men who could not give direct expression to a single thought at variance with the received theology would take a sort of malicious delight in dialectic subtleties that concealed and yet exhibited the finest and bitterest irony. Mr. Ellis, in his General Preface to the Philosophical works of Lord Bacon (vol. i., p. 123, Am. ed.), calls especial attention to "the religious earnestness of Bacon's writings" as contrasted with the ironical tone of those of Galileo, "the most illustrious of his contemporaries." He says the works of the latter "are full of insincere deference to authority and of an affected disbelief in his own discoveries." But if Mr. Ellis had remembered that the very essence of Galileo's discoveries placed him in necessary antagonism to the whole dogmatic system of the Church, he might, perhaps, have hesitated before adding a laurel to his hero's crown at the expense of a man to whom that hero, to say the least, was not superior either in courage or honesty.

Irony has been the offensive weapon of a certain class of heretical thinkers in all ages; not often of the bravest and best, but very often of those who were as brave as the large element of cowardice in their composition would let them be. In this regard the present age affords a brilliant commentary upon all the preceding ones. He who has ears to hear and eyes to see knows that there are such thinkers in all the churches to-day. A delicious story is told by Matthew of Paris, in a note to Roger of Wendover's Chronicle ad A. D. 1201 (vide Bohn's ed. vol. ii., pp. 201, 202), which points both ways, in illustration both of the past and of the present. It is concerning Simon of Tournay, a professor at Paris, a man of extensive learning and great acuteness, whose theological lectures were attended by so many hearers "that the most ample palace could scarcely contain them." One day, in a public dispute concerning the Trinity, the subtlety of his arguments raised the curiosity of his audience to such a pitch that, on the next day, when the disputation was to be concluded, all the theological students of the city, "forewarned to hear so many solutions of difficult questions," flocked into his school. Simon "resolved all the aforesaid questions, inexplicable though they appeared to the audience, so plainly and elegantly, and in so Catholic a sense, that all were struck with astonishment." Some of the students who were most eager to learn wanted him to dictate his solutions to them, "which were too valuable to be lost to posterity." This request elated the professor so much that he laughed aloud, and said with eyes uplifted: "O my little Jesus, my little Jesus, how have I exalted and confirmed thy religion in this disputation! Truly, if I wished to be malicious and attack thy doctrines, I could find still more powerful arguments to weaken and impugn them." Of course, the chronicler adds that Simon had no sooner uttered these words than he was struck dumb, and more information of like character.

But this story is especially interesting as furnishing, perhaps, the first notice that we have of the practice of teaching that a proposition may be true in theology and yet false in philosophy, and vice versa. Strange as it may seem to us to-day, this doctrine was the first effectual protest of free thought against the despotism of Catholic dogma. In the very next generation after Simon of Tournay, the Church began to take official notice of the lamentable errors that were taught under the garb of philosophy by men who did not dare openly to question, "Catholic truth." In the latter half of the 13th century the distinction between Catholic and philosophical truth had become quite common, especially at Paris, which was at once the great seminary of Orthodox theology and the hot-bed of heresy. In the year 1276, Etienne Tempier, Bishop of Paris, interdicted, under the direction of Pope John XXI., the teaching of certain "abominable errors," 219 in number, which he expressly said had been put forth "as true according to philosophy but not according to the Catholic faith, as though there could be two opposite truths, and as though, in opposition to the truth of Holy Writ, there could be truth in the sayings of damned Heathens." To give an idea of how far the philosophers were accustomed to go, a few of the condemned propositions may be mentioned: "God is not triune, for threeness does not consist with the highest unity—God cannot beget one like unto himself; for that which is begotten by another has a principle on which it depends. The future resurrection must not be admitted by philosophers, since it is impossible to search it out by reason.—Ecstasies and visions have no other than a natural origin.—It is impossible to refute the arguments of philosophy for the eternity of the world, except we be ready to admit that the will of the First (i. e. God) includes the impossible.—Natural philosophy, since it is based solely upon natural grounds and natural causes, is bound simply to deny the newness (novitas) as opposed to eternitas of the world.—Man must not be content with authority if he would have certainty." It is evident enough from propositions like these, that the 13th century was not without its radicalism; but there were even still bolder utterances, such as, for instance: "The knowledge of theology prevents one from knowing anything.—The Christian religion is a hindrance to learning anything else.—The philosophers alone are wise.—The discourses of the theologians are based upon fables.—There are fables and falsehood in the Christian religion as in all others." Bishop Stephen, in his interdict, calls these and like utterances "incautious." They were anything but that. They were never made without the accompanying assertion: "Of course, according to theology, this is all false." One can imagine the tone and the mien with which this ever-recurring phrase was sometimes spoken.

Here, then, as it seems to the present writer, is the key to much in medieval philosophy that has thus far never been fully understood. Here we see at once in how deeply important a sense the middle period must be regarded as a period of transition. The surprising thing about Mr. Lewes' later treatment of it is the inference, to which he compels the reader, that, because this is a transition period, it is of minor importance, while in reality it is just the transition-periods in history which are of the very greatest import, because they afford an insight into the culture-forces at work there which cannot be gained from any other source. The excellent little historical essay by Dr. Maywald, the title of which stands above, is a most suggestive glance at the influence which the doctrine that a thing may be true in theology and false in philosophy, and vice versa, exerted upon the independent development of thought in the middle ages, and at the part which it played in the insurrection of philosophy against the thralldom imposed upon it by the Church. The author traces back the doctrine to the teachings of Averroës, and gives a sketch of its history from the 13th to the 17th century. He also shows the intimate connection between this and the doctrine deitribus impostoribus, which excited such horror during these centuries, and which one might call the first rude attempt at comparative theology. If, after having given us this taste of his quality, Dr. Maywald would now go on and supplement his necessarily imperfect sketch by a complete history of the "Doctrine of Twofold Truth" in all its ramifications, he would lay the literary world under lasting obligations.

T. V.

THE POET AT THE BREAKFAST TABLE. His Talk with his fellow Boarders and the Reader. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1872. pp. 395. [Toledo: Brown & Faunce.]

Dr. Holmes is himself an illustration of something which we find expressed as follows in the breakfast table talk reported in the volume before us: "We are getting on towards the last part of the nineteenth century. What we have gained is not so much in positive knowledge, though that is a good deal, as it is in the freedom of discussion of every subject that comes within the range of observation and inference. How long is it since Mrs. Piozzi wrote, 'Let me hope that you will not pursue geology till it leads you into doubts destructive of all comfort in this world, and all happiness in the next?'"

The times are indeed new, and that to a degree which is revolutionary. Mrs. Piozzi would inevitably go to the Radical Club to-day, and forget both worlds in the ecstasy of following the inspiration of Bartol, and Higginson, and Weiss. Doubts do very little harm now, for the reason that beliefs are no longer very much depended on, either for comfort here or good hope of the hereafter. The universal, underlying, natural faith of man in his Maker, or in the universe, or at least in life, takes the place of beliefs, as a continent, or an island at least, takes the place of rafts, and skiffs, and steamers, and frigates. Let man alone; only emancipate him from superstition; and he has faith as easily and naturally as light shines or water runs. Dr. Holmes illustrates this entire emancipation of thought. He writes for the purpose of doing up a batch of radical thinking. The index with which the volume is furnished at once shows that this has been the author's purpose. Dr. Holmes is a keen, bold thinker; every sort of dogma is a cheat to him; he wants to clear all nonsense out of the mind, and especially the nonsense which purports to be pure and undefiled religion; and to average readers he perhaps speaks plainly enough of the faults and falsities of popular faith and practice. But for the thorough radical, or according to any high standard of free thought, he muffles and disguises and even quite suppresses his radicalism, evidently with something of Mrs. Piozzi's fear that somebody's comfort will suffer if the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is told. The only result of such hesitation is to deprive the author of permanent interest and credit. That is the one high test of a writer: does he write for truth, or for the moment? If he writes for the moment, he lasts but a moment, and that will be the case with Dr. Holmes as a thinker.

THE WOODS AND BY-WAYS OF NEW ENGLAND. By Wilson Flagg, author of "Studies in Field and Forest." With Illustrations. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1872. pp. 442. [Toledo: Brown & Faunce.]

The peculiar interest of this volume is in the author's intelligent sympathy with Nature, and his nice delineation of numerous objects of field and forest study. There is no attempt at scientific description, and occasionally we note omissions which seem due to a popular method of study, without sufficient aid from books. But nothing of this will appear to the ordinary reader, whose pleasure is doubtless most secure in following an observer who leads what his eyes see rather than what books tell him. Mr. Flagg seems to lack no quality of a felicitous human interpreter, and his object is to awaken the heart and purify feeling, and give to character the tone of simplicity, truthfulness, and humble content which are so clearly suggested by Nature in New England fields and woods. His story fills a thick and solid, beautifully printed and bound, and exquisitely illustrated volume, embracing a description of a great variety of trees, shrubs, and vines, sketches of numerous general aspects of Nature, and thoughts on quite a range of topics suggested by out-of-doors observation and study. The whole effect is that of admirably varied and seasoned instruction from an expert in out-of-doors knowledge. More perfect harmony of the talk with the walk could not be attained, if we were going across fields, through woods, over hills, and along the streams, at the elbow of the narrator. It was unnecessary for Mr. Flagg to tell us that he has lived with Nature exclusively, and has been very happy in so doing. Nor need he have mentioned that wife and children have shared his seclusion and made his happiness that of human sympathy, not merely that of cold observation. It all shines out, like the delicious warmth of a perfect picture, from the delightful pages before us. The contrast with Thoreau's frost-work is complete. Mr. Flagg's book is full of human as well as other nature. It has ethical and religious tone, not of the cold pagan and philosophic sort, but of the humane and Christian sort. It will serve excellently as a hand-book of devotion to people who go into the woods instead of going to meeting. And any one who will give some quiet hours now and then to following these communings with Nature, in which Mr. Flagg has set down what he has seen and felt, will not fail to be made both better and happier.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER. Household Edition, Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1872. pp. 395. [Toledo: Brown & Faunce.]

The shape and style of this complete edition of Whittier's poems, and the price ($2.00), exactly adapt it to universal reading. And no volume ever published better deserves the honor of becoming a book of the people's faith. There is nothing between the lids of the "Holy Bible" which so consistently and continuously breathe the truest religious and Christian spirit. Only a very few peaks and summits of Scripture rise to the level which is habitually that of the Quaker Pilgrim. If we had not learned a very false idea of inspiration, and absurdly admitted that Deity stopped coming to man nearly two thousand years ago, and never came to anybody except to a few Jews, it would be the most natural thing in the world to regard so pure and deep-sighted and rich-hearted a poet as indeed inspired to tell us in advance what are the true steps of humane and religious progress. There is no finer doctrine, no more perfect "truthing it in love," than is to be drawn from Whittier's pages. The volume which contains his poems might well be used as a Bible, in Sunday Schools for instance, both to take readings out of, and to study lessons from. In common reading it will be thus used long after the superstition of a "Holy Bible" shall have ceased to sway the religious mind.

OFF THE SKELLAGS. A Novel. By Jean Ingelow. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1872. pp. 666. [Toledo: T. J. Brown.]

A critic recently said of Miss Ingelow: "She writes no pages on which the reader is not made to feel that an ideal of right living is the one thing to which all else must yield." This ethical radicalism is thoroughly illustrated in the handling of situations and characters in the novel before us. A more wholesome and truthful book is rarely written. The author's nature is pure and noble, and her way of telling the old, old story of life and love, of men and women and children, is worthy of all praise. The scenes and events of the tale are fresh and varied, and there is plot enough for keen interest. Some excellent drawings of character, with special truth to some present peculiarities of average experience, show that Miss Ingelow has observed faithfully, and really attempts to photograph from the human life which she has seen. In the early story of the heroine, in the account of life on the water, in the picture of a strangely composite household, in the contrasted types of mankind between which the figure of the heroine is shown, and in the result of all, there is excellent management of material, and ample ground for cordial interest.

ACENT JO'S SCRAP-BAG. Shraw! Straps. By Louisa M. Alcott. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1872. pp. 226. [Toledo: Brown & Fauce.]

The capital quality of Miss Alcott's writing for young people has already made her fortune as an author, so that we have only to tell what any new book is about, and to give it a cordial welcome. This is Vol. II. out of the Scrap-Bag, and is in fact a volume of travels with a thread of charming story in it, and a book of as much interest to older as to younger readers. Brittany, France, Switzerland, Italy, and London are visited by Amanda, Matilda, and Lavinia, particularly Lavinia; and we are told of the haps and mishaps of the party, with just enough reference to sights and scenes to give a good color to the story. It is all in Miss Alcott's breezy, jolly style, with plenty of sense and sensibility stuffed nicely in, like plums in a pudding, and real plums of good wit and fine feeling too. The publishers have made of the volume a very pretty book.

A CHANCE FOR HIMSELF. By J. T. Trowbridge. Illustrated. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1872. pp. 271. [T. J. Brown, Toledo.]

Mr. Trowbridge has now made two Jack Hazard books for boys, the present volume being a continuation of "Jack Hazard and His Fortunes," and capital books they are, in every particular. They hit the mark of a good impression very successfully, and they equally follow a track of constant interest just short of unhealthy excitement. In hearty fun Mr. Trowbridge is very clever, without becoming unnatural or exaggerated. The little army of readers of Our Young Folks have endorsed these tales of Jack Hazard's haps and mishaps, and Mr. Trowbridge will go on and give a third instalment of the appetizing narrative in Our Young Folks for 1873.

The latest "counterblast against tobacco" we reproduce from a health-journal of the day:—

"It is said of the cannibals that they will not eat the flesh of a tobacco chewer, it is so highly charged with the taste and odor of tobacco; and such medical students as do not chew or smoke are offended in the dissecting room by the odor which emanates from the fresh subject on the dissecting table who has been accustomed to the use of tobacco."

If every other consideration fails to touch the sensibilities of the consumer of the noxious weed, he surely will recoil from this prospect of post-mortem repulsiveness to the eminently respectable classes specified in the foregoing extract!—Chr. Union.

Greater is he who is above temptation than he who, being tempted, overcomes.—A. Bronson Alcott.

He who persecutes a good man makes war against himself and all mankind.—Confucius.

PHILOSOPHICAL PAPERS.

III.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

ORIGIN OF THE IDEA OF GOD.

FROM AN ARTICLE ON "THE CONDITIONED AND THE UNCONDITIONED," IN THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR OCTOBER, 1864.

The idea of God originates, not in the suggestions of outward Nature, but in the depths of humanity itself. The soul cannot infer God from Nature, except in virtue of what it first projects into Nature. Hence the radical defect in the argument from design; for the affirmation of an intelligent World-cause is the objective transference of a subjective consciousness. Although it may be mutilated and perhaps annihilated by the pitiless manipulations of a sceptical and aberrant logic, the idea of an All-pervading Personality is the formative nucleus of the idea of God; and this idea of personality, which finds no analogue in the world of matter, can only be generated through the soul's consciousness of selfhood. Not until this is objectified and matured into the idea of an omnipresent Self, can the argument from design become pertinent or forceful. But once posit this unconditional existence, and Nature, becoming its manifestation or visible word, pours a flood of light upon its attributes. Selfhood, therefore, or personality, is the primordial germ of the idea of God; and in the development of this idea from void personality into determinate character, the soul must still repeat its former procedure and reiterate human analogies. Human nature, therefore, is the point of departure in the search for God. The four grand elements of personality or conscious being—intelligence, will, affection, and conscience—are elevated to absolute perfection, and become the august attributes of omniscience, omnipotence, all-lovingness, and all-holiness. But conjoined with these four elements, positive in their nature, though negative in their infinity, must co-exist attributes purely negative, disallowing the four grand limitations of human existence,—cause, dependence, space, and time,—and thus constituting the awful mysteries of self-existence, absoluteness, omnipresence, and eternity. It is thus evident that, while the idea of God contains positive elements, it is more largely constituted by elements purely negative; and even these positive elements are associated with the negative idea of infinity, which, without destroying their essential nature, carries them immeasurably beyond the vastest reach of thought. To accuse such an idea, so overwhelming in its sublimity, of a degrading anthropopathism is simply to misapprehend the meaning of degradation. A community of nature between God and man is the absolute condition of religion; and, though matched with the stellar hosts which fill with resplendent beauty the bosom of infinite Time and Space, a moral nature, finite though it be, is the very culmination of the sublime. In vain would Philosophy divest her idea of God of all human attributes. Every such attempt degrades the Being she would exalt; and she must at last confess that a certain reverent outshadowing of the human upon the background of infinity yields equally the most majestic and the least inadequate idea of the Divine. When, however, it is said that human nature, in its positive aspect and freed from its restrictions, is an epitome, a copy in miniature, of the Divine, this is true only of ideal humanity, not of humanity as it exists in the distorted images we see around us. We predicate of God no positive attribute which is not essential to a perfect humanity, and no attribute which is essential to a perfect humanity can we omit in our idea of God. If, therefore, the ideal human has ever become historically real, that realization is the profoundest utterance of God; and it is the conscious or unconscious longing for such a realization which has riveted the eyes of all the ages upon the Man of Palestine. The positive attributes of God are shared by him in a measure with all his children; his negative attributes, and whatever other perfections are veiled in the blinding lustre of his incommunicable essence, are his alone. And while these inscrutable mysteries shroud the Divine radiance from human eyes, no earnest thinker need fear that the Deity vanishes in a "God understood."

But, in thus assuming a community of nature between God and man, we are at once confronted with the assertion that personality is by necessity a limitation or restriction, and that an infinite or absolute Personality is a contradiction in terms. This objection admits of a duality of form, according as the limitation is maintained to be intrinsic or extrinsic; and we cite two representative arguments taken respectively from Fichte and from Strauss:—

"This Being must be differentiated from you and the universe, and must act in the latter according to conceptions; it must therefore form conceptions, and possess personality and consciousness. But what do you mean by personality and consciousness? Do you mean that which you have found in yourself, learned to know in yourself, and have designated by this name? But that you neither do nor can think this except as limited and finite, the most cur-sory attention to your own formation of this conception will prove to you. You therefore create this Being by the attribution of personality to a being limited, and like yourself; and you have not, as you wished to do, thought God, but only reduplicated in thought your finite self." [Fichte, Werke, I. 187.]

This argument is condensed into four words by Spinoza,—"Omnia determinatio est negatio." But all real being must be determined; only pure Nothing can be undetermined. Even Space and Time, though cognized solely by negative characteristics, are determined in so far as differentiated from the existences they contain; but this differentiation involves no limitation of their infinity. All differentiation or distinction is determination; and if all determination is negation, that is (as here used), limitation, then the Infinite, being determinately distinguished from the finite, loses its own infinity, and is either absorbed in the finite or else vanishes into pure Nothing or Non-being. Spinoza, therefore, by the principle that all determination is limitation, reduces his own philosophy to a system of Absolute Nihilism, which is by no means his purpose. A pure Ego, therefore, by determination to thought, volition, affection, is not limited; its limitation or illimitation depends simply upon the character of this thought, volition, or affection, as perfect or imperfect. As the attribute of continuity has been shown to exist equally in infinite Space and in finite Extension, without involving per se quantitative finitude or infinitude, so pure personality is absolutely neutral with respect to qualitative finitude or infinitude, that is, imperfection or perfection. Imperfection admits of different degrees; absolute perfection (which is synonymous with qualitative infinity) is above the category of degree. Until, therefore, the simple and unanalyzable idea of selfhood or personality can be demonstrated to necessitate a certain degree in its determinations of intelligence, will, affection, and conscience, the assertion that personality per se involves intrinsic limitation remains an utterly unsubstantiated assumption. The further paradoxism, that personality, implying unity, thereby implies intrinsic limitation, is completely exposed by a simple reference to the distinction previously established between composite and incomposite unity. It is manifestly impossible to form a positive, imaginative conception of pure spirit, except under modifications of form and color, as Mr. Sears, in his "Atheism," admits; but nothing is more evident than the materialistic nature of such conceptions. To conceive the Absolute Spirit, especially, with attributes of form and color, is to be guilty of the very grossest anthropomorphism. The unity of personality is purely incomposite, being equivalent to indivisibility or simplicity; nothing is implied by it concerning limitation. If we repress over-curious imagination, and are content with the sublime deliverance of reason, that God is one God, without partition of essence, the unity of personality is no more a limitation to him than the unity of continuity is a limitation to infinite Space and Time.

The argument of Strauss varies from the foregoing argument of Fichte:—

"We know and feel ourselves to be persons only in contradistinction from other persons, like ourselves and external to us: we distinguish ourselves from them, and are thus conscious of our own finitude. Consequently the conception of personality, formed in and for the province of the finite, appears to lose all meaning when extended beyond it, and a being which finds no external analogue of itself appears also not to be a person. To speak of a personal God, or Divine personality, is seen, from this standpoint, to be a synthesis of conceptions, one of which absolutely excludes and abolishes the other. Personality is Selfhood limiting itself to a definite compass in antithesis to another, which it thereby separates from itself; Absoluteness, on the contrary, is the Encompassing, the Unlimited, which excludes nothing from itself so much as the exclusiveness latent in the conception of personality; absolute personality, consequently, is a nonentity about which nothing can be thought." [Glaubenslehre, I, 504-505.]

This argument strikingly illustrates the danger and the inconsequence of arguing from quantitative to qualitative infinity. On examining it, the prominence of spatial conceptions is very marked. The mutual exclusion which results from the plurality of objects, and the impossibility of their occupying the same space, is the covert drift of the argument. Co-existence of objects in space undoubtedly implies the finitude of the co-existents, but co-existence of personalities implies nothing as to their finitude. There is no analogy, except in a loose, metaphorical sense, between things material and things spiritual. Even admitting the validity of the analogy, Strauss illegitimately uses his data, which can be so employed as to construct a plausible argument a priori for the existence of a personal God. The existence of material objects being given as an immediately cognized fact, the existence of Space, its conditio sine qua non, is absolutely necessitated. But since material objects are finite, and Space is infinite, the existence of the finite is demonstrative of the existence of the infinite. Now infinite Space includes finite objects, without being either limited by them or merging them in itself. Consequently, if the analogy holds good, the existence of finite personalities necessitates, as their conditio sine qua non, or ground of reality, the existence of an infinite Personality, which includes them and renders them possible, without either being limited by them or merging them in itself. But because we disallow the legitimacy of arguing from quantitative to qualitative infinity, we reject this plausible and seductive proof. The relation of inclusion, which is intelligible as existent between Matter and Space, is altogether meaningless when predicated of personalities; it is a mystical conception, which finds expression in the often-misinterpreted words of Paul,—"in him we live and move and have our being,"—but which philosophy can recognize solely as a figure of speech. Persons may be distinct without mutual limitation. The only attribute which can create mutual limitation between two persons is that of power or will; but while finite powers may limit each other, the statement that a limited power can limit an illimitable power is absurd on the very face of it. Hence the alleged limitation implied in the co-existence of persons is purely fictitious.

But the root of the sophism lies deeper than this. The idea of personality, according to Strauss, is a relative one, and consciousness implies a relation between at least two persons. Now it is indisputable that the Ego comes to consciousness only as opposed to a Non-Ego; but it is equally indisputable that this Non-Ego cannot be a person. We come into immediate contact with nothing but matter, which is the sole object of the senses, and through which alone other human personalities can act upon us; and matter, therefore, is the real Non-Ego which conditions consciousness. But while consciousness is conditioned on a Non-Ego, it is untrue to say that personality is conditioned on a Non-Ego; for consciousness is the reflex activity of the personality, not the personality itself. The personality remains indestructible, although consciousness may lapse into utter unconsciousness, as in a swoon. Moreover, because a consciousness which comes into existence in Time is conditioned on a Non-Ego, it is unwarrantable to say that a Consciousness which never came into existence at all, but has existed ab æterno, is likewise so conditioned. All that we know is, that personality is a simple, ultimate, absolute idea, not analyzable into constituent elements, nor implying per se any relation whatever to any other existence. Consequently, to attribute personality to God is to predicate nothing which limits in any way his absolute perfection or infinity, strictly and rationally construed.

Such are the true consequences of the doctrine that we cannot positively know infinity;—consequences which few would controvert, and which are wholly at variance with the Philosophy of the Conditioned. If Hamilton had been content to teach such a doctrine as this, by wise and self-consistent methods, thoughtful minds would have been spared the disappointment which is the sole fruit of his constructive labors. Alas for the love of paradox! Harmony is the grand secret of universal Being; there are no jarring chords in the music of the spheres. The laws of truth are severely simple, and refuse to assume the theatrical attitudes by which men would enhance their naked sublimity. The needle of human reason trembles violently on its centre at the deflections of error, prejudice, and passion; but its vibrations move through ever-lessening arcs, and perpetually approximate to a final equilibrium. Philosophy has not yet achieved a fixed point of departure, and a faultless method of advance; but when these shall have been attained, she will vindicate her own transcendent nobility, and assume her rightful rank as the Science of Sciences.

HAD HIM AT LAST.—"How much a peck for potatoes?" asked a gentleman in market on Monday morning. The price suited him, and he was about to purchase, when a thought suddenly struck him. "Wait a moment, my good woman," he said, "I fear these potatoes were picked on Sunday." "No, sir, they were not," she replied; "but to tell the truth, they grew on Sunday!"—Investigator.

The North German Gazette asks: "Was not a prize offered, some time ago, to any one who could discover a passage in the writings of a Jesuit father from which the maxim that 'the end consecrates the means' could be fairly deduced?" and proceeds to quote from a newly-published work the following sentence, the original of which, it affirms, is to be found in the Jesuit Edward Voit's "Theologia Moralis," published at Würzburg, in 1769, page 472: "Qui concessus est finis, concessa etiam sunt media ad finem ordinata." That is, "To whom the end is permitted, the means conducing to the end are also permitted."—The Graphic.

That is the best part of each writer which has nothing private in it.—Emerson.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

LIBERALISM IN SALEM.

SALEM, O., Jan. 5, 1873.

At a meeting of the Independent Congregational Society of Salem, held this day, John Gordon in the chair, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

"Resolved, That the Demands of Liberalism, as expressed by the editor of THE INDEX in his issue of the 4th instant, be cordially accepted and approved by this Society; and we shall continue to press those Demands in the future as we have in the past.

"Resolved, That a copy of the above resolution be subscribed by the President and Secretary of this Society, and respectfully presented to the editor of THE INDEX for publication.

M. R. ROBINSON, President.
MILLIE V. BONSALE, Secretary.

A LETTER FROM MR. DAVIS.

ORANGE, N. J., 6th Jan., 1873.

TO F. E. ABBOT, EDITOR INDEX, TOLEDO:

My Dear Sir,—It may interest you to know that I am perfectly and zealously with you in the nine "Demands of Liberalism." It is the true republican platform, means work for essential progress; and you may count upon me as thoroughly in sympathy with every such effort, by which the "approaching crisis" will be hastened, and absolute religious and political freedom secured.

Allow me to congratulate you on the enlarged INDEX. Now that Mr. Morse's Radical is no more, after so bravely struggling for existence, I can unrestrainedly welcome your organized and enlarged establishment.

From the first I have read your INDEX, and can only entertain gratitude for its exalted influence, and for your exertions in the cause of perfect mental and moral liberty.

Permit me a word to you concerning Spiritualism. While I advocate the "facts" as illustrative of man's spiritual nature, I totally oppose them as the elements of a new religion; and while I recognize "spiritual intercourse" as a means of converting sceptics to a belief in a future life, I utterly oppose the real or imagined utterances of spirits as an authority.

Hoping you a long life of health and prosperity, I remain truly your friend,

ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS.

"CIRCULATING LIEN."

TO THE INDEX:—

That magnificent programme of manhood which you put forth, headed "The Demands of Liberalism," commends itself to my whole soul, and particularly the eighth section. To me that means, among other things, that "Natural Morality, Equal Rights, and Impartial Liberty" shall no longer be outraged in the matters of currency and taxes.

Whether Moses and Jesus required it or not, Natural Morality requires honest truth and the faithful fulfilment of promises, righteously made, if such fulfilment is possible. Our government, in the interest of money-grubbers, refuses to fulfil a large part of its promises, and thus obliges the people to circulate, to the great damage of their private morality, many millions of lies—very mean and mercenary lies at that.

I am quite aware that Jesus, on more than one occasion, is said to have uttered this sentence: "For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." I do not by any means think it follows from this that Jesus meant to establish in his model kingdom that system of taxing the poor for the benefit of the rich which is now enforced by the government of the United States, by its custom houses and other ingenious means of indirect and partial taxation. What I say is, that any system of taxation which, by any considerable probability, makes the poor pay more in proportion to their means than the rich—and every system of indirect taxation must necessarily do this, more or less—is a violation of "equal rights," and is inconsistent with "impartial liberty;" and all the statesmen in the world may safely be defied to find any justification for it, except the above sentence in the gospels of Matthew and Luke. So far as I know, the only excuse they make for it is its convenience. This they pretend is sufficient to counterbalance its admitted injustice. But this cannot be the real reason for its existence, for convenience is tested by cost of collection, and the experience of almost every town in Massachusetts demonstrates that a direct tax costs the least for collection. It is convenient only for the rich, and its existence proves that the government is not run by the people for the people, but by that part of the people who have the most, for the sake of accumulating more, at the expense of the rest. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Boston, Jan. 5, 1873.

THE INDEX AT ANDOVER.

NORTH ANDOVER, Mass., Nov. 20, 1872.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

You will be pleased, I know, to hear of an unexpected discovery I made a week or two since.

On a recent Sunday, two ladies (sisters) walked from Andover, a distance of about three miles, to attend the Unitarian Church in North Andover. On being introduced to them, I found that one of them, the elder, was thoroughly conversant with radical literature, both past and current; had been a careful reader of the Radical; and, above all, is now an ardent admirer of THE INDEX, and an enthusiastic supporter of its brave championship of Free Religion.

I was astonished to find that THE INDEX has a subscriber in Andover, and my astonishment is only surpassed by my hearty delight. Better than any "liberal preacher," I am sure, it will, through this intelligent and earnest interpreter, make way for "Liberty and Light" into the otherwise unbroken mists which overhang this citadel of Orthodoxy.

Already, in this same connection, there is one happy event to remark. The younger of the two sisters above mentioned, hitherto an Orthodox church-member, has resolved to withdraw from her church connection, and contemplates, as she told me, uniting with a liberal church. Although this lady thinks she can "never go so far" as her sister, still who knows where one will stop when once the old fetters are thrown off, and the mind is free to go at its own sweet will?

In this same family there is still another sister, a lady of high culture also, who in her mature life is likewise an earnest seeker after truth. This lady, for reasons which she knows how to give, and not from habitual respect for tradition,—for she is familiar with the arguments and the literature of the present controversy between Sectarianism and Freedom, on both sides,—this lady professes to occupy "strong Christian ground." Still she rejoices that the issue is so sharply made; and, although her conviction at present is that the final result will be the triumph of rational Christianity—Christianity freed from all systematic or incidental corruptions, being simply the natural religion of the man Jesus and the recognition of his religious pre-eminence—still, she is ready to advance from this position, should the developments of the controversy demand it; for her "mind moves in charity and turns upon the poles of truth."

Many, I know, will hail the day when THE INDEX is read under the very walls of the Andover Seminary (and it gets within the walls too, I believe); and doubt not the "new song" that is now put into the mouths of a few dwellers on this modern "Zion's Hill" will be sung by multitudes in the generations following.

It looks now as though religious freedom, if it gets, as it must get, a good foot-hold at length in this Orthodox nursery, will be greatly indebted to THE INDEX for effecting this early entrance.

J. H. CLIFFORD.

DIFFUSION OF FREE THOUGHT.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Nov. 27, 1872.

Perhaps the liberals of the United States may suppose that there are some places where Orthodoxy reigns supreme in this country. I once thought so; but I have traveled many thousands of miles and visited many scores of cities and towns, and have never failed to find a large sprinkling of decided and open rationalistic thinkers. Yale College, long the stronghold of Orthodoxy, contains a large proportion of avowed sceptics and rationalists. They form fully twenty-five per cent of the whole. The Scientific School classes have increased in size as well as in standing, at a rate altogether out of proportion to the other departments of the University. While the Theological School contains only ninety-eight students, the Scientific School has one hundred and seventy-five already. New Haven is probably the strongest Orthodox outpost in the country: in this house—a students' boarding-house—where I live, there are seven persons, and of them two are Orthodox, one a Deist, and four are entire sceptics. The College Courant has been acknowledged to be unusually able under Mr. Towne's editorial management, and for some unknown reason he has had to resign. W. H. D.

A lady of Boston, seeing among the religious notices that a clergyman would preach, "D. V.," said at once that she would go and hear him, presuming, as she did, that the subject of the course was "Dolly Varden."

TWO SIGNIFICANT SCULPTURES.—Two pieces of sculpture, of which excellent copies are not unfrequently seen, have always been very suggestive to my mind. One seems to me to represent the woman of the past and present; the other the woman of the future. Whoever looks at the bust of Clytie will recognize in it a beautiful idealization of the "clinging vine" type of woman; tender, timid, gentle and graceful, but weak; a pretty ornament, an endearing pet, but not an enterprising or a helpful companion. A man might like to have such a wife, as he would like some rare and delicate flower in his garden. To a certain extent she might be company for him, as is a faithful dog that looks into his eyes to be guided by every wish expressed there; but if he wants any interchange of thought, any sympathy in his pursuits, any helpful suggestions in an hour of trouble, he must seek them elsewhere. Classical fable tells us that Clytie was enamored of Apollo, and was metamorphosed into a sunflower, which continually turns toward that brilliant god. In the sculptured bust the petals of the coming sunflower are already seen forming around her. The moral significance, though not intended, is very instructive; for if a woman continually turns to a lord and master for guidance, the natural consequence is that she should become a vegetable existence.

About fifty years ago a very remarkable statue was dug up in the Greek island of Melos, or Milo. Whom or what the statue represented remains a subject of conjecture; but it is universally known as the Venus of Milo. Why it was decided to call it a Venus I never could imagine; for it has none of the attributes of Venus. It does not appeal to the senses, nor is it an idealization of sensuous beauty. It is grandly beautiful, but is the beauty of the soul. As Clytie represents the popular ideal of Woman in the Past and Present, the Venus of Milo represents the ideal Woman of the Future. The one is a pretty plaything, a graceful ornament; the other is companion, counsellor, and friend. The following lines by Wordsworth are as appropriate as if they had been intended for the subject:—

"I saw her, upon nearer view.

A spirit, yet a woman too;
Her household motions light and free,
And steps of virgin liberty;
The reason firm, the temperance will,
Endurance, foresight, strength, and skill;
A perfect woman, nobly planned,
To war, to comfort, to command;
And yet a spirit still, and bright,
With something of an angel light."

Of all the sculpture I have ever seen I most admire the Venus of Milo. I never cease to wonder how so much life and character could be expressed in such a colorless, hard substance as marble. There seems to be a soul within the stone, shining through it, as does a lighted lamp within a transparent shrine. A friend to whom I gave an admirable bust of this noble statue said to me soon afterward: "You have spoiled my Clytie. I used to think her so lovely and graceful; but the Venus of Milo kills her. I have been obliged to put her away in a distant corner so that she might not be extinguished by the comparison." That remark was prophetic. The true nobility of the Woman of the Future, gentle but strong, will extinguish the weak prettiness of the Woman of the Past. The much praised "clinging-vine" type of womanhood will be laid away in a corner, because it cannot stand comparison with

"The perfect woman, nobly planned,
To war, to comfort, and command."

—L. Maria Child.

BISMARCK'S LAST BATTLE.—Prince Bismarck has found a foe worthy of his steel—one that will call upon him for all his skill, and that intense power of will which seems to be his dominant characteristic. He has crossed swords with the Church of Rome. He has signified to the Papacy that within the great German Empire its rule must be subordinate to the civil authority, and that any revolt against the supreme authority of the Kaiser will be met with unsparring and unchanging severity. And with the directness which marks all his movements, and the keenness of vision which sees where to begin a battle, he has aimed his first blow at the famous Society of Jesus. A law has been promulgated banishing the Jesuits from Germany. The convents and other establishments of the Order are to be abolished, and within six months every disciple of Loyola is to find another home. It is not the first time that the Jesuits have suffered expulsion, for they have long been the terror of Kings and Princes in Europe; but the significance of this banishment of this dreaded Order is that it is the first step in a movement which means the freedom of the great Protestant Empire of the continent from Papal interference, and from the influence of counsels which have the elevation of the Church of Rome to supreme authority in Church and State, as their chief end. It is a long and bitter contest which Bismarck has provoked. If any man in Europe can succeed he can. But Rome has millions of members, and a great array of bishops and other clergy in Germany; and even his great prowess and skill will be tasked to the utmost in the contest which has opened. It will be followed with intense interest by Protestants all over the world.—Presbyterian.

BABOLAIN AND HIS GRANDSON.—Having returned home, he let me go up to my room alone, and, a few minutes later, rejoined me there. He was flushed, excited, and held in his hands a little package which he opened at once. It was a white pasteboard box, full of papers, rolled one around the other. He began to unroll them with his impatient fingers, throwing down box and papers as fast as he had undone them.

"What have you there, my little fellow?" I say to him.

He was in too great a hurry to answer; but when he had finished he held out in his hand a half-franc piece and four sous.

"There are some sous for you!" said he, looking at me with his large eyes.

At first I did not know what to say—not that I was ashamed of taking alms; in the hearty simplicity with which he offered me all his fortune there was so much affection and delicacy! I took his hand in my hands, and, kissing his blonde locks, I said:—

"Thank you, George. Keep your money. You can get something with it—you can ride in the goat cart, you know."

"You don't want my sous?" said he, evidently about to cry.

"Keep your money for yourself, my dear boy—keep it."

He put his money back into his pocket without saying a word, went to the window, and looked out into the courtyard; but the glass reflected his face like a mirror. It was sad, his nostrils were swollen, and he was biting his lips to keep from crying.

"You don't deserve such kindness," I said to myself. "By your stupidity and foolish pride, you are going to make the only being in the world who loves you cry." So I said aloud:—

"George, do you still want to give me your money?" He turned round, his eyes lit with joy. "Do you want to? Very well; give it to me, my dear: it will give me great pleasure."

He threw his arms about my neck and, while smothering me with caresses, he slipped into my pocket the four sous and the little piece of silver.

"You will take good care, grandpa, not to lose them," he murmured.

I wrapped them up in the same paper, put them in the white box, and they are there, near a lock of his mother's hair and my other relics.—"Babolain," by Gustave Droz.

INFAMOUS BRUTALITY.—The Fort Scott (Kansas) Monitor relates the following story of an accident on the Missouri, Kansas, and Texas Railroad last week:

A train bound for Texas had on board a large number of travelers and emigrants, among them a lady with a little boy aged seven years, who had the ague. When about sixty miles below the State line the boy, who had been walking about the car during the evening, fell off. This was not known by the mother until the train had gone two miles, and the lady sought the conductor and asked him to back the train, which he refused to do. The lady then asked the conductor to stop the train and let her off, which the conductor also refused to do; and, in spite of her tears and entreaties, carried her down to the next station, where she was compelled to stay over night and wait for an up-train next morning. On return the boy was found. He had crawled up the embankment among the grass, and resting his curly head among the wild flowers of the prairie, and drenched with the terrific thunder storm on Friday night, he was dead.

THE EXAMINER.—A limited number of Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 5 will be sent postpaid—the four numbers for sixty cents. Nos. 1, 2, and 3 for 40 cents. Nos. 1 and 3 for 20 cents. No. 1 for 10 cents. What remains of full sets are reserved for binding. Zion's Herald says:—"The boldest heretic of to-day." The Independent says:—"The most pronounced radical in the land." The Chicago Post says:—"Equal to the utterances of Theodore Parker." Address THE EXAMINER, Winnetka, Ill., where the numbers for sale remain.

A FINE RADICAL ROMANCE!

TO BE PUBLISHED

SERIALLY

IN

THE INDEX FOR 1878.

WE ARE HAPPY TO ANNOUNCE that we have secured for publication in THE INDEX a most excellent novel, entitled

PAUL GOWER:

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

For the present the author desires to withhold his name. But he is well known in literary circles as a writer for the best English and American magazines. Of another story written by him Mr. JAMES PARTON says: "I consider it a master-piece of narrative." Mr. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, who was so kind as to read "PAUL GOWER" in manuscript with special reference to its publication in THE INDEX, permits us to publish the following:—

"I have looked over Mr. —'s novel, and think it would be an attractive feature in THE INDEX. It is very strong, and I found it very interesting. The story is remarkably well told; the characters are firmly drawn; and the religious tone of it will suit the paper well. The style is nervous and simple; the incident is varied; the development is natural. The writer has put a vast deal of thought into it, and spent great labor on it with admirable effect. My judgment may be a fault, but I think it would adorn THE INDEX. It will divide well as a serial, which will be an advantage."

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAP.

1.—An Old Lady and Gentleman of the Old School.

2.—News from the United States.

3.—A Lover's Quarrel.

4.—Family Antecedents.

5.—Poor Relations.

6.—Mr. Bligh receives three Morning Calls.

7.—Is spent in Mr. Bligh's Office.

8.—A Shabby-Genteel Family.

9.—Mr. Daniel Pennelthorne.

10.—Harry Franklin.

11.—"Never Overtaking and always Pursuing."

12.—A Catastrophe.

13.—Locked-out for the Night.

14.—In which divers Persons call on each other without invitation or introduction.

15.—Sickness and Convalescence.

16.—Esther Franklin.

17.—Contains Explanations and Confidences.

18.—Concludes with a Street Row at the Door of Mr. James Maberley.

19.—Involves a Meeting and a Departure.

20.—In which Richard Sabin talks like a Heathen.

21.—That nasty, deceitful Clergyman who behaved so badly to poor, dear Ruth."

22.—"My Native Land, Good Night!"

23.—Epistolary and Maritime.

24.—Is mainly in Praise of New York City and Americans in General.

25.—Paul's Father.

26.—Transpires in or near Nassau Street.

27.—More New Faces.

28.—Is Conversational and Volatile.

29.—The Christening of a Comic Paper.

30.—A New York Boarding-House.

31.—Paul's Letters.

32.—In which Dick Sabin returns to New York City and is seen by Somebody who has hereafter a Great Deal to do with him.

33.—Wherein Richard Sabin lays down a Square of Hell's Pavement.

34.—"The Porcupine."

35.—In which Paul Gower and Richard Sabin amaze themselves.

36.—A short Chapter introducing a very long one.

37.—A Young Man's Theological Experiences.

38.—Consequences.

39.—A Descent into Bohemia.

40.—More of the same Subject.

41.—In which we talk about the Fourth Estate of New York City.

42.—"Al Pfaff's."

43.—The Reverend Jim Scibell.

44.—"The Cornucopia."

45.—"One More Unfortunate"

46.—In which the Story progresses for about SIX Months.

47.—A Little Adventure.

48.—Injured Innocence.

49.—"Lead us not into Temptation."

50.—Just what might have been Expected.

51.—What People said about it; and an Item of News concerning the Fugitive.

CHAP.

52.—In which Paul sets out for a larger amount of Travel than he intended, and visits some Old Friends.

53.—A Canadian Idyll.

54.—Wherein we journey from the North to nearly the most Southern of the United States.

55.—More Southern Experiences; a Look at New Orleans; and a sudden change of Programme.

56.—A Return and a Disappointment.

57.—The Contents of which ought to surprise nobody.

58.—In which Paul hears more News of Old Friends of an Unsatisfactory Character.

59.—Wherein Paul Gower and the Rev. George Bligh smoke a cigar together.

60.—Accompanies Paul to London and describes his Doings in that Metropolis.

61.—Is a Continuation of Chapter 60.

62.—Contains an Accident and some Conversation.

63.—Treats of the Vicarage and Farm-house; and of the Machinations of a Wicked Woman.

64.—Shows that a Pliable Disposition may be wrought upon to Good as well as Evil Purposes.

65.—Which only those Readers who have some knowledge of Human Nature will think at all Truthful or Probable.

66.—Wherein we get rid of Mrs. Franklin for Good and All.

67.—In which the Engagement between Ruth Gower and the Rev. George Bligh comes to a perfectly natural conclusion.

68.—Contains various matters, Reflective, Racial, and Metropolitan, and concludes at Southampton.

69.—New York again. And what Paul did and heard there.

70.—A "Cut Direct" and other Experiences, too various for particularization.

71.—Is as Desultory as the one preceding it, and therefore introduced without Specification.

72.—More Boarding-House and Bohemian Details; the latter involving their own Moral.

73.—A Loving Heart, self-portrayed; and News from England.

74.—A Character: the re-appearance of a Scoundrel, and still more of Journalism.

75.—Another Return and a new Enterprise. Charleston on an Historical Occasion.

76.—In which a former Acquaintance takes Paul into his confidence concerning his Domestic Infelicity.

77.—Might have had the same Title as Chapter 76.

78.—More talk of Secession, and the Sequel of Richard Sabin's Catastrophe.

79.—A Companion-Picture to what we have seen in Charleston, but on a larger Scale.

80.—Clears the way for the Next and Last.

81.—In which John Gower's Misfortunes and the Story come to an End together.

Whoever desires to possess all the numbers of THE INDEX containing this novel should subscribe at once, beginning his subscription with the year. Send $3.00 for the FOURTH VOLUME OF THE INDEX.

Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 32, TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE COMMONWEALTH

LIFE INS. CO. GENTLEMEN of standing and ability (either in professional or mercantile pursuits) are desired in all parts of the country to represent this reliable company. Our plans of Insurance are simple, popular, and honest.
Address 178 Broadway, NEW YORK.

REAL ESTATE,

In all parts of the U. S.,

RAILROAD AND OTHER STOCKS,

Also

MERCHANDISE OF ALL KINDS.

Bought, sold, and exchanged.

All wishing to sell, or who desire to procure bargains, will find it to their interest to apply to

N. T. POMEROY,

No. 1, Park Place, New York City.

ASA K. BUTTS,

Manufacturer's Agent, Broker and Dealer in

Domestic Cotton Goods

CORRAGE, & C.,

111 Worth Street, New York.

Refers to

JOHN M. CONWAY, New York.
O. W. BUCKINGHAM, "
C. A. WORTENDIKE, Goddardville, N. J.
PEARSON BROS & Co., Boston.
FINLEY & SCHLICHTER, Philadelphia.

Parturition Without Pain.

A Code of Directions for escaping the Pains of Childbirth. Edited by M. L. Holbrook, M. D., Editor of THE HERALD OF HEALTH.

"This Treatise is one of sterling excellence, and should be very widely circulated not only among wives but husbands as well."—The Index.

"Contains suggestions of the greatest value."—Tilton's Golden Age.

"A valuable book for women."—Liberal Christian.

"An interesting and plausible argument. The course recommended cannot fail to be beneficial."—Becher's Christian Union.

Price, by mail, $1.00. Agents wanted.
Address WOOD & HOLBROOK,
16 Light St., New York.

"The Greatest Luxury in the World."

TURKISH BATHS.

& 88 COLUMBIA HEIGHTS, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Three minutes' walk from Fulton Ferry.

A series of these Baths will relieve, if not cure, nearly every form of disease. The beauty and simplicity of their action consists in the perfect adaptability, either mild or powerful, of this method of treatment to each and every case. It cleanses the body, purifies the blood, and equalizes the circulation, thus arousing dormant functions, and restoring the highest measure of health possible to the individual.

Innumerable references can be given to cases cured by the Bath, and the proprietor will freely advise with those who desire any information regarding its proper use.

First-class rooms and board at moderate prices.
CHARLES R. SHEPARD, M. D.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 18) will be sent postpaid on receipt of eighty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. Abbot; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. Abbot; "The Vision of Heaven," by Prof. F. W. Newman. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete Bibles of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.00 and 72 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

TOBACCO.—By saving that which would be lost in smoke, one may procure the reading of the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL a year at $3, and thus learn what calling in life he may be best fitted for. Young men should try it. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

HERALD OF HEALTH FOR 1873.

(Three Numbers of 1872 Free to New Subscribers.)

READ WHAT IS SAID BY THE PRESS.

The N. Y. Evening Post says: "We can always commend this Journal without qualification."

"It contains," says the Scientific American, "more sensible articles than any other magazine that comes to our sanctum."

A SPLENDID CHROMO,

WORTH $10.00,

Given free to every subscriber. It is an original picture of

A BEAUTIFUL GIRL,

Beautiful in form and face, on a mission of love to the cottage of a poor family. She stands with her supplies of good things knocking at the door, clad in a handsome costume, with a face expressive of the highest qualities the heart possesses, the perfect picture of health and beauty. This chromo is handsomely colored

IN TEN COLORS,

AND

WILL PLEASE AND DELIGHT

all who possess it.

Every Home Should Have One.

It will give daily pleasure, and be a constant lesson of good to every one who looks on it.

Send your subscription for next year at once, and thus obtain the picture to exhibit to others when you are forming a club, and three numbers of 1873 free.

The January number contains a remarkable paper on the

CONDUCT OF LIFE,

written 340 years before Christ by Isocrates, and well worthy the attention of every liberal thinker. The February number will contain a well written article entitled,

The Physiology and Hygiene of Marriage.

The March number will contain an Essay entitled,

Do Mothers Mark their Children?

It is the aim of the publishers to make their journal thoroughly useful and fill it with the productions of sound writers.

In short, the Herald for one year contains matter enough to make eight or ten dollar and a-half books, and yet it is sent with a picture worth $10 for the small price of $3.00.

The Herald for 1873 will be

RICH AND ROYAL

With the very best matter from the best writers, and each number will be worth the full subscription price

$2.00 a Year

(12 cents extra for postage on premium).

We will send the Herald of Health, with its splendid Chromo, and any $1.50 magazine, or paper, with their premium, post-paid, for $3.25. The Herald of Health and the Chromo, and any $4 magazine, for $5.12, or the Herald and Chromo, and New York Times or Tribune, for $3.50.

Agents wanted. Liberal commissions given.

Address

WOOD & HOLBROOK,
15 Light St., New York.

THE BABCOCK FIRE EXTINGUISHER.
"Absolutely the best protection against Fire."
SURE, SIMPLE, SELF-ACTING.
Used by the Fire Departments of the principal cities of the Union.
F. W. FARWELL, Secretary,
407 Broadway, New York.

Over Twelve Hundred Actual Fires put out with it.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents Wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than in anything else. Particulars Free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Me.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS

for the

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES: an historical summary of the origin, growth, and perfection of the chief industrial arts of this country. 1,300 PAGES, AND 500 ENGRAVINGS. WRITTEN BY 30 EMINENT AUTHORS, including John B. Gough, Leon Case, Edward Howland, Joe. B. Lyman, Rev. E. Edwin Hall, Horace Greeley, Philip Ripley, Albert Brisbane, F. B. Perkins, etc., etc.

"This work is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufacture, etc., in all ages. It is a complete encyclopedia of arts and manufactures, and is the most entertaining and valuable work of information on subjects of general interest ever offered to the public. It is adapted to the wants of the Merchant, Manufacturer, Mechanic, Farmer, Student, and Inventor, and sells to both old and young of all classes. The book is sold by agents, who are making large sales in all parts of the country. It is offered at the low price of $3.50, and is the cheapest book ever sold by subscription. No family should be without a copy. We want Agents in every town of the United States, and no Agent can fail to do well with this book. Our terms are liberal. We give our agents the exclusive right of territory. One of our agents sold 135 copies in eight days; another sold 368 in two weeks. Our agent in Hartford sold 397 in one week. Specimens of the work sent to agents on receipt of stamp. For circulars and terms to agents address the publishers,

J. B. BURR & HYDE,
Hartford, Conn.,
CHICAGO, ILL., or CINCINNATI, OHIO.

GEO. B. BROWN, Late Cashier Toledo Savings Institution.
WM. A. FAUNCE, Late with Henry S. Stebbins.

BROWN & FAUNCE,

BOOKSELLERS,

STATIONERS,

AND DEALERS IN

Window and Wall Papers,

(Successors to Henry S. Stebbins.)

115 SUMMIT STREET, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Keep constantly on hand a fine stock of standard and current literature, embracing books upon Science, Art, and Religion, and are in receipt of new books from publishers as fast as issued. Books sent by mail post-paid on receipt of publishers' price, and promptly ordered when not in stock.

Out-of-date and rare books furnished when procurable in this country or in England. Orders by mail solicited.

ROBERT WALLIN,

No. 453 North Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa. keeps on hand a variety of LIBRARY BOOKS and PAPERS—THE INDEX, and Index Tracts; also, an assortment of Stationery.

YOUR WIFE OR YOUR SWEET-HEART would thank you for a beautiful lady's sign gold watch; good time-keepers. Why not make her a present of one? A few subscribers for the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, at $3 each; for SCIENCE OF HEALTH, at $2 each, will secure one from the makers through S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

GOOD FOOD AND GOOD FUEL are indispensable to health and comfort. Good reading matter instructs and improves the mind. All leading magazines and newspapers are clubbed with the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, at $3, and the SCIENCE OF HEALTH, at $2, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BRYANT & BENTLEY,

Manufacturing Jewelers. Rings a specialty. 355 patterns hard solder rings, stamped and warranted 16 carats fine. 18 carat Bracelets, Cuffs, Coral, Roman, and engraved sets; Masonic Jewelry, &c. No. 12 Maiden Lane, New York (up stairs).

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy. Published Quarterly in St. Louis, Mo. It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents.

Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $3.00.

Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V., in muslin, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

Box 2398, St. Louis, Mo.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH.

The first volume having been sustained beyond expectation, the Publishers are prepared with additional facilities for making the next volume respond more fully to the popular demand for an independent HEALTH MONTHLY. Ample arrangements have been made to render each department a welcome and instructive visitant to the reader, and educate the people in all that relates to PRESERVING AND REPAIRING HEALTH.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH will not be the organ of any person, business, or institution, but an independent, earnest Teacher of the Laws of LIFE AND HEALTH; the exponent of all known means by which HEALTH, STRENGTH, and LONG LIFE may be attained, by using and regulating those agencies which are vitally related to HEALTH and the treatment of DISEASE on strictly hygienic principles.

TERMS.—$2.00 a year; Single numbers, 50 cts.; ten copies, $15.00, and an extra copy to agent. Please address S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, New York.

NEW TRACTS!

INTENDED TO TEACH RELIGION WITHOUT SUPERSTITION.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 7.

SECOND SERIES.....No. 8 to No. 14.

Either Series, 50 cents; Both, $1.00.

Address CHAS. E. WHIPPLE,

19 PIERCE ST., Boston.

Hall's Magic Shade Fixtures!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the Window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PRIVACY in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for Inside Blinds.

Are easily attached to Shades now in use.

Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY,

145 SOUTH CLINTON ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

GUNS FOR THE PEOPLE.

Breech-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $300. Double-Barrel Shot-Guns, $25 to $150. Single Guns, $25 to $200. Breech-loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers, $6 to $20. Pistols, 75c. to $5. Gun material, fixtures, and ammunition of every kind very cheap. SEND STAMP for Large Illustrated and Descriptive PRICE-LIST to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Samuel Johnson's Work on India. Sent on receipt of price.—$5.00.

Address S. H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

Send to same address for Catalogue of other scientific and religious works.

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

F. J. SCOTT, J. H. STOPPLET

ARCHITECTS,

73 MADISON STREET (Near Boody House)

TOLEDO, OHIO.

KELLER, SAITER, & CO.,

Manufacturers of RICH JEWELRY. STON CARBO cuts a specialty. Office, 12 Maiden Lane, Factory, B-ecker St., cor. Bowery, New York.

A TREASURE—NOT TRANE—

PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, for 1873, will contain just such information relating to "self culture," as every individual, old and young ought to read. It is only $3 a year. S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

YOUNG MEN AND YOUNG WOMEN who would know what they are good for, what they can do best, should read the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. A new volume begun with Jan. No., and may be ordered at once from S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 1, 1873.

WHOLE No. 162.

THE SPIRIT OF REFORM

WILLIAM WHITE & CO.,

11 HANOVER STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Issue weekly the

BANNER OF LIGHT:

An exponent of the Spiritual Philosophy of the nineteenth century.

The above is a first-class, eight-page, family newspaper, containing FOUR columns of interesting and instructive reading, classed as follows:—

LITERARY DEPARTMENT.—Original Novelties of reformatory tendencies, and occasionally translations from French and German authors.

REPORTS OF SPIRITUAL LECTURES.—By able Trance and Normal Speakers.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.—Upon Spiritual, Philosophical, and Scientific Subjects.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.—Subjects of General Interest, the Spiritual Philosophy, its Phenomena, etc., Current Events, Entertaining Miscellany, Notices of New Publications, etc.

MESSAGE DEPARTMENT.—Spirit-Messages from the departed to their friends in earthly life, given through the mediumship of Mrs. J. H. Conant, which demonstrate direct intercourse between the Mundane and Super-Mundane Worlds.

ORIGINAL CONTRIBUTIONS.—From the most talented writers in the world.

All which features render this journal a popular family paper, and at the same time the Harbinger of a Glorious Scientific Religion.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, IN ADVANCE.

Per Year $3.00
Six Months 1.50
Three Months .75

Specimen copies sent free.
We cordially call the attention of the friends of progress and reform, whether in material or spiritual matters, to the self-respecting and dignified tone, and the liberal position assumed and maintained by the BANNER OF LIGHT in the past, the same being the guarantee of future usefulness.

WILLIAM WHITE & Company also publish and offer for sale, at the BANNER OF LIGHT Bookstore, many books and pamphlets of a spiritual and reformatory nature.

The complete works of ANDREW JACKSON BATES; also books by Judge J. W. Edmonds, Mrs. Emma Hardinge, William Howitt, Hon. Robert Dale Owen, D. D. Home, Prof. William Denton, Miss Lizzie Doten, J. M. Peebles, Mrs. J. S. Adams, Prof. S. B. Brittan, Hudson and Emma Tuttle, Henry C. Wright, Warren Chase, Charles S. Woodruff, Dr. A. B. Child, Mrs. Lois Waterbrooker, F. B. Randolph, Warren S. Barlow, George Stearns, and others, will here be found.

Read, and let unbiased reason decide as to what is true.

BABCOCK FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against fire."

USED BY

RAILROADS,
STEAMBOATS,
HOTELS,
FACTORIES,
ASYLUMS,
FIRE DEPARTMENTS, ETC.

F. W. FARWELL, Sec'y,
407 Broadway, New York.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

TOBACCO.—By saving that which would be lost in smoke, one may procure the reading of the PSYCHOLOGICAL JOURNAL a year at $4, and thus learn what calling in life he may be fitted for. Young men should try it. S. R. WELLS, 409 Broadway, N. Y.

J. P. HUGGLES, BIBLIOPOL.
J. BROWNE, MICHIGAN. Dealer in English and American Free Thought Literature.

THOUSANDS OF COMMON SCHOOLS

Are about to adopt and sing from

CHEERFUL VOICES!

Our New, Genial, Beautiful, Popular JUVENILE SONG BOOK. By L. O. Emerson.

Whole armies of Teachers and Children have been delighted with the same author's "Golden Wreath" and "Merry Chimes," and cannot do better than to unite their voices with our "cheerful voices" in singing from the new book, which they will pronounce—
Better than the Best of previous issues. Price 50 cts.

A rare good song. MEETING Millard, 50.

THE AMERICAN TUNE BOOK!!

This truly National Work contains A THOUSAND TUNES, which, after careful inspection, 500 competent musicians decided to be the most popular ones published during the last half Century.

All the well proved favorites are included, and none omitted. Price, $1.50.

A pathetic and beautiful instrumental piece. IT IS DONE Foranaki, 30.

The above books and pieces sent, post paid, on receipt of retail price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO.,
CHAS. H. DITSON & CO.,
Boston. 711 Broadway, New York.

ORIENTAL RELIGIONS, AND THEIR RELATION TO UNIVERSAL RELIGION. INDIA.

By SAMUEL JOHNSON. 8vo. 862 pages. $5.00.

This book is an important contribution to Comparative Theology. Mr. Johnson has given many years of study to the general subject of the relations between the great religious systems of the world, and especially to the Oriental religions. The present volume is devoted to India, and is remarkably full in historical information, graphic in portraying the diverse and little-understood religious systems and beliefs which have held and still hold away there, and profoundly catholic in its appreciation of ideas foreign to the thought of Western nations. It contains the results of the best modern researches, and extracts from the best translations of Hindu literature. Mr. Johnson's great ability, thorough study, analytical power, and large religious sympathy, assure a work of far more than ordinary value, a work that all thoughtful persons will read with interest and instruction.

T. W. HIGGINSON: "A book of which every American scholar has reason to be proud."

*For sale by Booksellers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publisher.

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO., Boston.

THE (ORIGINAL) CONTINENTAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.,

of Hartford, Conn. Incorporated May, 1862.

SAM'L E. ELMORE, President,
JOHN S. RICE, Vice President,
FRANCIS D. DOUGLASS, Secretary,
H. R. MORLEY, Actuary.

The CONTINENTAL especially commends itself, by its past experience and present management, to those who desire to place their insurance in a conservative company, conducted on the principle of furnishing RELIABLE AND ABSOLUTE INSURANCE at a REASONABLE COST as is consistent with PERFECT SECURITY.

A few first-class Agents wanted for unoccupied fields.

The Science of a New Life.

By JOHN COWAN, M. D. A radical work on Sexual Physiology and the laws necessary to the elevation of the Human Race. Recommended and endorsed by O. B. Frothingham, Dr. Die Lewis, Robert Dale Owen, THE INDEX, and other prominent ministers, physicians, religious and secular papers. Every copy sold helps in the direction of the coming "millennium." Agents wanted everywhere. Send for circulars. Sold only by Subscription and by the Publishers, COWAN & CO., 139 Eighth st., New York.

MUSICAL GIFT BOOKS!

"Gems of Strauss."

The "Gem" of the season is having a remarkable sale. Contains all of Strauss' best music; 350 large pages.

"Musical Treasure,"

Latest collection of choicest Vocal and Piano Music.

"Wreath of Gems,"

Entirely Vocal Music, Songs, Ballads, Duets, etc.

"Piano Forte Gems,"

Entirely Piano Music, Nocturnes, Dance Music, etc.

Price of any of the above, $2.50; or, in Fall Gift, $4.

MUSICAL LITERATURE.

Mozart (by H. Rau) $1.75	Rossini (life of) $1.75
Beethoven (life of) 2.00	Schumann (life of) 1.75
Mendelssohn, (life of) 1.75	Gottschalk, (life of) 1.50
Chopin (life of) by 1.50	Poiko's Musical List 1.75
Beethoven's, Mozart's, Mendelssohn's Letters, each 1.75
Ritter's History of Music 1.50
Moore's Encyclopedia of Music 6.00

Any one of the above sent, post-paid, for retail price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.
CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

The Illustrated Phrenological

JOURNAL. This Magazine has been before the public so long and become so well established, that the Publisher hardly feels called upon to more than announce a new volume. Its name has become a household word in all parts of the country. It will as heretofore be devoted to all that will improve men Physically, Mentally, and Morally. Containing all that is new on Phrenology, or the Brain and its Functions; Etymology, or the Natural History of Man; Pseudo-phrenology, or the Signs of Character exhibited in the human Face and Form; Psychology, or the Science of the Soul; Sociology, or Man in his Private and Public Relations; History and Biography, or Man in the Past and in the Present.

Terms.—$3.00 a year. Single Numbers, 30 cents; Ten Copies, $3.00, and an extra copy to agent.

Premiums.—Besides the above Club Rates, we are offering the most liberal Premiums, a List of which will be sent on application. Local Agents wanted everywhere and cash commissions given. Please address—

S. R. WELLS Publisher,
330 Broadway, New York.

Are You Going to New York?

If so, and you wish to stop where you can FEEL AT HOME, and get GOOD FOOD HEALTHFULLY PREPARED and PLENTY OF IT.

Go to the Hygienic Institute,

Nos. 13 & 15 Laight Street.

Horse Cars pass near the door to all parts of the city, making it a very convenient stopping place for persons visiting New York, either upon business or pleasure. Open at all hours, day and night. Board by the day or week, at reasonable rates. Rooms can be secured in advance by writing. Address
WORLD & HOLBROOK, Prop'rs,
Nos. 13 and 15 Laight Street, New York.

HEALTH, EXERCISE, AND

LIFTING CURE. 229 FIFTH AVENUE. "As a means of retaining and, in certain chronic cases of disease, of regaining health, I regard it as of GREAT VALUE."—F. J. Bumstead, M. D., College of Physicians and Surgeons.

"Admirable in its results, and of the greatest benefit to those frames weakened and diseased by civil life and sedentary habits."—Edward Bayard, M. D.

Parents who have feeble children can have them placed under our care with the assurance that all we can do to make them robust will be done.

Send stamp for a circular.
M. L. HOLBROOK, M. D.,
229 Fifth Ave., New York.
Refer to Cyrus W. Field, Asa K. Butter, O. B. Frothingham, E. P. Dutton.

HARLAN P. HYDE.

REAL ESTATE AGENT,

AND
Negotiator of Mortgages.

95 1-2 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

"THE GALAXY" is about as near perfection as anything can be."—Daily Register, New Haven, Conn.

THE GALAXY

FOR 1873.

It is the best American Magazine. No family can afford to do without it. It gives more good and attractive reading matter for the money than any other periodical or book published.

THE LEADING NEWSPAPERS PRONOUNCE

THE GALAXY

The Best and most Ably Edited American Magazine.

THE GALAXY

Meets the Wants of Every Member of the family.

It contains thoughtful articles by our ablest writers.

It contains sketches of life and adventure.

It has serial stories by our best novelists.

It has short stories in each number.

The new department of SCIENTIFIC MISCELLANY appears in each number.

What the Leading Papers say.

"First of all in attractions we place 'The Galaxy.'"—Standard, Chicago.

"Well sustains its reputation for vigorous and racy writing."—N. Y. Tribune.

"The Galaxy" is always more a magazine than any, and more varied in its range than any other."—Independent.

"A model periodical; a credit to American periodical literature."—Philadelphia Press.

"There is not a dull page between its covers."—N. Y. Times.

"The variety of its contents, their solid worth, their brilliancy, and their great interest make up a general character of great excellence for every number."—Post, Boston.

"Always ably edited, and remarkable for the good judgment displayed in the selection of current topics for discussion. In this way quite eclipses the more conservative periodicals of the day."—Boston Journal, Mass.

"We are inclined to believe that more downright good literature is crowded between the covers of 'The Galaxy' than any other American magazine can boast of."—Chicago Times.

"Sheldon & Company have opened a mine of interest in their magazine, 'The Galaxy,' by drawing to it the communications of prominent public men upon questions of general interest."—Age, Philadelphia.

"The reported increase in the circulation of 'The Galaxy' is hardly to be wondered at, for it is certainly the best of American magazines."—Express, Buffalo, N. Y.

"The Galaxy" is one of the fullest, and, taken altogether, richest, of the many monthlies which have given such an enviable name to our American magazine literature."—Sunday Herald Times, Philadelphia, Pa.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

PRICE 35 CTS. PER NUMBER.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $4.00 per year.

CLUBBING TERMS.

THE GALAXY will be sent for the year 1873 with any one of the following Periodicals at the prices named: With "Harper's Weekly," or "Harper's Bazar," or Appleton's Journal, $7; the regular price is $8. With "Every Saturday," $8; regular price $9. With "Our Young Folks," $5.50; regular price $6. With "Littell's Living Age," $10; regular price, $12. Address

SHELDON & COMPANY,
677 Broadway, New York.

New England Thought!

JOURNAL OF PROGRESS AND REFORM,

"THE COMMONWEALTH,"

OF BOSTON, MASS.,

Now in its ELEVENTH YEAR, gives a cordial recognition to all the progressive movements of the age, and with its attention mainly upon

POLITICS,

LITERATURE,

ART AND NEWS,

has free and unbiased columns for their elucidation. $3.00 to Boston subscribers; $4.50 to mail subscribers. Send for specimen copies.

CHAS. W. SLACK & SON, Publishers,
33 Bromfield St., Boston.

A SWEET, PURE BREATHE DEpends on certain bodily conditions, which are explained in THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH, a new independent Health monthly, at $2 a year. Published by S. R. WELLS, 229 Broadway, N. Y.

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

Published by the Index Association at No. 143,
St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio, with Branch
Office at No. 36, Dey Street, New York City.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.
M. D. CONWAY, England.

THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. Conway and Mr. Voysey have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A new LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MORSE, late editor of the RADICAL, whose EVENING NOTES will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 36, Dey Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. F. DIMMOCK, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order.

Address

THE INDEX.

DRAWER 28, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A UNIQUE PREMIUM.

Photographs and Autographs

LEADING WRITERS

THE INDEX.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

W. J. POTTER.

W. H. SPENCER.

F. W. NEWMAN.

CHAS. VOYSEY.

A. W. STEVENS.

F. E. ABBOT.

☞ The PHOTOGRAPH of any ONE of the above-named persons will be mailed post-paid to any NEW subscriber who shall remit $3.00 for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

☞ To any one who shall send a list of names of from one to eight NEW subscribers and $3.00 for each, a corresponding number of Photographs shall be mailed post-paid, to be given to these subscribers; and the same number of Photographs shall also be mailed, post paid, as premium to the sender himself.

☞ To any one who shall send $9.00 for three years' subscription to THE INDEX in advance, a full set of the Photographs shall be mailed post-paid.

☞ None of the above Photographs will be sent, unless specially requested and unless a choice is made from the list.

☞ The Autograph of each of the above American writers will in all cases accompany the corresponding Photograph; but no Autograph can be sent with the Photograph of the English writers.

☞ These Photographs are well executed, are not on sale anywhere, and can be obtained in no other way. In offering them as premiums, the INDEX ASSOCIATION rely on the good will and active co-operation of all friends of THE INDEX.

☞ All orders for Photographs and remittances of money should be addressed to

THE INDEX.

DRAWER 28, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A SYNOPSIS

PAUL GOWER,

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a story of English and American Life; the localization being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York Journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not incursions.

It is, also, in the very warp and weft of it, as heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potent with the uninquiring and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfilment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, didactically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is emphatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucetta Mott, Celia Burlingame, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 25 cents; 10 packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER.

Secretary.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 1, 1873.

WHOLE NO. 162.

ORGANIZE!

LIBERALS OF AMERICA!

The hour for action has arrived. The cause of freedom calls upon us to combine our strength, our zeal, our efforts. These are

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and universal liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Let us boldly and with high purpose meet the duty of the hour. I submit to you the following

FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, unbecomingly the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in —:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

Liberals! I pledge to you my undivided sympathies and most vigorous co-operation, both in THIS INDEX and out of it, in this work of local and national organization. Let us begin at once to lay the foundations of a great national party of freedom, which shall demand the entire secularization of our municipal, state, and national government. Send me promptly the list of officers of every Liberal League that may be formed, and a standing list of all such Leagues shall be kept in THE INDEX. Rouse, then, to the great work of freeing America from the usurpations of the Church! Make this continent from ocean to ocean sacred to human liberty! Prove that you are worthy descendants of those whose wisdom and patriotism gave us a Constitution untroubled with superstition! Shake off your slumbers, and break the chains to which you have too long lamely submitted!

Toledo, O., Jan. 1, 1873.

FRANCIS M. ABBOT.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1873.

LUDWIG FEUERBACH AND MODERN ATHEISM.

BY O. R. PROTHINGHAM.

FIRST LECTURE IN THE COURSE OF SIX "SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES," GIVEN IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, JANUARY 5, 1873.

The subject of this lecture is Modern Atheism. I do not mean to contrast Modern Atheism with the atheism of antiquity. Such a contrast would be barren. Atheism is always essentially the same thing. Its aspects may vary, but its substance remains unaltered by time. Atheism, as a doctrine, is simply the denial of a sentient God. It may be sensuous and material in its tone, substituting for the one controlling Mind the blind forces of Nature and ascribing to them the functions that theists ascribe to God. It may be philosophical or ideal in tone, substituting for the Supreme Conscious Mind certain vast generalizations called "Laws of Nature," and ascribing to these the operations of the visible universe. It may be what the Germans call "subjective." That is, it may substitute for the Central mind the laws of thought, and ascribe the visible universe with all its phenomena to the play of intelligence in the human brain. Or again it may be what the Germans call "objective." That is, it may substitute for the super-natural, super-human Being, a huge entity like the human race, an organized mass of existence covering continuity of space and centuries of time, and whenever or wherever it is, performing the part of Creator, Preserver, Benefactor, and Providence. But whichever aspect it assumes it is essentially the same thing, denial of a sentient God.

It is not profitable to inquire whether absolute atheism be or be not possible. Absolute atheism is not under discussion; only relative atheism, —the doctrine of a sentient God; to that alone is atheism committed. Nor is it worth while to consider whether atheism be pure negation or no. Whether it be content with simple denial, or whether it be as some affirm, a shadowy prophecy of purer theism. It may be one or the other according to circumstances.

Atheism takes its coloring from the moods and temperaments of mankind. Indian atheism differs from Greek atheism, that from Roman. The atheism of the North is unlike the atheism of the South; the atheism of the East has a different cast of expression from the atheism of the West. French atheism is one thing; German atheism is another. English atheism again is still another. There is physical atheism and atheism metaphysical—two quite different things. The atheism of the XVIII century does not correspond precisely with the atheism of the XIX. The XVIII century was metaphysical, fond of abstruse arguments, given to long disquisitions on the attributes of God, the problems of evil and misery, the conduct of Providence, the nature of the soul, the rule and regulation of the world. The XIX century is scientific—it studies facts; metaphysics are discarded as unprofitable; theology has fallen into bad repute; even philosophy is bidden come down from the clouds and lend a hand at helping move along. The XVIII century tried all problems by abstract ideas. The XIX century applies to all problems the test of correct classification. The XVIII century was revolutionary. Its distinguishing feature was a passionate uprising of the mind against the bondage of dogma. War was made, not only on the Church of Rome, but on all established religion, on all accepted creeds and traditions. It was the age pre-eminently of ideals. The epoch of criticism. It substituted free inquiry for blind faith, reason for authority. It called itself the Age of Reason. The searching glance fell everywhere—on all shrines, on all mysteries. Everywhere it detected a skeleton. In the XIX century this destructive work is mainly done. The weapons of war are laid by. It is an age of rebuilding on new foundations by the help of new plans. Its spirit is generous, confiding, pacific. It aims at doing justice to ideas, beliefs, institutions, and men. It holds its opinions affirmatively whatever they may be, dislikes dogmatism whether radical or conservative, can afford to be fair, and calls in even the Samaritans to aid in rebuilding the temple of Truth.

It is but just to say that atheism has always claimed to be the friend of mankind. In the name of human welfare, it has lifted up its voice against superstition and priestcraft, those twin demons who have ruled the human mind by the despotism of ignoble fears. As a class atheists have been friends of mankind. Parker, speaking of the atheists of his own time, said: "They seem to be truth-loving and sincere persons; conscientious, just, humane, philanthropic, and modest men. They are men who mean to be just to their nature, and to their whole nature. They are commonly on the side of man as opposed to the enemies of man; on the side of the people as against a tyrant; they are, or mean to be, on the side of truth, of justice and love. I think they are much higher in their moral and religious growth than a great many men who are always saying to God, 'I go, sir,' and never stir. These are men who have made sacrifices, even, to be faithful."

This cannot be said of all atheists. It was not true of the English Hobbes, who lived at ease with the Earl of Devonshire, and probably thought a good deal more of the fine people he met under the Earl's roof than he did of the world outside, and more of his own reputation as a philosopher than he did of the well being of his fellow-men. It was not true of the French d'Holbach, who entertained the freethinkers of Paris at his brilliant table, and probably plumed himself as much on his wit as he did on his humanity. It was not true, perhaps, of Helvetius. But it was true of Diderot,—and generally it has been and is true of the class of men to which he belongs. It has been well said of the disbelief of the XVIII century: "It should be pardoned much, for it has loved much. It has greatly loved humanity." Beccaria, the author of the famous work on "Crimes and Penalties," declares that the sentiments of humanity that had been stifled in his soul by eight years of training in fanaticism had been revived by the reading of French books, and among the writers to whom he ascribes the largest share in his moral regeneration, he mentions d'Alembert, Diderot, Helvetius, and Hume. D'Alembert was not an atheist, though he had the name of being one, but he was the companion and, for a time, the fellow-workman of atheists. He, although timid and cautious, was a declared foe of despotism, a champion of moral equality, sworn foe of superstition and tyranny, which he pronounced the two greatest scourges of the human race. "His heart was kind," said one of his critics, "if his temper was bitter; he performed faithfully the duties of friendship and gratitude; both with devotion." Lucretius, the author of the poem on the "Nature of Things," one of the most remarkable relics of Roman literature, enters on his theme, the exposition of the atheism of Epicurus, with the passionate earnestness of a moral reformer. "His whole intellectual and moral nature," it has been not more generously than truly said, "seemed concentrated on the greatest subject of contemplation, for the greatest practical object, the reformation of the world." His abhorrence of war was profound and strange in a Roman of the imperial age. Deep was his sympathy, and sincere his pity for the miseries of the world. For himself and his fellow-men he aspired after a serene existence that was attained on earth. He sought this none the less truly because he sought it through the destruction of what men called "religion," and the removal from the human mind of the idea of a God.

Few nobler minds than Lucretius have lived, not many as noble. Still in every generation atheism has numbered honorable names, one of which I shall hope to make familiar and dear to you now. I cannot better illustrate and confirm the spirit of my opening words than by giving you some account of a man, a German of eminence enough to have been translated into English by the authoress of Adam Bede, Romola, and Middlemarch,—his name Ludwig Feuerbach. He died three months ago, in poverty, not in neglect, for his countrymen here and at home were dropping on him the dew of their benevolence, and trying to cheer his solitude by testimonies of their gratitude for his emancipating thoughts. The seeds he planted in his active years became a harvest that fed him in his age—and a garden of flowers on his grave.

The story of Feuerbach's life is soon told. It was quite uneventful, and of the few incidents that compose it, none are striking enough to excite interest. One of several sons of Anselm von Feuerbach, the celebrated criminal lawyer and Counsellor of State to the King, he was born the 28th of July 1804, in Landshut, a picturesque old town of Bavaria, near Munich. He studied theology at the University of Heidelberg; but the professors there could not satisfy the young man's craving for light. From Heidelberg, at the age of twenty, he went to Berlin. There philosophy took precedence of the theology—and Ludwig wrote to his father, "I have abandoned theology, but I have not abandoned it willfully or lightly, because it was not attractive to me, but because it no longer satisfies me, because it does not give me what I crave, what I need, what I have. It is nature, from whose depths timid theology draws back—it is man, essential humanity, that I would press to my heart."

The prince of philosophers at this time was Hegel; he was at once prince, priest and prophet. In the fulness of his powers, ripe in manhood and in fame—he sat in the chair of Pichte and gave laws to the intellectual world. He would "teach philosophy to talk German as Luther had taught the Bible to do." A crowd of enthusiasts thronged about him. The scientific and literary celebrities of Berlin sat at his feet. State officials attended his lectures and professed themselves his disciples. The government provided liberally for the salary and paid the travelling expenses of this great ambassador of the mind. The old story was told again of the disciple becoming master. The philosopher became the friend of those who befriended him, the tool some say of those who lavished on him honors. It was not long before the new philosophy that was to reconstruct the mental world learned to accept the world as it existed, and lent its powerful aid to the order of things it promised to overturn. Throwing out the aphorism, "The rational is the actual, the actual is the rational," Hegel declared that natural right, morality, and even religion are properly subordinate to the State. The despotic Prussian system welcomed the great metaphysician as its apologist and defender. The Prussian government was not tardy in showing appreciation of its advocate's services.

The Church taking the hint from the State put in its claim to support from the grand potentate; it needed protection against the rationalism that was coming up. And such protection the Majesty of Hegel vouchsafed to offer. Faith and philosophy struck hands after a fashion never seen before. Orthodox professors gave in their allegiance to the man who declared that God was "in process of becoming"—and the man who declared that God was in process of becoming welcomed the Orthodox professors to his circle of disciples. He was even more Orthodox than the Orthodox; he gave the theologians new explanations of their dogmas and supplied them with arguments against their foes. Trinity, Incarnation, Atonement, Redemption—he legitimated them all to the complete satisfaction of the ecclesiastical powers.

Before things came to this pass, Ludwig Feuerbach had ceased to count himself a disciple. His quick eye perceived the drift of the speculation and his brave spirit revolted from the thrall-dom he saw impending. To him philosophy meant freedom, and when he saw it was coming in the system of its greatest living representative to mean bondage, he broke away and assumed an attitude of his own: he would acknowledge a teacher gratefully, but no master. His maiden work, "Thoughts on death and immortality," clearly indicated his revolt from the school discipline, and his famous book on "The essence of Christianity" revealed the full significance of his secession. Thenceforth he travelled his own road, and he travelled it alone. His later writings showed scarcely a trace of the systems he had run through. In style, manner of handling his material, method of developing his thought, drift of purpose, animating spirit of earnest enthusiasm, Feuerbach was all himself.

In a few years, philosophy like theology was laid aside, and the young man was ready to throw himself into the arms of natural science. But poverty forbade. He must labor for a livelihood. The one thing he understood was philosophy, and in 1823, four years after his first joyous advent to Berlin, at the age now of twenty-four he accepted a professor's chair at Erlangen and delivered lectures on logic and metaphysics to the "nest of pietists there." But it would not do. A brief trial convinced him that he was out of place as a teacher of philosophy who must teach as the management of the institution directed, and once more he shook from his feet the dust of the school room.

He retired now to Bruckberg, a lively village in the vicinity of Aushach. There was nature enough for him, and nature his soul was hungry for. "All the abstract sciences" he said "multilicate man: natural science alone restores his integrity, makes demands on the full man, employs all the faculties, occupies the whole mind." In the seclusion of Bruckberg, he devoted himself to his studies. In quick succession writings come from him stamped with the impress of his genius, and especially distinguished by their bold advocacy of the new ideas which were kindling then in the bosom of those who most ardently hoped and most eagerly aspired. He was at this period a diligent contributor to the Hallerische Jahrbücher, which was the "Radical" and "Index" of his country. But this kind of literature paid its authors no better in Germany than it does elsewhere. Radicalism was never yet known to make men rich. Stones can more easily be made bread than books like his. The more ideas they contained the less they were wanted. They took bread from his mouth rather. For in consequence of them his application for a professorship was refused.

At this juncture the happy providence of wedlock came to his assistance. In 1838 the sister-in-law of the friend who had given him the peaceful asylum at Bruckberg became his wife. Now he was provided for. "Now," he cried with joy, "Now I can cherish my genius." These were happy days of industry and affection, days of writing and lecturing on his beloved themes, days likewise of practical duties. But they were destined to be few. The failure of a porcelain factory in which he was pecuniarily interested deprived him of his income, and reduced him to poverty once more. He was compelled to leave his pleasant home, and to retire to the lonely valley where he has since died, leaving wife and children behind him.

Such in brief sketch was Feuerbach's life, not an eventful one certainly. The life we are concerned with was internal, and that was far enough from being uneventful. His books are a spiritual biography. They are full of animation; they glow with enthusiasm; they surprise with novelty; unexpected turns of thought and expression occur on every page. They fairly transport the reader to new regions of the intellectual world; they open fresh views to the mental vision; introduce him to new heavens and a new earth; make him walk by the light of new constellations over territory hitherto unexplored. Let us throw a glance into this strange universe, that we may know how to think of the man who made the revelation of it. I will not attempt to carry you far, nor will I tire your eyes with too minute or too comprehensive a survey. Feuerbach wrote much. His books number ten volumes, and cover immense spaces of speculation. I shall not even weary you with a catalogue of his publications which would merely convey an idea of his productiveness, but would give no conception of his genius. With him quality is more than quantity: the key note is everything.

Though Feuerbach early abandoned theology, he was essentially a theologian. It was because he was essentially a theologian that he abandoned theology. Craving the substance, he could not concern himself most with form. He could not rest till he got at the secret of faith. His mind was serious, his thought consecrated. This change from theology to philosophy, from philosophy to natural science, indicated no secularizing process in his mind, no slackening of moral tension, no tendency to worldliness or frivolity. He simply exchanged one method of arriving at truth for another. The theological method disappointed him; the philosophical method did not meet his expectation; the method of Nature he trusted would be more satisfactory. But from each method he demanded the same result, the TRUTH. He was no sceptic except in the original sense of being a seeker. He was rather a man of faith, of faith so constant that he was not discouraged by any inadequacy of tools, or daunted by any failure of methods. He did not cease to become a divine when he ceased to call himself a student of divinity; he did not cease to be a thinker when he laid by the philosopher's garb; he did not cease to be a toiler at the problems of existence when he superintended the affairs of a factory. He never forgot himself. What he was, he was all over. What he was at the beginning, he was all through. He went to the university of Heidelberg, with the firm resolve to become a minister of religion. He said of himself at a later period, "If ever man was called and justified, to pass a judgment on religion, it was I; for I studied religion, not in books alone, nor from the records of other men's lives; I learned it from my own life."

It is in his religious writings, therefore, that we must search for the secret of this man's thought. Among these, two books are conspicuous—the "Essence of Christianity" and the "Essence of Religion." I name the works in the order of their composition. The "Essence of Christianity" was one of his earlier productions; the "Essence of Religion" was the theme of his popular lectures in Heidelberg in 1848. Let us try to read Feuerbach's soul in these two books. The task is not difficult, for Feuerbach is a man of purpose, "a volcanic man," one of his critics calls him, as his name imports, a torrent of flame. He writes with a practical end in view, and at that end he drives with impetuosity. His style is popular; his sentences are short and simple of construction; his words are fresh. He does not address the cultivated, but the people; he appeals to the heart as well as to the intellect; out of the heart to the heart. He is theologian that he may be more genuinely prophet; philosopher that he may more intelligently preach; man of science that he may communicate more directly with natural feeling.

Let us listen to this man's thoughts about religion. I will present them in his own language, as being far more glowing as well as far more correct than any that I can frame.

The question arises: Does there exist for man aught that transcends nature and humanity? Are we justified in thinking of the absolute as distinct from these? With full and feeling conviction Feuerbach answers, No! With full and feeling conviction, I say; not idly or frigidly, with the contempt of the barren literal mind, but with an emphasis which he intended should convey the glowing assurance of faith. He was through and through humanitarian. In man he had boundless confidence and hope—for man his love was boundless. He would press to his heart humanity, the whole of it. And the wholeness, the integrity of humanity, was the thing he held close in his heart. He could not bear to see it divided, dislocated, broken in two, as in his view it had come to be through misapprehension, delusion, the trick of fancy, the jugglery of priestcraft,—its natural and its spiritual powers sundered one from the other, the mortal element in it cut off from the immortal, the human detached from the divine, a portion confined to the earth, another portion set up in heaven, one portion calling the other portion angel, spirit, deity, bending down before it in worship, praying to it, humiliating itself in its presence, trying to purchase its favor with gifts, dreading its power, asking its pardon, calling itself nothing and making itself nothing in view of the supernal glory which after all was merely a reflection of its own worthiness on the clouds. To see the man trembling and exulting at the sight of his own shadow touched Feuerbach to the soul. And, therefore, when asked if he believed in a distinct, personal, conscious God, he answered no; for he felt that whatever was given to God was taken from man, that the being called God was but man himself under another name. Why have two beings where one is sufficient? Why divide consciousness against itself? Man, Feuerbach maintained, can conceive of nothing higher than his own nature. "The absolute being of man is his own being." "The consciousness of God is the self-consciousness of man, the knowledge of God is man's self-knowledge." "God is the revealed spirit, the uttered selfhood of man." God is the commonplace book of man's deepest thoughts and experiences, the genealogical register in which he puts down the names of his dearest, holiest kindred. "The measure of intelligence is the measure of being." If these assertions imply Atheism it is that theological Atheism which the author makes it his business to proclaim in the interest of mental emancipation. If they involve idealism, the dissolving of all entities in thought, it is an idealism that palpitates with sympathy.

"Religion," says Feuerbach, "is the relation of man to his own inner being, as if it was another being. The divine Being is the human being, purified, freed from the limits of the individual, projected; externally contemplated and revered as another being apart from his own and yet his own. All the attributes of the divine being are human attributes." "Man—this is the secret of religion—projects his being over against himself; thinks himself, makes himself his own object, always imagining the object to be a separate being." The spectre of the Brocken, the gigantic figure before which the ignorant mountaineer flies in terror, is his own form reflected in the atmosphere of the mountain tops; the mirage of the desert which cheats the traveller with the hope of a delicious garden is the illusion of his own fancy. "Religion is the relation of man to his outward projection of himself. Herein lies its truth; its untruth consists in conceiving this outwardly projected being as not his, as something else, apart, foreign, even opposed to himself; this is the bitter fountain of religious fanaticism." "The end of religion is human welfare, health and happiness. God is the realized health of the soul, the perfect fulfilment of human felicity" in other words. "God as the object of religion is the fruition of the heart's desire, the unlimited self-satisfaction of feeling." Mark the depth of the author's own sense of the reality and force of this feeling; note the strength of his hold on the constitution of the living heart. It covers the walls of the universe with gigantic frescoes of the gods; the absolute itself is but one of its dreams. Now the feeling plunges down, revels in private affection, is absorbed by personal attachment; now it flies away, spreads its wings, soars, aspires, wanders in the empyrean—loses itself in oceans of light.

It is the business of reason to dispel an illusion so fatal to humanity. "When morality is based on theology, right on divinity, the most immoral, unrighteous, scandalous things are justified and commended; religion is jealous of morality; it sucks its life blood; even love, the innermost, truest experience becomes, at the bidding of religion, a visionary thing, for religion bids us love men for God's sake; that is, love men in semblance only, in reality love God alone." "For faith sunders man from himself, instead of a natural organic unity and love, it substitutes an artificial unity." "The morality that is founded on Faith has for its criterion and principle the contradiction of nature" (supposes a strife between the different departments of the same nature); in a word, "Faith sacrifices man to God."

Do not fail to do justice here to Feuerbach's faith in the moral integrity of man, his determination that no break in the human consciousness shall occur. See how he makes solid and primitive that which is commonly made shadowy and secondary,—namely, human experience. See how the uncertain and visionary, namely, the heart's natural feeling, becomes the ground of all. See how, instead of beginning high up in the cloudy regions and feeling his way down to the earth, he plants himself firmly on the earth and builds up of concrete materials his heavenly mansions.

Religion, according to Feuerbach is a practical concern, a matter of feeling, not of speculation. The relation of man to his own ideal self which he imagines to be and calls God, is practical. His so-called God "is the heart emancipated from all bonds, released from the conditions of nature." From the contemplation of this he derives help in need, comfort in sorrow. "The clearest proof that in religion man deals simply with his own being, simply with himself, is the love which God cherishes for man, a love which is the very key of religion." How could man find peace in God, if God were a different being from himself? How could sin be a revolt against a divine being, if the divine being were not identical with the human being whom sin wounds? How could divine revelation be made to humanity if it did not proceed from human reason?

Observe the scope given to human nature in these declarations. In Feuerbach's conception it covers the whole field of divinity. If the theological deity is removed it is that a glorified human heart may be placed on his immortal throne. The heavens are not folded up and laid away like a vesture. They are flooded with the light of love. The spaces of immensity heretofore crowded with angels are not left bleak and uninhabited; man's longing and aspiration people them with smiling expressions of his hopes. Humanity comes into possession of the whole realm of intelligence and feeling. It flings itself forth into the fields of light; it communes with itself; it adores its own ideal majesty; it bows low before its own transcendent possibility. The lovely Swedenborgian poem comes again to mind:—

"To mercy, pity, peace, and love
All pray in their distress,
And to these virtues of delight
Return their thankfulness.

For mercy, pity, peace, and love
Is God our Father dear,
And mercy, pity, peace, and love
Is man, his child and care.

For mercy has a human heart,
Pity, a human face,
And love, the human form divine,
And peace, the human dress.

Thus every man in every clime
That prays in his distress
Prays to the human form divine,
Love, mercy, pity, peace.

And all must love the human form
In heaven, Turk, or Jew;
Where mercy, love, and pity dwell,
There God is dwelling too."

Feuerbach objects to religion as commonly apprehended, that it is egotistical; by sundering the natural connection between the visible human being and the spiritual world, by making man dependent on other beings than himself, by forcing him into an attitude of supplication before the invisible forms, and making it a necessity and a duty on his part to obtain all the favors from them he can, by compelling him to consider his selfhood as deriving nurture and felicity from a being not in sympathy with himself, religion begets in man the craven spirit of a suppliant and the greedy disposition of a parasite. It annihilates one portion of the human being before the other, and so instead of expanding and cultivating, narrows and mutilates. Charges of this sort Feuerbach makes with passion. Break this illusion, he says, that God is a being distinct from man,—restore the true conception that God is only a name given to the ideal nature of man himself, the personification of man's grander personality, and at once humanity straightens itself up to its full height, believes in its constitution, respects its law, trains its powers, educates its capacities, walks with uplifted countenance, enjoys the use of its faculties and pushes out towards its perfection. It becomes its own comforter, inspirer, Saviour. It holds the prophets and saints in its bosom, and suns itself in the heavens of its own possibilities.

These things Feuerbach says over and over again in endless reiteration. He is not a diffuse writer, on the contrary he is terse. His style is pointed and brilliant; but so anxious is he that his thought shall pierce, that he keeps saying the same thing with an unwearied perseverance, which is also unwearied because so earnest. The intensity of the thought preserves the freshness of the utterance; the feeling is never monotonous.

The criticism which Feuerbach makes on religion in general bears with increased force against Christianity as the crowning form of religion. Here too I present his thought mainly in his own words, that I may present it fairly, making no apology for him, as he made none for himself, but letting him speak as he would if he were here.

Christianity had been called by its lovers, "The religion of the heart." Feuerbach accepts the definition. "Out of the heart," he says, "out of its deep necessity to do good, to live and die for mankind, out of the impulse to beneficence, which would make all happy, even the humblest and most degraded, out of the moral duty of beneficence as made compulsory on the heart, the finest elements in Christianity spring." But the religion partakes of the heart's weakness as well as of its strength. "The heart discovers nothing; it is passive, receptive, dependent." "In Christianity man retires within himself, considers himself individually as alone of essential consequence, cuts himself off from the rest of the world." "The heathen corrected their tendency to inwardness by the contemplation of the universe; they generously permitted the universe to live and live forever; the Christians betrayed their intolerance by insisting that in the interest of their spiritual life, the world should be burned up." "The Christians deified an individual." They substituted the man Jesus for the race; they disavowed culture, discouraged marriage, persuaded men to love themselves rather than their neighbors, and Christ instead of humanity. "Separation from the world, from nature, from society, has been the aim of Christianity, and this aim is literally accomplished in monachism." "Celibacy and monachism are necessary results of the supernatural extra-mundane spirit of Christianity." "Unspotted virginity is the principle of holiness, which by depreciating marriage leaves no genuine, but only an apparent sanctity." "Death is the entrance into heaven. But if death be the condition of felicity and moral perfection, then renunciation, mortification, self-crucifixion is the only law of morality." "Christianity spoils love by faith." "A love which is limited by faith is no true love; it is good only so long as faith is not compromised." "Faith makes belief in God its law; love is freedom; it condemns not even the atheist." "Faith separates God from men, therefore men from men; love identifies God with men and men with God, therefore men with men." "Faith is a merciless fire, consuming everything opposed to it. This fire of faith contemplated as an external being is the wrath of God, in other words hell." Christian love "has not conquered hell because it has not conquered faith." "It is 'Christian' love, therefore something limited and peculiar; but the essence of love is universality. While Christian love clings to its Christliness, it is a love that injures the soul of truth, a love whose narrowness conflicts with the spirit of love, an abnormal, a loveless love."

"The deepest thought and feeling of a religion appear in the conception of heaven." "Faith in the future life is only faith in the true life." "The future is the lost present, regained." "What men exclude from their heaven, they exclude from their conception of true being." "The Christian excludes from heaven life in his kind; this, therefore he excludes from his conception of true human life. In heaven he is delivered from that he would be free from here, namely, passion, his material environment, his attachment to nature."

The spirit of the religion appears in its cardinal dogmas. The incarnation imports that God is personified love, that love is divine. It imports further that love humbles itself, condescends, submits, suffers. "The doctrine of the dying God imports, that dying for others is God-like." To say that God suffers is equivalent to saying that God is a heart. A being without sorrow is a being without a heart. The mystery of the suffering God is therefore the mystery of feeling; a suffering God is a sympathetic God."

The doctrine of trinity implies that God's love has a corresponding object. "Loneliness is a necessity for thought, companionship a necessity for affection. Man can think alone, he must love in society." "God the Father is I, God the Son is Thou. I is thought, solitary. Thou is love. Thought with love and love with thought constitute the whole being." "How can God be the father of mankind (of subordinate creatures distinct from himself, if he had not in himself a subordinate being, a law." To make the family group complete a third person is necessary, and a woman, the feminine principle, was received into heaven. Motherly love is associated with the love of father and son.

The third person in the trinity is the Virgin Mother. The heart that demands a Father God, demands a Mother God. The heart that demands a God the Son, a mild, mediating being, a sensitive susceptible being, a sympathetic God, demands a mother with whom the son may live in intimate affection. The Son is all in all to the Father, the Mother is all in all to the Son. To the Son the Mother is indispensable. The Son's heart and the Mother's heart are one. "The Herrnhuters called the Holy Ghost the mother of the Saviour." "Faith in the love of God is faith in the Feminine as a divine principle." "Protestantism had no need of a woman in heaven, because it pressed a mortal woman to its heart." "The true God is the God in his fullness, a necessity where the actual life is barren. The emptier the human life, the fuller the life of God." The same act impoverishes the actual world and enriches the ideal world. The poor man only has a rich God. God springs from a sense of need. What man lacks, that his God is." The cheerless heart, wifeless, childless, loveless, dreams of God who is in himself a complete and genial society.

The mystery of the incarnate word is in like manner a reflection thrown on fancy's screen of a familiar thought. "The word is the light of the world. The word leads to all truth, unlocks all secrets, discloses the hidden, brings the distant near, makes palpable the infinite, immortalizes the transient. Man passes, the word endures; the word is life and truth; to the word all power is given; it makes the blind see, the lame walk, the sick well, the dead live. The word works miracles, the only rational wonders. The word is the gospel, the Paraklete, the comforter. To convince yourself of the divine quality of speech, imagine yourself alone and forsaken, hearing for the first time the voice of a man. Would not the voice seem to you the voice of an angel, nay, as the voice of God himself, the sound of heavenly music? The word has redeeming, atoning, beatifying, emancipating power. The sins that we confess are forgiven through the divine power of speech. The dying man departs in peace who speaks out his long kept evil secret. The forgiveness of sins lies in the acknowledgment of sins. The sorrows we talk over are lightened. Utterance subdues passion. If we are in darkness and doubt we have only to speak, and the instant we open our mouth to explain or ask explanation, the doubt and darkness disappear. Speech makes us free; speech is an act of freedom; speech is freedom. He who cannot speak is a slave. The speechless passion is the overmastering passion. Barbarism vanishes with the culture of speech. The word of God is the Godlikeness of word; it describes the true character of human speech."

Illustrations of Feuerbach's peculiar method might be multiplied indefinitely. All religion with him is pictorial; a gorgeous piece of fancy work, a brilliant dramatizing of human feelings. "Prayer is man's communion with his own heart; one part of himself addresses the other part; he speaks to his other self as God, and calls it Thou." "Miracle is a supreme wish realized, nothing more." The belief in immortality expresses man's desire not to die. Certainty of personal continuance the heart craves. The assurance must be immediate, sensible, palpable. Hence belief in the bodily resurrection of the Christ, as the only thing that can satisfy the heart's desire for an immediate knowledge of individual continuance. "He that denies the resurrection, denies the resurrection of Christ, denies Christ; but he that denies Christ denies God." The sacred history, which is a history not of events but of thoughts, closes with the resurrection, and begins with supernatural birth, thus cutting off nature at both ends. The Christian abhorred the natural processes of death, and by his miracle-working faith abolished them both. "The wifeless, childless, loveless life is the direct way to the immortal heavenly life, for heaven is simply the life that is free from nature, from sex, from society, from race, the absolutely inward life." "Faith in personal immortality is faith that distinctions of sex and race are incidental, that the individual is in himself a complete absolute being." "Faith in personal immortality is identical with faith in the personal God." "Here," say the theologians, "we are separated from God; hereafter the veil will be lifted." "The end of goodness is felicity; but the eternal life is God himself," said Augustine. "Blessedness is the Godhead, therefore every one blessed is a God," said Boethius. "The old man will be renewed in the spiritual life," said Luther; "he will be like God in life, righteousness, majesty, wisdom." "Faith in the immortality of man is faith in the divinity of man" (and inversely, faith in God is faith in the pure personality, emancipated from all limits and so made immortal); "as God is nothing but the being of man purified of whatever in thought or feeling seems to be limitation or evil, so the future is but the present freed from the same limitations."

But, enough. You take the idea. We will not stop to criticize it, or to take exceptions to it. I am here to express Feuerbach, not to refute him; to show what he thinks, feels, and is, not how he might have thought and felt to my greater satisfaction. That he was the last prophet, the perfect seer, the final expositor of the truth, neither I, nor you, nor he, believed. But that he was a prophet and a true one, a seer and a keen-eyed one, an interpreter of truth and a searching one,—I for one believe. One man at a time; this little hour of time belongs to Feuerbach, not to his opponents.

The charge of atheism in the popular sense Feuerbach never cared to deny, but he has an answer to it that sufficiently vindicates him. "Not the attribute of the Godhead, but the Godhead of the attribute, is the first question respecting the divine being. The true theist is the man to whom the attributes of the divine being—love, wisdom, goodness—are nothing, not the man to whom the subject of the attributes is nothing. He that confesses the substance of deity is no atheist. If love and goodness are human qualities, then the essential ground of them is human."

Can you justly call a man an atheist whose faith in spiritual qualities rises even to the sublime? Can you justly call a man a materialist whose faith in thought is so enthusiastic that it glorifies the world? Feuerbach's atheism was intended to restore man to himself. His materialism was designed to prevent man's exhaling in dreams. He denied the personal immortality of the soul—yes, he did, and for the same reason that he denied the personal existence of God. He wished to preserve the integrity of existence, to make mortality immortal, to breathe the spirit of eternity with time, to compress all humanity within human limits, and get the full benefit of this life while it lasted. He was jealous of the future life; he begrudged every drop of feeling that was spilled over the edge of the grave and lost on the other side. This world was rich enough for him, and ought to be rich enough for anybody; and to see it neglected, misused, flouted, made him heart-sick. Is there not enough to enjoy here, enough to do, enough to win? Cannot affection be satisfied, and conscience, and aspiration? Who has exhausted this sphere? Come back you dreamers, you stragglers in the realm of fancy, you who sigh for celestial gardens, come back and make a garden at home? All you long for there may be yours here.

Like the amiable Epicurus, Feuerbach would abolish the fear of death and of that which lay beyond. "Only before death, but not in death," he says, "is death death. Death is so unreal a being that he is only when he is not, and is not when he is." "Thou callest death something, because thou dost contrast it with something that is, with that which thou thyself art."

Thus Feuerbach thought in his poverty and neglect, listening to the music of his own heart. He asked for no consolation: he made no moan. He was impatient of the argument that another life was needed to make compensation for the ills of this. The ills of this life were as sacred and salutary as anything else about it. The landscape requires the shadow; there is no peace without pain. Leave me my pain, he said.

The spirit of Bryant's Thanatopsis would be dear to Feuerbach:—

"So live that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan that moves
Towards the mysterious realm where each one takes
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

The spirit of Feuerbach, though impetuous, was noble. "The spirit of the time," he said, "is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!" "My business was, and above everything is, to illumine the dark regions of religion with the torch of reason, that man at last may no longer be a sport to the hostile powers that hitherto and now avail themselves of the mystery of religion to oppress mankind. My aim has been to prove that the powers before which man crouches are creatures of his own limited, ignorant, uncultured, and timorous mind, to prove that in special the being whom man sets over against himself as a separate supernatural existence is his own being. The purpose of my writing is to make men anthropologists instead of theologians; man-lovers instead of God-lovers; students of this world instead of candidates of the next; self-reliant citizens of the earth instead of subservient and wily ministers of a celestial and terrestrial monarchy. My object is therefore anything but negative, destructive, it is positive: I deny in order to affirm. I deny the illusions of theology and religion that I may affirm the substantial being of man."

Feuerbach was the own son of the brave Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Auspach, who insisted on probing to the bottom the mysterious case of Caspar Häuser, the poor lad who was reduced to idiocy and then murdered by an undiscovered and undiscoverable hand. Persons of the highest rank were suspected of being concerned in this "crime against the life of a soul," and Paul Joseph Feuerbach, backed by the money of an English lord, fearlessly attempted to discover the secret. These conspiracies against the life of souls his son Ludwig swore to thwart if he could. A soldier of truth, trained, equipped, fearless but circumspect too, skilled in tactics as in the use of his weapon, measuring fairly field and force and foe, he entered into the conflict for humanity without a thought of private fame or personal emolument, but with a single wish that reason and justice might prevail. To Feuerbach there was but one evil, egotism, and one good, love; that in his judgment, as in the judgment of Jesus, was "the fulfilling of the law." By egotism he meant the disposition to subordinate society to self; by love he meant the disposition to subordinate self to society. The family before the individual, the tribe before the family, the nation before the tribe, the race before the nation, humanity before the race, was his motto. He was no sentimentalist like Victor Hugo, no enthusiast like Mazzini, no fanatic like St. Just or Ferré. He appealed to no fancied "will of God" as revealed in his pet theory. He knew nothing of a "categorical imperative" which his private conscience was commissioned to represent. All acquaintance with "absolute morality" and "eternal principles of right" he disclaimed. But appreciating the power of both principles, the principle of self-preservation and the principle of social union, he felt his way through the complexities, conflicts, actions and reactions, compromises and reconciliations incident to human progress, guided neither by feeling nor by prejudice, but by reason. He was not a theorist in any interest, nor a partisan in any cause. In the technical sense he was no "socialist," for he prized the individual as much as society. In the technical sense he was no patriot, for he loved humanity more than the government of his own country. The emancipation of the people was the end he sought. He spoke warmly of the republican institutions of Switzerland, where, at one time, he thought of making his home. In the great uprising of 1848, the uprising of the people against the kings, he took a lively interest because the movement was popular in origin, drift, and purpose; its object being democratic freedom; its intent to take men out of the position of menials to heavenly and earthly monarchs and to make them free and self-reliant citizens of the world. But in the German triumph of 1849 he took no satisfaction. The share of the people in it was small. It neither began from the people, nor did it, in his judgment, meditate or serve the welfare of the people. It was a triumph of kings and kingship; it contemplated the establishment of a dynasty; it heralded the institution of an empire. The union it effected was a union for power, not for liberty and light. That the Germans in America, he wrote, should rejoice in the fulfillment, as it seemed, of their national hope, was natural. Far away in their trans-atlantic homes, they hear the glorious shoutings, but not the suppressed groans; they see the strong hand that bears aloft the banner of unity, not the heavy heel that crushes democratic aspirations; they catch the glitter of the uniform, but discern not the prison garb that the common people must put on. In the regeneration of Germany, one of Germany's noblest sons (one of its true liberators, one of its most order-loving, peace-loving, aspiring souls) found himself poorer, lonelier, more neglected than ever. No crown lighted on his head; no flower dropped into his lap.

To the cause of free thought Feuerbach rendered one service of inestimable worth. He has shown that it is consistent with a strictly irreproachable life. He himself was an unanswerable argument that the atheist is not of necessity a murderer, a liar, and a villain. If all that is said of him be true, he demonstrated the fact that an atheist may be a hero. In his youth he was pious after the old style of piety; he prayed and fasted. "Theology," he used to say, "destroyed his stomach." "His purity, sincerity, and resolution," says one of his eulogists, "are only surpassed by his modesty, his simplicity, and his goodness of heart." His scholars called him "the good Ludwig." Lively in manner, quick in feeling, impetuous in speech and gesture, vehement in temperament, as his portrait represents him (the portrait of a soldier rather than of a thinker and writer), he did not lose the power to appreciate that the world contained other people besides himself. He could smile at opinions he could not share. The God of Nature, he said, still seems a necessity to the mass of mankind. My neighbor, the miller, reasons that as the Bruckberg mill would stand still without him, so the mill of the universe would stop if there was no superintendent by. For the rest, this God of Nature is a harmless being, quite other than the dark, bloody, despotic God of the priests.

A touch of humor lighted up the austere earnestness of the man. Pointing out to a visitor the road by which he had entered Bruckberg, he said laughing, "See this road now! People call it the 'church way,' because they see the Bruckbergers travelling along it to church. But we Bruckbergers call it the 'dead way,' because we carry our dead by it to the church-yard in Grosshasbach. 'Church way' and 'dead way,'—the same thing."

Feuerbach was not insensible to the treatment he received from his opponents. "I have been observant of the truth," he said, "and never of my personal interests; yet see how my enemies have pursued me with sneers and scorn, with falsehood and calumny, having no better argument;" but the treatment, while it grieved his heart, did not poison it with bitterness. His failure as a lecturer must have disappointed him in more ways than one: it cut off his livelihood, it limited his usefulness, and it hurt his pride; but he found in it material for jest. "My classes in Erlangen, the nest of pietists," he said, "dwindled at last, to three pupils. One of these shot himself, the second was stabbed in a duel, the third departed for lands unknown."

But these jesting moods were probably more frequent ten years ago than they were later. Deepening poverty, accumulating anxiety, increasing feebleness, political agitation, the convulsions of war, the wide-spread sorrow consequent on it, pushed the philosopher and humanitarian into the shadow. The blaze of military glory was felt only as it darkened in the valley where the thinker dwelt. Amid the din of arms his voice was unheard. But the hundreds whom he had helped to braver intellectual life remembered him, and hard-working hands dropped their scanty earnings into his. It is touching and impressive, the list of the contributors to the national offering to Ludwig Feuerbach. The sums were mostly small; they were given by the poor and the struggling; they were chiefly "widow's mites,"—but they told of this man's influence with the simple, thoughtful people who work their ideas into life and so test their nature. Such people are as grateful for a thought as the hungry are for bread. The humble bless the man who lifts their minds above their lot. The tolling bless the man who gives their minds repose.

Will not the day come when this kind of benefactor will be recognized, when the men who remove immaterial barriers will be hailed as the noblest of discoverers, when the men who open new realms of reason and enable humanity to enjoy the fellowship of intelligence,—will be considered benefactors of their kind, deserving of reward when living, of renown when dead? Let it not be our fault if the day does not come soon.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1854, by P. E. AMOR, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER V.

POOR RELATIONS.

Paul and Ruth Gower, aged respectively seven and three years, cried no more than was natural at parting with the gaunt old grandmother, who had petted and scolded them from their earliest recollection; who was always telling stories about her former gentility and undeserved misfortunes; and who resented equally the alienation of her father's money and the conditions imposed by its inheritor upon the bestowal of her pension. She thought she ought, at least, to have been received into his house and made comfortable for the rest of her life; an arrangement which her disposition and characteristics rendered desirable on one side only: hence Mr. Blencowe's adoption of the alternative already related. He was by no means sentimental about his ex-flame, nor inclined to superfluous restitution—for, like a great many persons, his conscience hardly rose much higher than the legal standard, but it, as well as his inclination, impelled him to provide for his cousin; and he did so, not illiberally. Indeed, there is this to be said in apology for his compromise with strict justice and honesty; that, had he made over to her the whole of the ten thousand pounds he inherited from her father, she would in all probability have squandered it, or become a miser—so much was the poor soul affected by her poverty.

She was established, then, in the suburban cottage, subject to the supervision of Mr. and Mrs. Gower, who became Mr. Blencowe's factors in the payment of her monthly pension, and arrogated (at least Mrs. Gower did) the right of making inquisitorial visits, which were always productive of intense acrimony on both sides. They ceased, however, on the discovery of the groundlessness of the suspicion that the poor woman "drank," in which they originated. Afterwards, Paul used to take her money to her, upon the first of each month, generally remaining for the day,—a privilege fraught with more worry than enjoyment; for though she gave him cake and wine and, indeed, crammed him with good things, she commonly wept a good deal, fretted at not obtaining letters from America, and catechized him as to all he saw, heard, and experienced in his new home. Loving the boy, she entertained the bitterest distrust and jealousy of his grandparents,—proportionate, in fact, to their scarcely-disguised repugnance towards herself. She went but once to Thorpe Parva, on special, formal invitation, when her painful humility and as objectionable self-assertion rendered her such a nuisance that the visit was never repeated; so, in future, she only saw Ruth on the infrequent occasions when the girl came to London. Thus the intercourse between this unlucky pensioner and her cousin, as well as the children's relations, became merely nominal; and when Mr. Blencowe paid her funeral expenses, Mrs. Gower pronounced her decease "a happy release for all parties."

The homes to which the children had been removed were much superior in comfort to anything they had hitherto known, but in every other respect perfectly dissimilar—as much so as the bringing up of Paul and his sister within them. I shall address myself to them in the natural order of precedence.

The household of Paul's grandfather now comprised only himself, his wife, and two unmarried daughters; all the rest of John Gower's brothers and sisters had found homes of their own, or graves. Into the hands of his aunts, then, the early training of the boy naturally lapsed. These ladies were handsome, like most of the family, the younger being of delicate, fragile constitution, in which lurked the seeds of disease, to be developed into consumption and death while she was yet in early womanhood. Both of them might have been married, notwithstanding the seclusion in which the family dwelt, but for their father's refusal to give portions with his children: their suitors had either been too poor or not sufficiently disinterested. Extremely dissatisfied, but practically aware of the hopelessness of disputing Mr. Gower's will on this point, neither of them looked forward to old maidenhood with equanimity. They contrasted their own lives with the more agreeable ones of their married brothers and sisters; their home with those to which they sometimes fled for temporary relief from its sombre monotony; and were none the happier for the comparison.

Sharing the family conviction that their elder brother (of whom they could know but little personally, he being considerably their senior) had disgraced himself by a low marriage, the Misses Gower, though not unkindly disposed towards their nephew, certainly treated him with much less consideration than they vouchsafed towards their more fortunate little kinsfolk, who had parents and homes; and who, when they came to the house, rather startled Paul by their disregard of its grim proprieties. The boy was a poor relation, that was all. Nowhere in the world do these words mean so much—and so little—as in England.

Paul was taught by his aunts and grandmother to obey implicitly without answering; to be neat and clean and quiet as they could make him; to mind his lessons and to refer everything to the commands and opinions of his benefactors. When considered old enough, he had his regular hours of instruction and clever schoolmistresses, for his aunts were accomplished. Under the superintendence of a maid-servant, he took daily walks in the Regent's Park, being sometimes permitted to play there; though as Jane was sufficiently ill-favored and "serious" to repel all possibility of amorous advances from even the least fastidious and most enterprising of soldiers, from the adjacent barracks in Albany street, these indulgences might have occurred oftener. He was particularly careful of his deportment in returning, while passing a portion of a side-street overlooked by the back windows of Mr. Gower's house, lest somebody should be on the watch to observe him. When one of his cousins "made faces" in that direction, Paul was amazed at his temerity, and almost expected that something would happen to him.

He dined at the family-table, being tutored to sit very erect and silent, never to ask for anything, and to eat all that was put upon his plate. For sometime, his half-glass of table beer was regularly diluted for him with an equal quantity of water by one of his aunts. On Sunday afternoons he had a glass of wine (home-made) after repeating, without book, one of the psalms for the day, or a portion of it, if it were too long; a performance which came off while the seniors partook of dessert, and previous to grandpapa's and grandmama's nap, when Paul was permitted to relax his mind over Fox's Book of Martyrs or Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (Whitfield's edition, with the illustrations so delightfully described by Charles Lamb in one of his letters), in the front-parlor. Both morning and evening he went to chapel—the "Rooms" heretofore alluded to—being studious to retain the text and to incur no rebuke for inattention or unseemly behavior.

At first the boy found all this very strange, dismal, and lonely, and regretted even the poor homes in which he had been subjected to no greater constraint than originated in the caprices of a fond though selfish old woman. The grave routine of the household, making each day the monotonous copy of its predecessor, awed and depressed him; and when the maid-servant who saw him to bed at exactly half-past eight, every night, had heard him say his prayers and taken away his candle, he often crept out again to the window, and watched the passers-by and the people going in and out of the opposite tavern, for company. His room was a small one at the top of the house, containing some dusty anatomical casts and a phrenological head upon a disused shelf (which probably appertained to his father's student-days); also a locked-up closet, reported to have once held a skeleton, the memory of which, at first, so haunted him that the maid-servant, after many reprehensions of his groundless terrors, had to dispel them by opening it and disclosing nothing more alarming than old trunks and broken furniture. Jane occupied the back attic and always roused the boy in the morning by rapping with her knuckles upon the door and stating the time.

The discipline to which he was subject, though rigorous, was based upon a conscientious regard for his future welfare, and if strictly, not unkindly, administered. Accepting it with the docility of childhood, he was not unhappy. He revered his grandparents as the wisest and best of created beings, entertained a real affection for the old gentleman, was afraid of the old lady, thought his aunts very beautiful and very accomplished but rather severe ladies, and obeyed Jane. Only he would have liked greater liberty and more amusement, such as he saw enjoyed by his cousins, on those rare occasions when he was invited (and permitted) to visit them at the houses of their parents. Or how happy would it have been if he could have lived with his sister in Northamptonshire!

He was sent to a day-school as soon as his age warranted it, whence he came home on the first day with a black eye acquired in single combat with a smaller boy than himself. This and his subsequent experience enlarged his social horizon, and though his aunts pronounced him noisy and rude, and made disadvantageous comparisons between his past and present behavior, it did not counteract the natural healthy effect of association with those of his own age and sex. From a rather nervous, shy boy, he grew into one sensitive indeed, but neither deficient in spirit or vitality.

In spite of his aunts' opinion he was a quiet lad, fonder of reading than of out-of-doors' pleasures: he would more willingly spend his holidays in poring over books than in cricketing, bathing, or other sports with his school-fellows. This disposition (not an uncommon one in boys of his temperament) had been fostered by his comparative seclusion from youthful society. He read all the books that came in his way and longed, eagerly, for more.

It would be very easy to imagine a library better adapted to a boy's tastes than that of Mr. Gower, which consisted exclusively of "serious" books, religious magazines, sermons, and biographies,—the writings of William Huntingdon being, of course, particularly prominent—a dozen or so of volumes, appropriately printed in coarse type, on coarse paper, and half-bound in black calf, with all the curious titles in brimstone-colored letters on the backs. With the exception of a copy of Paradise Lost, Bunyan, and the Book of Martyrs before mentioned, the collection contained hardly one volume which might not have been supposed repellent of youthful curiosity: yet for lack of more palatable intellectual food, Paul applied himself to that at hand, with an appetite peculiar to his nature and with results influencing his whole future life. He was not particularly recommended to this course of study by his grandparents, though unquestionably they approved of it, and never suspected that it could be productive of any but beneficial consequences.

What those consequences were must be related hereafter in Paul's own words. I believe they are less unusual than might be supposed in boys of thoughtful disposition and nervous organization, bred up in religious families. The death of his aunt, which happened at this period, contributed towards them. Two years afterwards her sister accepted an offer of marriage from that last refuge of the unwedded, a cousin; so henceforth Paul lived alone in the old house with his grandparents.

All this time he saw but little of his sister, who was growing up under much less peculiar and more wholesome influences; indeed, at first, the children almost became strangers to each other, for though Mr. Blencowe and Mr. and Mrs. Gower were nominally friends, the intercourse between them was very limited. They accorded him that jealous respect which is not uncommon among the stricter class of nonconformists towards clergymen of the Church of England; while, though he would have pronounced them very worthy persons, he entertained the secret, inevitable conviction that dissent was disreputable, and that people who preferred going to chapel instead of church must be deficient in taste or good sense, or objectionably presumptuous in backing their own opinions against those of gentlemen who were specially appointed to know better. Mr. Huntingdon regarded as an exploded fanatic and a ruffian; and his disciple as one who ought to be orthodox, in virtue of his past connection with George the Third, his wealth, and personal appearance. So, though he generally called when in town, invited Paul to the Vicarage for a couple of weeks every summer, and allowed Ruth to visit her grandparents (of which visits I shall speak presently), the acquaintance between the elder folks never ripened into intimacy. To do Mr. Blencowe justice, however, this was less his fault than that of the old lady and gentleman.

His Vicarage was a pretty modern antique, standing in its own grounds, and so close to the church in which he officiated (being much too fond of his duties to delegate them to a curate, though he could have afforded one), that he used to put on his surplice at home and, crossing his garden, enter the little building by the chancel-door as the bell ceased tolling. The living, a comfortable one, had been given him by a wealthy college-friend, who was lord of the manor and resided in a rather picturesque old Hall, which had once been a Priory, on the outskirts of the village—you passed it on your way to Thorpe Parva from the adjacent market-place of—. Its occupants were the gentry, if not the great folks of the vicinity, and, as such, held in proportionate respect by the clergyman, on whom they bestowed a gracious recognition, sometimes extending to an invitation to dinner. Mr. Blencowe had been vicar for the better part of half a century, and, up to the time of his adopting Ruth, had lived alone, the most inveterate of old bachelors.

[To be continued.]

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at ODEON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.
CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 31, 1873. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.
ACKNOWLEDGED previously, Nine Hundred and Sixty-Seven Shares,
W. A. THURSTON, West Newton, Mass., One Share, $100
$96,700
$96,800

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending January 25, 1873.

Thos. M. Johnson	$1.50	Mrs. Richard Switzer	$3.00
Smith Sutherland	50	J. A. Simon	5.00
James Dods	50	Jno. Pennington	2.00
Mrs. Geo. C. Davis	1.00	Mrs. L. E. Blount	13.00
Edgar Wright	50	Asa Ryte	1.00
J. Timney	1.50	Kate J. Irish	5.00
A. F. Gray	75	C. L. Ehrenfeld	5.70
Sam'l H. Emery, Jr.	50	Marvin Chase	3.00
Wm. Shephardson	1.50	Gaylord Finney	1.00
Palaski Carter	1.00	Mrs. F. Ingraham	1.50
Almira L. Tracy	2.00	A. Bodgett	1.00
Alden B. Morse	75	Geo. Bates Lucas	5.00
H. A. Scofield	3.00	X. Phillips	5.00
J. H. Holbert	3.00	J. Glat	3.00
Chas. D. Cady	3.00	N. G. Chatterton	3.00
Wm. E. Palmeter	3.00	Jas. B. Watkins	3.00
E. S. Barrows	3.00	Avery Lamb	2.00
B. W. Pierce	3.00	A. Ervin	5.00
Chas. W. Oesting	3.00	Richard M. Lucas	5.00
Wm. Carpenter	3.25	Jno. C. Rooney	3.00
N. H. Ambler	3.00	D. C. Hastings	75
Chas. H. White	3.00	Horace Richey	1.00
D. E. Ware	3.00	C. K. Mathews	1.00
Albert P. Ware	3.00	Ruth Stibley	2.00
Edw. M. MacGraw	3.00	Mathias Nabel	3.00
J. G. Dodge	1.50	Wm. M. Justus	3.00
Jno. W. Chadwick	25.00	Fred. Looser	2.00
Freeman Brown	3.00	Helen M. Headings	3.00
Elisa S. Leggett	75	Rufus Gates	3.00
Wm. H. Lemme	75	Thos. M. Day	3.00
J. S. Ramage	75	J. B. Walters	3.00
Wm. P. Worth	85	Calvin Griswold	3.00
J. T. Kilbourn	25	B. Newland	3.00
S. H. Pratt	50	Geo. L. Corwell	3.00
W. H. Lowell	1.00	Mrs. Aaron Aldrich	3.00
A. G. Pearce	10	Harvey Grinnell	3.00
Jno. Barclay	50	R. T. Wilson	3.00
D. Mann	50	R. Wooten	75
I. J. Carney	50	Martin Stoffee	1.50
L. W. Lee	25	E. B. Rounds	3.00
Moses David	1.00	Joseph A. Stevens	3.00
W. M. Grant	20.00	Richd. M. Russell	3.00
Chas. Granger	10.00	Jacob Sprinkel	3.00
J. O. Martlo	10.00	R. J. Rogers	3.00
J. Henry Clark	10.00	W. P. Atkinson	3.00
E. B. Cole	10	Frank F. Morrill	3.00
Wm. Chestnut	25	Geo. H. Stevens	1.00
A. Eiswald	50	Melissa C. Palmer	3.00
E. E. Curtis	10	T. C. Randolph	3.00
Samuel Lydiard	10.00	Horace Reed	3.00
Warren Chase	10.00	J. C. Chatterton	3.00
Darius Lyman	3.00	Seneca Robinson	1.00
E. A. J. Chatterton	20.00	R. R. Perry	3.00
F. E. Abbot	50.00	Geo. S. Talbot	3.00
P. C. Turner	20.00	J. S. Palmer	100.00
J. C. Price	35	L. Von Hoeslingh	1.25
D. G. Towle	10	F. J. Mayer	1.00
Dyer D. Lum	20	A. A. Bartol	1.00
Joel Warren	1.50	Chas. Richardson	10.00
E. W. McKinstry	1.50	J. A. Simon	10.00
Fred. W. Klein	1.00	Mary Gifford	10.00
H. E. Burnham	3.00	Toledo Printing Co.	20.00
H. Kiest	3.00	Clara Ives	75
J. Roemer	3.00	Wm. T. Kester	1.00
L. D. Hoard	3.00	A. J. Stenbaugh	1.00
W. B. Billings	50.00	Chas. A. Miller	25
Ernst Prussner	2.00	Wm. R. Grow	25
Chas. M. Dennison	2.00	W. W. Hartzell	15
Chas. Griswold	2.00	J. W. Millisack	50
Lyman Clark	3.00	Chas. Bonnell	10.00
C. P. Burghardt	3.00	Jefferson Singer	10.00
S. L. Bailey	3.00	Henry Helaland	20
E. W. Meacham	3.00	Victor Keen	50.00
J. H. Northrup	1.00	D. S. Woodworth	25
D. Sandman	1.00	G. F. Matthes	10.00
J. D. Fanning	1.50

The Index.

FEBRUARY 1, 1873.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers. The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 28, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

FRANKLIN KILGUS ABBOT, Editor.
 ARNOLD WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
 OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINS, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROY. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWAY (England), Rev. MONROE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Please send all matter intended for any particular issue of THE INDEX at least a fortnight in advance of date. We shall be very greatly obliged by attention to this request.

The Saturday Review pronounces Dr. Bastian's Beginnings of Life the "most remarkable work which has appeared since Mr. Darwin took the scientific world by storm with his Origin of Species."

A prospectus of a new medical journal, to be called the Medical Union, and published by C. T. Hurlburt, 898 Broadway, New York, has been sent to us; and it is interesting from the standpoint of free religious principles. The four editors, Drs. Guernsey, Minor, Blumenthal, and Sumner, make this noble announcement: "We take the stand that the highest type of the medical profession is represented by those who call themselves PHYSICIANS, and that such sectarian denominations as 'allopathists,' 'homœopaths,' 'electrics,' &c., are unworthy of the members of a liberal profession. We shall claim it as the right and duty of every qualified member of the medical profession to use his own judgment as to the proper methods to be adopted for the cure of his patients; and in support of this position, we shall oppose all measures whose tendency is to restrict or prevent the freedom of medical opinion."

It is a cause of crocodilian grief to the Christian Register that certain radicals, declaring Orthodoxy to be Christianity, should profess themselves to have gone "outside" of Christianity, although they were born and bred in the unorthodox fold of Unitarianism. Many pearly tears are wasted on the occasion, and the gentle eyes of the Register are red with weeping over the vividly pictured pangs of these suffering gentlemen. Moved by commiseration for the sympathetic but superfluous wretchedness of our whilom gay contemporary, we hasten to mop its dewy cheeks. Let us for a moment imagine that the blue band of the solar spectrum represents the gloom of true-blue Orthodoxy, while the yellow band represents the natural sunlight of Free Religion. Between the two is the green band which very admirably represents the green theology of the Register. "How," pathetically sobs the Register, "can one who migrates from the green to the yellow conceive himself to have seceded from the blue? Oh! Oh!" Now (waiving exact scientific accuracy in the use of our illustration) we soothingly suggest that the aforesaid emigrant escapes from the region of mixed blue and yellow; and that perhaps he is so peculiarly constituted as to enjoy an abode in any color rather than in that intense verdancy which is the natural habitat and delight of the Register.

A WORD ABOUT THE PHOTOGRAPHS.

A gentleman wrote in a recent letter: "I think the Association discriminate against old subscribers by giving premiums only to new. I got six to eight subscribers last year, and may not be able to get a single new subscriber this year." Our friend's complaint would be entirely just, if the object of offering the premiums were anything else than to increase the subscription list. So far as desert is concerned, those staunch supporters of THE INDEX who have taken the paper from the start would unquestionably have by far the best claim to the photographs, if they were now distributed in recognition of past services rather than as an incitement to new ones. For the kind assistance rendered to the paper by the very many who have not only renewed regularly themselves, but also interested themselves in extending its circulation, it would be a pure pleasure to make the seemingly small return of a few photographs. But the aggregate cost of sending even a single one to each name now on our list would be very great,—far too great to be borne in addition to the greatly increased expenses of the enlarged paper. Very few of our old subscribers fail to renew; and there is a surprising and most gratifying heartiness in the expressions of approval, sympathy, and good will with which the letters of renewal are accompanied. There is no need of offering premiums for old subscribers; they renew because they believe in the work of THE INDEX, and want to help it on. The need exists only in the case of those who are as yet little acquainted with the paper; and it is the need alone which has made it wise to incur the heavy expense of purchasing and mailing so many thousands of photographs. Since it is impossible, therefore, to give photographs to all our old subscribers, it seems much the fairest way to treat them all alike and show favoritism to none.

It is quite safe, we are sure, to trust to the good sense and good will of our radical constituency in so plain a case as this; especially when any old subscriber can so easily obtain a complete set of the photographs and autographs by a little personal exertion. This exertion we greatly desire to secure, for the power of THE INDEX increases with every name added to the subscription list. Even when circumstances forbid this direct personal co-operation, the alternative is open of obtaining a set of photographs by simply paying in advance for three years instead of only one year. A little time in the case of those who have no money, and a little money in the case of those who have no time, will enable any old subscriber to avail himself of the premium scheme. While all this is so, is there not a misapprehension amounting even to injustice in the notion that the Association "discriminate against old subscribers?" On further reflection we believe that all will come to this conclusion; and if they will therefore take hold cheerfully to help the good cause forward by swelling the number of INDEX readers, they can greatly assist us, and obtain the photographs besides.

THE VIRTU OF BIGOTRY.

The Rev. Dr. Fowler, President of the Northwestern University, has recently preached on the "Sunday Question" to a very large congregation in the Centenary Methodist Church, in that city. The occasion of the discourse was the proposition before the Common Council to repeal the Sunday law. As is probably well known to our readers, this proposition has developed in Chicago a heat almost of volcanic intensity. But they will probably be a little startled to find that a preacher occupying so prominent a position could utter publicly such words as these with reference to the aldermen who favored a repeal of the law in question:—

"In the presence of this congregation and Almighty God, I arraign these aldermen as the murderers of the boys that shall be shot or stabbed in the next three months. If that law is repealed, my humble prayer to God is that the murdering, if it must take place, shall come to their own homes." [Applause.]

The Inter-Ocean gives the above as the exact words used by Dr. Fowler. The Detroit Post well says:—

"The painful shock which this language will occasion in every calm mind is a marked comment upon and condemnation of it. It is charity, and doubtless only justice, to ascribe this language to 'the heat of eloquence,' the speaker really not meaning all he said. For it is morally impossible to conceive of any sane man actually kneeling down and praying God that the sons of anti-Sunday law aldermen may be murdered within the next three months, if anybody is! And it is almost equally impossible to conceive that any sane man really means, if anybody is murdered by any ruffian, to arraign the anti-Sunday law aldermen as the murderers!"

Such outbursts of bitter and violent passion as the language of Dr. Fowler expresses, and the reception of it by a large and respectable audience with "applause," are surely matters that merit more than a passing mention. It is commonly claimed that the days of persecution are ended; that the spirit that leads to it is dead; that Christianity is now the guarantee of liberty and toleration and fraternal love, even towards the sceptic and the "infidel." Yet who can doubt that, if Dr. Fowler were clothed with legal power, he would unhesitatingly use it directly against the offending aldermen? Human nature does not change; the Christian gospel does not change. What the Christian gospel did in the plenitude of its power over the human mind, it will do again if it ever regains this power. What is foolishly considered by many the result of Christian influences,—the increase of freedom, the respect for individual rights, the humanitarian effort to benefit all classes regardless of their religious beliefs, and so forth,—is in fact the self-assertion of humanity as superior to the claims of the Christian system. Yet the practical power of this system is still enormous; terribly underrated because it lies in latency till events shall stir it into action. Such fuming as Dr. Fowler's is chiefly noticeable as betraying, like the light, slender, curling cloud of smoke at the peak of Mt. Ætna, that volcanic religious forces are still active in the heart even of the nineteenth century. In this aspect his spitting of venom over the "desecration of the Sabbath" may well give color and direction to much grave and earnest meditation. It shows afresh, at least to us, that unchanging causes will produce unchanging effects: that Christianity and human nature are constant factors, working to-day as they always worked; and that, just so long as they are bound up together by the bonds of "Christian faith," he is a visionary of visionaries who dreams that mankind are safe even to-day from the desolations of fanaticism, bigotry, and impassioned credulity. There is and can be no safety for a free society that is not based and grounded on unsuperstitious intelligence and universal disregard of all supernaturalism.

AN APPEAL TO LIBERALS.

The Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association would hereby make an appeal to the liberal-minded people of America to increase the membership of the Association. This appeal is made for two reasons. First, it is a point of practical importance that the names of those persons in different parts of the country who are really in sympathy with the Association should be known. That there may be co-operation in the practical work of the Association, there must be this acquaintance. Secondly, it is important that the Association should have an increase of its funds. If all the people in America who really believe in the principles of the Association were to pay into its treasury the annual fee for membership, it would doubtless have all the funds that it needs. We cannot expect this of all. But why can we not have on its roll of membership before the Annual Meeting, the 29th of next May, as many as two thousand new names? It is safe to say that this notice will be read by at least ten thousand persons. Taking the ordinary estimate of the number of readers of each copy of every newspaper that is printed, it should be read by a much larger number than that. But we will suppose that ten thousand persons will not only glance over it, but actually read it. Of these ten thousand, certainly one fifth part must be sufficiently in sympathy with the objects of the Free Religious Association, and sufficiently able peculiarly, to give it their active support, if they would only take the trouble to do so.

Friends, will not those of you who have not heretofore taken this trouble now take it? Certainly, it is but a small thing to ask of those who really believe in the Association, that they will send to it their names and Post-Office address and the One Dollar which is the fee for Annual Membership. Here is an organization to whose principles you assent; an organization which, through Conventions, Lectures, and Publications, is endeavoring to affect public opinion in America against the various evils of dogmatism, superstition, and sectarianism, and in favor of free, rational, humane, and joyous views of religion; an organization which imposes upon its members no test of speculative opinion or belief, but aims to promote through the free and better culture of human nature the highest interests of truth and virtue. Will you not give it your aid? Who will send us the two thousand new names?

It is desired also that all old members of the Association should renew their subscriptions. The old list of members was partially lost by the Boston fire; but we hope to be able to re-write all the old names. Names and remittances (whether of one dollar or a larger amount) may be sent to the Treasurer, R. P. Hallowell, 89 Commercial street, Boston, or to the undersigned, New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER,

Secretary of Free Religious Association.

The above Appeal for aid to the Free Religious Association will be received, I doubt not, with responsive sympathy by a large proportion of the readers of THE INDEX. I shall wait impatiently to hear how many names and dollars are sent to Mr. Potter by way of reply to it; and if all who send in consequence of it will please mention the fact in their letters, I venture to think that Mr. Potter will record it, and by and by tell us the sum total. The Free Religious Association, or rather the individual officers of it, have given to THE INDEX most constant and generous assistance; let us try, friends, to show that THE INDEX is not ungrateful, but that its subscribers are prompt to return one good act by another. We all believe in the Association; let us all help it now, after its severe losses by the great fire. F. E. A.

SECTS AND SECTARIANISM.

The fact of sects in religious history is to be credited with a certain value. At least, the existence of sects is not by any means the worst evil that can befall religion. Better certainly the jarring, antagonistic, and even quarrelling sects of Protestantism, than the mental stagnation and accompanying uniformity of opinion which prevail in the Church of Rome as the result of its policy of repression of free inquiry. There can be no doubt that in Protestant Christendom the principle of the right of private judgment has been the great agency in the production of the numerous sects into which Protestant Christianity is divided; and, looking at the more important of these sects, the historical order in which they have appeared represents very accurately the advance of the religious sentiment to higher truth and larger liberty. Puritans, Independents, Quakers, Methodists, Congregationalists, Baptists, Free-will Baptists, Universalists, Unitarians,—these have all contributed something of value to the general Protestant progress, and mark successive steps in the career of organized Christianity towards fuller light and freedom. Thus much must be allowed to the value of sects in religious history; and also that they serve to some extent to keep up a healthful mental agitation on religious topics, and furnish a certain stimulus to free inquiry, even when they do not directly encourage it.

It is quite customary to attach value to sects for another reason; namely, that they represent phases and aspects of belief, all standing for some portion of truth and all suited to different natural varieties of religious temperament and susceptibility. But this argument for the usefulness of sects is apt to be pushed too far; and rather confounds effect with cause. People as a general rule do not choose their religious faith by their natural temperament and habit of mind. I mean the mass of people do not. But it is chosen for them by their birth, education, and surroundings. It is the faith of their family, of their nation, of their race, and hence becomes theirs. National or ethnic temperament may have had something to do with moulding the faith; but individual disposition in a single generation very little. On the contrary, the faith has had more to do with shaping and coloring the individual temperament and habit of mind. It may be true that a certain mental temper will take naturally to Calvinism, and that people of a certain grade and mode of culture adapt themselves most readily to Catholicism. But it is quite as true that such a system as Calvinism helps produce the mental temper that is said to be adapted to it, and that the Catholic policy aims to keep people on that grade of culture which will make them docile and obedient subjects of the Papal Church.

I readily grant that all the sects and all the religions may be accomplishing some good; that a bad religion may be better, possibly, than none; but it does not therefore follow that people are by nature and temperament so adapted to a bad religion, that they would not be bettered by a better one. I might agree, for instance, that it is better for the Roman Catholics in this country to keep the religion which they have, and faithfully observe it, than for the same people to have no religion. But I do not, therefore, believe that this form of religion, and no other, is adapted to their condition and temperament; that none other could impress them with its power. They have, in fact, never had the opportunity to choose any other, and never will have the opportunity so long as the Catholic Church can hold them within the grasp of its chains. And to say that they are fitted by nature for no other kind of faith is to say in effect that they are fitted by nature for ignorance, superstition, mental darkness, in short, for remaining in a state of intellectual childhood: for that is the theory of the Catholic Church in respect to the mental condition of its members. The priest is Father; the Pope the infallible Father, highest of all; the layman is the submissive child. Dare we say that this is a form of faith which is the normal destiny of any human being who has come to man's estate?

So in respect to other sects of Christendom. Let us beware of the easy-going opinion which would give them an indefinite lease of life and full liberty to keep their present beliefs unchanged, on the ground that they all meet somebody's needs, and are doing some good. The question should be, Are they doing all the good they might do, and the highest good? And though they do meet the needs of people of certain conditions of temper and culture, are they educating the people into better conditions, so that their needs shall be continually advancing to a higher plane? To supply a demand may be useful, but to create a more intelligent demand is a much greater service. And there are some religious needs—the needs of the thoroughly Calvinistic temperament, for instance, of that gloomy nature which sees only in man a ruin, in earth a vale of tears, in religion a cross to be borne day and night with solemn face and funereal gait—there are imaginary religious needs like these which ought never to be supplied, but be left to starve to death; or, better, to be driven out of the mind, and their places filled with more healthy and cheerful occupants.

It is to be observed also that it is not the spirit of sectarianism that has produced the sects and given them such value as they have, but rather the Protestant spirit of free inquiry. The spirit of sectarianism holds them apart after they are formed, but does not form them. And while the sects, as being the product of the principle of the right of private judgment, have a certain worth, of the sectarian spirit which sustains the sects after they are organized and keeps them in hostile attitude to each other but little good can be said. So far from acting in conjunction with the spirit of free inquiry and independent judgment, it becomes their enemy. Not what is true and right, but what accords with the creed and policy of the sect and is supposed to be necessary to its maintenance and aggrandizement—this is the standard of the sectarian spirit, and this is always an evil and corrupting standard of action. Coleridge well said: "Whoever begins by loving his own sect better than Christianity, and Christianity better than truth, is apt to end by loving himself better than either." W. J. P.

THE TEST OF CHARACTER.

Rev. Richard Cecil, an eminent divine of the last century, used to say that, "if a serious and moral man were to reject Christianity and to avow his reasons for doing so, it would be a trial far more dangerous to the faith of England than all the sneers of Voltaire or the sentimentality of Rousseau." It has long been pointed out that, if this type of heretics were all that was wanted, one could find plenty of them. And this is being more and more established, even by the testimony of most unwilling witnesses.

There is, for instance, Dr. Holland, editor of Scribner's Monthly. He is, thoroughly and heartily, an Evangelical Christian. All his sympathy is with the appointed ways of the Church, as against heretics. Personally, he is a man of uncommon rectitude and conscientiousness; and he has therefore always been classed by religious radicals as an honest and upright opponent. Yet Dr. Holland it was who wrote, in a late number of his own magazine, an essay on "Sectarian Culture" that is thoroughly admirable in spirit,—making the most frank and courageous criticisms on those of his own faith and recognizing with the heartiest cordiality those who do not share it. This is the way in which he puts his points, in respect to culture:—

"We are led to this exposition by the contemplation of a notorious fact in the literary history of the time. It is a subject of sorrow among the churches of the country that the higher literature of the day is very largely the product of men and women who have little Christian faith, or none at all. Did it ever occur to these churches, or the preachers who represent them, to ask why this is the case? Why is it that these men and women have the culture that makes their productions acceptable to the world? Why is it that they, without any organized schools to help them, or organized bodies to patronize them, produce that which is read by all schools and all bodies, and are the grudgingly acknowledged leaders in literary art? There is some sufficient reason for this, and it is not a reason that redounds to the credit of the type of Christianity which prevails. It is time to look this matter squarely and candidly in the face. These men and women are not base usurpers of a sway which by any fairly-achieved right belongs to others. They rule because they have the power to rule. They prevail because of excellence. The public are not deceived by them, nor is their pre-eminence the result of accident. Either their sympathy of humanity is better, as a basis of culture and an inspirer of thought, than the sympathy of Christianity, or the sympathy of Christianity—pure and large and catholic—does not prevail among the churches. Something is wrong somewhere; and we can find that something nowhere but in the narrowing and dwarfing influence of sectarian culture."

But he does not stop with culture. He makes the same explicit admission in respect to personal character:—

"It is also not to be denied that there are styles of character and culture only indirectly formed by Christian ideas, or influenced by them, that are extremely lovable. There are men and women who have had no conscious Christian experience, whose faith is either a negative or a most indefinite quantity, who make no public profession of piety, who do not even privately count themselves among Christians in name, yet who are nevertheless among the most amiable that we know. Their courtesy, their benevolence, their thorough integrity of character, their hearty good will manifested in all society, their toleration and charity, make them universal favorites. They ignore all sects and all religious and political differences, and become social centres sometimes for the church itself. Many Christians prefer them for companions to those who are enrolled with them on church registers, and are puzzled to know why it is that they love them more than they do those who are nominally their brethren."

Of course, Dr. Holland adheres to the belief that Christian character and culture must be the highest, and will come out superior to all other types at last; yet it is an immense admission for him to make, that the children of this world may be not only wiser in their generation, but also nobler and sweeter than "the children of light." That he should make it not only proves the facts, but is creditable to his own eye-sight.

The stronghold of the established creeds is in their supposed indispensableness to good morals. The mother who still presents her child for baptism, who sends him to Sunday schools and requires of him his Scripture lessons, does it mainly that he may thereby be kept from vice and baseness. But the types of character that Dr. Holland describes were commonly produced by no such mechanism as this; nor will they be likely to apply it in their own households. How great is the astonishment, sometimes, to one coming out of a strict "Evangelical" household to one where no such rule prevails! No family prayers; no grace before meat; and yet the children trained in sweetness and self-devotion! Religion not a magic draught, to be gulped down at one swallow in some terrible revival, but a daily natural blessing—"reading over and over" (as Cicero defines it) the great lessons of truth and love! It is not strange that those who come for the first time into such families should, as Dr. Holland says, "prefer them for companions to those who are enrolled with them on church registers." I should think they would.

Yet I suppose that, in the Church or out of it, there is much the same variety of temperaments; and some one born and made of happier mould than others. The chief advantage of a training outside "the visible Church" is probably that, where there is less reliance on the catechism, there is more attention paid to the details of good manners and morals; just as that farmer puts on his bay-caps most carefully who has least faith in prayers against rain.

T. W. H.

METHODS OF REFORM. I.

The close relation that Free Religion bears to Social Reform is a sufficient guarantee that an occasional half-column of THE INDEX will not be regarded as misappropriated if devoted to a consideration of the methods adopted by recognized leaders of the various reforms now being urged upon society. I propose to refer briefly to the methods of promoting the cause of Woman Suffrage as illustrated by the Woman's Journal.

Our friends of the Journal believe that victory will come through political action, and for a year or more they have importuned political parties of all persuasions to recognize their claims. Assuming that this is the true policy, it is still questionable whether the attitude of the Journal towards the respective parties has not detracted from the moral dignity of the cause it represents, tending to remove it from the plane of righteous, religious demand, and to place it upon the level of political expediency. Independence would seem to be more effective than subservency, in the advocacy of social reform; but almost utter dependence upon the dominant party, and a resolve to support it at almost any sacrifice, have been the prominent features of the method of our friends, the editors of the Journal.

In the fall of 1871, they applied to the four political parties of Massachusetts for endorsement. Three out of the four, with more or less emphasis, rejected the application. They next interrogated gubernatorial candidates. The Democrat repudiated them; the Prohibitionist, in defiance of his party, made their cause his own; while the Labor Reformer pointed to his platform and said: "My party and I demand the ballot for woman." The Republican declined to respond. After this exhibit, the Woman's Journal threw its weight upon the side of the Republican candidate. Woman Suffrage, perhaps, was not then a political issue!

The year passed, and the Republican State Convention put a Suffrage plank into the party platform. The same convention renominated the man who had already refused to give the questions of Suffragists even "respectful consideration." Straightway the Journal became an advocate of his election, and announced that Woman Suffrage was "a Republican issue in Massachusetts." Election day arrived and the Journal's candidate, who during the canvass had manifested a consistent indifference to the "issue," was again elected governor. From the beginning of the campaign to its close, the Journal abstained from criticism of its standard-bearer. After election, came the governor's message to the legislature. Compassion, if not gratitude, would have wrung from most men, at least, a passing allusion to the new party plank, to the new issue; but our recalcitrant governor remembered to forget it. The Journal records the fact; it announces that the message of Governor Washburn does not allude to the question of Woman Suffrage; and at last, smarting under the snub administered, it tardily lays aside its political timidity, and for the first time reproaches its whilom favorite for his culpable neglect of his "unrepresented constituents."

This record, thus condensed, sufficiently indicates the method of the Woman's Journal. In a second paper I shall offer my objections to it.

R. P. H.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHING.

"I am Superintendent of the ——— Sunday School, and I teach the children the doctrines of the text books; but I believe what I do—please myself," said a certain gentleman of our acquaintance to a friend one day. The subsequent conversation developed the fact that this superintendent pleased to disbelieve very many things which the text-books taught as undoubted truths. It was no harm, only an amiable weakness at most, he thought, to teach children Bible errors. "The Bible teaches that God created the heaven and the earth in six days; and what's the use of my bothering my head to show them that the Bible is wrong and Lyell is right? The Scriptures teach that Adam and Eve were the first man and woman; and what's the use of my telling these sweet trusting children that this old story is only a fable, and hinting to them that perhaps we are descended from African apes? Though I don't believe that Jesus ever raised Lazarus from the grave after he had lain there four days; yet as half of my Sunday School teachers believe it, or half-believe it, and the picture illustrating that resurrection hangs up in the vestry, do you think I'm going to say to these teachers and pupils: 'I think that that miracle was never wrought by Jesus; that the story is one of those legendary accretions which incredulous and uncritical ages always gather around great names, and that this wonderful event is only recorded in the Fourth Gospel, and for that reason may be regarded as still more unhistorical and incredible?' Think you that I will shock my teachers and pupils by such revelations? No, sir! I teach them what I find in the text-books, and believe what I do—please myself."

We thought it a pity that this honorable superintendent did not possess a little more conscience, that, like Judas, he might have gone out and "hanged himself." Some of his creditors, we have been assured, would have lent the rope. What a noble example of honesty, sincerity, love of truth, devotion to it and self-sacrifice for it! How significant the Christmas mottoes in the vestry—"Feed my lambs!" "Stand up for Jesus!" and so forth. Let that superintendent write these mottoes there: "Feed my lambs—on falsehoods!" "Stand up for Jesus by sitting down and keeping quiet and comfortable." "Follow your Savior by saving your Sunday School from the knowledge of error and the spirit of inquiry!" "Blessed are they which are honored and rewarded as righteous, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven!" "Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set in a coal-mine cannot be hid." "Neither do men light a candle and put it in a candle-stick, but under a bushel, that it may give light to all that are in the house."

We commend these mottoes as appropriate for the Sunday Schools of all superintendents of easy conscience. Shock children! The truth never shocks them. They are ready for any story of their origin. When a little four-year old asked a sensible father of our acquaintance, "Who took care of the first baby in the world?" and the father replied that perhaps some great, good-natured, long-haired ape fed it and rocked it to sleep, the little philosopher gave no "instinctive shudder or cry of disgust" at the contemplation of a Simian nurse and the modern idea of the ascent of man, but accepted the first chapter of Darwin as readily as most children receive the first chapter of Genesis.

If the truth shocks the grown-up children, let it shock. It may be the electric current they need to bring them to their senses; and we would recommend to our publishers of Sunday School books that they run a little more risk of shocking us by telling the plain truth. In reading one of these lately, we were forcibly reminded of an observation of Lecky's, near the close of his last brilliant chapter "On Persecution." Speaking of Catholics and most Protestants accepting their opinions on authority, he says: "They are taught certain doctrines on disputed questions as if they were unquestionable truths, when they are incapable of judging, and every influence is employed to deepen the impression." The publication referred to was the first number of "Sunday School Lessons," published in Boston by the Unitarian Sunday School Society. There is much to commend in the little monthly. It contains considerable useful information on Biblical subjects and characters, arranged in a form convenient for Sunday School instruction. On the whole the work is so good that we are sorry to find any fault with it; but there is one answer to a question in the first chapter that ought not to pass unnoticed. It is this: "When were the books contained in the New Testament written?" Answer: "During the first century of the Christian era." If the writer of that answer is not ignorant of the fact that the date of the composition of several of the books of the New Testament is assigned to the second century by some of the most celebrated Biblical critics, then he is guilty of the charge which Lecky brings against the elder Christian preachers, of "teaching certain doctrines on disputed questions as if they were unquestionable truths." It is time that teachers, preachers, and publishers stopped trying to cheat the people by concealing the truth from them. Well-informed honesty would have stated the plain and simple fact that the date of the composition of several books in the New Testament is a mooted question in many minds, and differently settled in others; stated while Dr. Tischendorf thinks it is "transparently clear that our collective gospels are to be referred back at least to the beginning of the second century or the end of the first," Dr. Davidson puts the composition of the gospels, as we have them now, Matthew to the year 100, Luke to 110, Mark to 120, and John, he thinks, could not have been written before the year 150. The question before us is not which of these great authorities is nearer the truth, but, since there are so many Bible-scholars of acknowledged erudition and authority who believe many of the books of the New Testament were written in the second century rather than the first, is it not the Sunday School publisher's duty as well as the teacher's, to inform the public and the pupils of this fact? The best lesson on honesty is an example of it. Better shock people by truth than mislead and deceive them by errors. Let publishers and teachers follow the example of our English cousins. In one of their Sunday School Teacher's Manuals the publishers say (we quote second hand): "Our object throughout has been to make our Manual as popular and easy as is compatible with thoroughly sound treatment of the subject matter; but we feel most strongly that our teachers ought no longer to be put off with science a century old; and that views of Scriptural history, theology, and criticism which are considered antiquated in our studies ought not to be offered our scholars as if they still kept their place. Any gain in simplicity and ease we should consider very dearly bought at a loss of scientific accuracy or intellectual and spiritual straightforwardness. . . . The teacher must take especial care not to let his scholars suppose that the stories and legends are historically true; for, if he does, he is not only preparing for them a very painful and perhaps dangerous shock when the time comes for them to discover that they have been misled, but is acting dishonestly as well. No true reverence can be the fruit of want of honesty. No thought of consequences ought ever to interfere with speaking the truth. Teach children the truth from the first, and there will be no false beliefs for that truth to shock in after times. Silence is bad, but untruth is worse. Let every one teach what he believes, or else not teach at all."

Amen! Let American teachers heed these manly words. W. H. S.

LONDON LETTER.

PRAYING FOR RAIN—A SCEPTICAL METEOROLOGIST—THE MISSION PRAYER DAY—THE UN-GRATEFUL HEATHEN—A PRIME MINISTER ON PANTHEISM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—The religious world seem determined that the adversaries of Christianity shall not be idle. On every side they are laying themselves open to attack, and we have enough to do to keep pace with our opportunities.

We have, as you know, been deluged with rain for some months past, and considerable damage has been done to property by the floods consequent thereon. It is also quite on the cards that our next year's harvest may suffer through the exceptional flow of waters. In this emergency the Archbishop of Canterbury calls upon the clergy to read the comical prayer "For fair weather," which stands in the Prayer Book; and His Grace is surprised to hear that many clergymen had not done so without his bidding. The prayer is so funny that I must ask leave to insert it here at length for the benefit of those who have never heard it:—

"O Almighty Lord God, who for the sin of man didst once drown all the world, except eight persons, and afterward of thy great mercy didst promise never to destroy it so again! We humbly beseech thee that, although we for our iniquities have worthily deserved a plague of rain and waters, yet upon our true repentance thou wilt send us such weather, as that we may receive the fruit of the earth in due season; and learn both by thy punishment to amend our lives, and for thy clemency to give thee praise and glory; through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen."

It would seem as if, emboldened by the recent discovery of a Chaldean record of a great flood, our bishops take perfect delight in making the people repeat their belief in the Noachian Deluge. The assumptions of this prayer are not less remarkable. It is assumed that the great rains are a calamity, and not a blessing. It is assumed that they are sent by an angry God in vengeance for our sins. It is assumed that we deserve such a calamity. It is assumed that our repentance will move the Almighty to leave off raining! Fortunately for us, the meteorologists of this century have not wrought in vain, and one of them has come forward in a letter to the Times to assure the Archbishop that the deluge is a great blessing; that we wanted every drop of rain that has fallen, and that we want even more still to supply the deeper wells which have run nearly dry, owing to the scanty rains of the previous five years.

Away like a vapor before the morning sun, flies all this ridiculous fuss before the magic wand of modern science. The meteorologist has spoilt all the prayers for "Fair Weather," has made a lot of shivering saints (or sinners) feel that, after all, they have not been so very wicked, and that God is not angry with this portion of mankind whom he has made so wet, and has given them for a moment a little gleam of hope that the Creator knows what he is about and knows what is best even for our future harvests. Surely this is a great gain. But what astounding folly it seems to us in this age to be carrying out into practice the lowest and most absurd aspect of prayer which the human mind ever entertained! How few are the steps, if any, which remove us from the condition of mere savages!

We had, too, a great day of Prayer for Missions; but, as Mr. Conway is sure to have written to you upon that topic, I will say little about it. To me, it is a grand confession of failure, so revolting that I have no words of scorn to cast at the ceremony. It is a matter of profound satisfaction that even "the heathen" are too wide awake to take up with another religion about as superstitious as their own. The Jew, of course, is incorruptible, except in those rare cases of money-worship which are to be found in every race. The Mahometan is impervious to the doctrine of the Trinity. The Hindu traces too keenly the likeness between his own legends and those of the Christian; only he contrasts the nine incarnations of Vishnu with the one incarnation of Christ, and mutters, with a shrug of his shoulders, "Is that all? Deficient in sympathy!"

Negroes, for the most part, can be converted to any religion over and over again. It is exquisite fun to them to be manipulated by a priest or bishop, and to be under the pleasant excitement of divine mysteries. But that kind of success has its drawbacks, and even missionary zeal is disappointed at finding the most solemn subjects welcomed with a grin of childish mirth.

Well! so far as this praying for missionaries goes, I think it is a very good and hopeful sign that they are not forthcoming; and they are not forthcoming because the missionary work is a failure.

I enclose for your use (ad lib.) a clever letter written by a Shropshire rector, the Rev. J. D. La Touche, on this subject, which you may like to print in your paper.

The Mission-Prayer-Day was scarcely passed, when our Prime Minister entered the lists, and lectured the young men at Liverpool College on the subject of Pantheism.

Like Lord Hathaway, Mr. Gladstone is a dabbler in theology, and has written a work on the Church. The aim of his magnificent speech (that part of it which touched on religion) was to point out the practical identity between pantheism and atheism; then to insinuate that all free inquiry would lead to atheism; and therefore the only safeguard was in "holding fast to the faith once delivered to the saints," which included, as its "cardinal and central truths," the "Deity and Incarnation of our Blessed Lord."

Our "pride and perverseness" is keeping us from believing all the old wives' fables of antiquity, and we are "responsible to God for our belief."

You can imagine the large area thus exposed to the shafts of the adversary.

My space is exhausted, but by the next week I shall have sent you a copy of my sermon upon this celebrated Oration of Mr. Gladstone's. I was besieged by friends requesting me to preach upon it. You will see that we have plenty of work prepared for us by the champions of Christianity.

I am, sir, very sincerely yours.

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE,
DULWICH, S. E., Dec. 30, 1872.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

THERE WERE NO SPARE SEATS at Horticultural Hall last Sunday afternoon. The audience was largely composed of young people. This is a new feature of a radical meeting. Unlike Professor Pepper, Col. Higginson had no "ghost scene" in reserve for the end, by which to hold his audience fast; yet only two or three left before they were dismissed. The lecture being on "The Progress and Perils of Free Thought," it may have attracted some to whom this "open secret" has not been revealed. I was told, in fact, that a large number of Orthodox people were present. But the fair spirit of the discourse must have commended itself to all. Is Col. Higginson quite right, however, in lecturing the Orthodox world because it does not now, as in former times, persecute the heretical world? He seems to regard this as an Orthodox duty. What is the burning of a few thousand bodies, to the loss of souls? He would have Christian believers take free-thinking in hand, and kill it out as they would the small-pox or any other terrible disease, since to them it is or should be the very worst evil known. This he thinks would show sincerity, consistency, courage, and a true love of souls. But the reply might be made, and I think with good reason: "Sir, you cannot goad us into further trial of persecution. We have done that enough. It works badly for us, and will for heresy. We shall not do you so great a favor." They are evidently trying to profit by experience, hoping that, if they let the evil severely alone, it will die out of itself, having only "the husks of negation" to feed upon. The blood of heretics is the seed of free thought. Heresy-burners take the contagion in their own clothes, and carry it back into the camp of the faithful. History has thrown great light upon this fact, and it is pretty clearly seen now-a-days and understood. So I see how Orthodoxy may sincerely believe that not to persecute is a wiser and better method for these times than its opposite would be. A question recently discussed at Hospitalier Hall ran as follows: "Resolved that free discussion is the death of infidelity." Is that not taking the bull by the horns? I admit that this resolve may have come from a foolishly brave Christian; and, if he have brains enough, he will be pretty sure to get gored. And yet, wiser Orthodox heads are not unfrequently drawn into such freaks of herolam. The more prudent and popular way, however, is to keep mum. But Col. H. anticipates a time not far distant when the danger to the old faith will be so great that its adherents will jump from mumness into an activity of speech and deed quite unpleasant for all radical people not desirous of martyrdom. Well—"Sufficient unto the hour is the evil thereof." Let the emancipation of mind proceed. We will harbor no fear.

MR. ALGER SUMS UP Napoleon III. as "a conspicuous and terrible impostor;" and the Christian Register says that "the description ought to be inscribed on his tombstone." I heard Mr. Alger's discourse, and I could but wonder if history would not repudiate his estimate of the man as a caricature. There seems to be a mania for black pen-pictures. "Here now we have a veritable devil; let us hasten to draw our picture and our moral lesson." The man, indeed, may be no saint; but can you account for his whole career on the principle that he is pure devil? As regards Napoleon, I notice that he had friends and supporters who were eminent in intelligence and well stocked, it would seem, in moral qualities. This may prove nothing; but it shows that he was variously estimated, just as public men are with us, by clever, well-disposed people. With us, however, there is much in a name. His empire, so far as I can judge, was no more founded in blood than the present so-called Republic. And as for liberal institutions, France was never more arbitrarily governed than by the self-constituted authorities now holding governmental reins. Yet we look upon France and rejoice as though she had already escaped the ills of "personal government." I am no imperialist, but I do not like to be deluded by a mere name; neither am I over-zealous for a formal republicanism. Napoleon should have the privilege of judgment formed from a European stand-point. If we Americans cannot in some sort take our position there, our view will hardly be a true and right one. But—The Emperor is dead. "Vive la France!"

MR. ALGER, IN THE BEGINNING of his discourse, spoke with great force of the idea of providential men, saying that, though some were more conspicuous, every man's life was in point of fact providential; the serfs as much so as the emperor's. Reflecting upon his characterization of Napoleon as a "terrible failure," and upon the solemn fact that no man liveth up to the ideal; that in all history there has appeared, according to popular belief, only one "Son of God,"—I marvel as to the meaning of the term "providential," as applied to all men. To speak in the same breath of "providential men," and of "men who were failures," launches an open question, and the mind strives for a solution.

THERE ARE AT LEAST TWO WAYS of looking at the world. Whether people are born endowed with all liberty to perfect themselves according to ideal saintliness; or whether they fit into the time, linked with the past and allied to the future, living not unto themselves alone, but inevitably exhibiting the variety of features which the world in its process of evolution prescribes for their day and time. If the first supposition be true, then indeed is the history of man on the earth a very melancholy one. Failure upon failure; wilful, perverse, and altogether astounding. The "long suffering of heaven" would be a surprising reality, and "mercy" have a significance beyond human comprehension. But if the order of providence be that of evolution, then the shortcomings of mankind—ignorance, evil, sin, wretchedness—are natural attendants on progress; and wisdom, virtue, happiness, are not to be despaired of. This thought is reassuring, while the other suggests suicide, and the extinguishment of the globe. The ideal is revealed by lights and shades: and the picture, let us hope, is improved on with the progress of the ages. Failure is swallowed up in new success. And success again is swallowed by success.

BUT IS IT NOT PRESUMING a greater wisdom than is ours, to undertake to measure individuals with the exactness common in our time? Is the man so many feet in his stockings, so many inches in girth? Well, can you say what he is good for as there he stands? Do you know how he fits into his place? After all, isn't it as well to keep more intimate company with ideas, and not let their "representatives" bother us so much? It is to be hoped that the advance of our evolution lies in the direction of a departure from this inquisitorial mood, and acute self-consciousness. Absorption in Brahma may be the bliss the Jaded Western world will yet sigh for, and be ready also to die for.

I SHALL HAVE TO RECONSIDER my favorable opinion of modern preaching, its liberal and rational tendency, if the man I unwillingly listened to recently in Dr. Kirk's church is a true specimen of any considerable class who are each Lord's day dispensing the old Gospel,—a Gospel preached, as he said, very extensively, not only fifty years but eighteen hundred years ago. He would grant for the time being that hell was not a place of brimstone on fire, but the condition of each man's conscience, with memory evermore bringing before him every thought, act, opportunity of his earth-life. The everlasting regret—remorse that would overwhelm him when it was too late to seek or effect a change, hope being lost to him forever—would constitute a punishment fearful enough. He pictured the lost soul in this agony of despair, and dwelt upon many of the things it would have to regret. It would remember, for instance, how, instead of being thankful for the Sabbath and improving its blessed privileges of worship and church-going, the day was valued chiefly as an occasion for rising late, and for eating hearty meals. Again, perhaps memory would haunt the lost sinner with the spectre of himself attending divine service only in the morning, wasting the rest of the precious one-seventh of his time in visiting or reading secular literature. What effect the preacher was producing upon the more elderly and quiet people below, I could not say; but at this point I could but notice that certain young people not far from my seat in the rear of the church were intently devouring our secular Sunday Herald! The whole sermon was very dismal, closing with some poetry telling of the line that runs "between God's mercy and his wrath." And the opening sentence of the prayer that followed—"O Lord, we are fearfully and wonderfully made"—seemed calculated to put one's nerves well upon their mettle. Summing up the whole subject, one is disposed to ask: "If in Hades memory is so active and produces such regrets and remorse, how would it affect our life in heaven? Shall we not remember everything there as well? And will no cause for regret or remorse appear there? Or will everything of this sort be swamped in the 'unspeakable joy' of our assured salvation?" In that world of woes souls will be smitten with a terrible remorse that can never die, according to this preacher. I think the spectacle far more sublime, far more to be regarded with satisfaction, than that of a soul saved and rejoicing in glory, when, perchance, some victim of its evil word or deed, spoken or done ere its acceptance of salvation in the earth-life, is punishing eternally in the pit of misery. But the difficulty is all got over if you let your this-world and next-world blend into each other, with the chance of repentance there as here. Then the soul, striving to do well in the future, will be competent to effect restitution as a happy sequel to its own salvation. It may rejoice in being able to undo and make amends for the old injuries it had done, for the "wrath of God" will not stop in dooming souls to endless pain.

SALVATION.

Into a pit
He dugged deep,
His foe to fit.
The hater felt,
In his own hell
Nor joy nor sleep.

The foe drew near;
"Quick me dispatch,
Let me die here,"
Quoth the poor man.
"A better plan
I think I catch,"

The foe replied:
"I will thee lend
A rope, fast tied
To a good arm,
Nor offer harm;
Be thou my friend!"

By the laws of Maryland, a marriage in that State is valid only when performed by a "minister of the Gospel, ordained according to the rites and ceremonies of his or her Church, or in such manner as is used and practised by the society of people called Quakers." The result of this enactment is, that Maryland Jews are obliged to begin their wedding trips without the usual ceremonies, and get married somewhere outside the State. They are naturally restive under such an absurdly unjust law, and are moving to obtain its repeal. Strangely enough, they meet with much opposition. Here is a chance for Congressional interference. If it is within the sphere of Congressional duty to forbid the refusal of rooms in hotels, and seats in churches, and graves in cemeteries to any one on account of color, it is certainly within its sphere to forbid the refusal of honorable marriage to any one on account of religious belief. Let the next Civil Rights bill guard the interests of Hebrews as well as negroes.

Literary Department.

NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS.—All books designed for review in these columns must be addressed to THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

RECEIVED.

THE BLAZING STAR: with an Appendix treating of the Jewish Kabballa. Also a Tract on the Philosophy of Mr. Herbert Spencer, and one on New England Transcendentalism. By WILLIAM B. GREENE. Boston: A. WILLIAMS & Co. 1872.

TREATISE ON THE FIVE SENSES. By JOHN STOLTZ, M.D., Practising Physician and Surgeon, Lecturer on Physiology, Myology, Mental Training, etc. Chicago: EVENING POST PRINTING HOUSE. 1872.

DEFICIENCY IN THE SUPPLY OF MISSIONARIES. Shrewsbury: The HATOPIAN OFFICE, Pride Hill, [England.] 1872.

REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE VOYSEY ESTABLISHMENT FUND. Dec. 3, 1872.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. February, 1873. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. $4.00.

THE GALAXY. February, 1873. New York: SHELTON & Co., 677 Broadway. $4.00.

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE. February, 1873. Philadelphia: J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. $4.00.

THE PENN MONTHLY. January, 1873. Philadelphia: 500 Walnut Street. $2.50.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. February, 1873. New York: S. R. WELLS. $2.00.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE. February, 1873. Newburgh, N. Y.: S. B. WOOD & Co. $1.00.

THE MICHIGAN FREEMASON. December, 1872. Kalamazoo, Mich.: LILLING BROTHERS. $2.00.

UEBER NATIONALE ERZIEHUNG. VOM VERFASSEN DER "BRIEFE UEBER BERLINER ERZIEHUNG." (Concerning National Education. By the Author of "Letters Concerning Education in Berlin.") Leipzig, 1872. 8vo. pp. viii, 231.

DER RELIGIONSUNTERRICHT IN DEUTSCHLANDS SCHULEN. SEINE FEHLER UND SEINE VERBESSERUNG. EIN MAHNruf AN DAS DEUTSCHE VOLK, SEINE LENKER UND LEHRER. VON FRITZ SCHULTZE, DR. PHIL. (Religious Instruction in the Schools of Germany; its Defects and its Improvement. An Admonition to the German People, its Rulers and Teachers. By Fritz Schultze, Ph. D.) Jena, 1872. 8vo. pp. 80.

A remarkably lively discussion has sprung up of late in Germany, concerning the question of religious instruction in the public schools. There is a growing conviction among the more intelligent, and especially among teachers, that the present system of religious training has outlived its usefulness. It is becoming more and more apparent that it is indefensible in theory and pernicious in its results. The feeling in regard to it is one of great uneasiness, a feeling that something must be done about it, and in general great uncertainty as to what ought to be done. The utterances that have thus far gone forth in regard to it are most of them of exceedingly "uncertain sound." Very few have proposed radical remedies for the existing evil, and these few are not agreed as to which of the possible radical remedies ought to be resorted to. The anonymous author of the first of the above works, for instance, is decidedly of the opinion that for the present all religious instruction must be abolished. No other solution of the difficulty seems to him possible. He thinks that the system of public instruction will be imperfect without it, but despairs of all attempts to make it, under the present circumstances, what it ought to be. "To whom shall we, in these days, trust this difficult and delicate task?" he exclaims.

"To those Protestant and Catholic Jesuits who, on the one hand, seek to compel Science to submit again to the authority of the Church and to silly interpretations of the Bible,—on the other, hurl the mockery of the dogma of infallibility in the face of mankind in the nineteenth century,—and on both hands, subject the power of the State and the whole of civil life to their despotic commands? Or to those Orthodox zealots, those youthful Hotspurs, who by an act of will have imposed eternal silence upon their own rational thought (which they call 'taking reason captive through faith'), and at the same time by their zeal for so-called purity of doctrine, have filled their hearts with conceit and hardened them to the point of an intolerance that delights in persecution? Or to those liberal fanatics, who have been brought by the mere accident of birth or by other circumstances, into the party of opposition, and who in their way have an equally strong desire to burn those of opposite religious opinions as heretics? Or to those imaginative, poetical enthusiasts whom, indeed, the chlorotic mildness of their whole character prevents from assuming the role of fanatics, but who, in their unconquerable aversion to clear ideas and consecutive thinking, dream that they are making children more pious the more confusion and nebulous emotional humbug they crowd into their minds? Or, finally, shall we trust it even to those who themselves already possess a purer religious sentiment and also labor, so far as they are able, that a noble, free, spiritual view of religious matters, in harmony with philosophy and with all science, may break a path for itself and gain a foothold, and yet on the other hand, are always pouring this new wine into the old bottles either of untenable theories or of the traditional and official language of the pulpit, and this, too, when they must see that the best labor for fifty years past has on this very account had such comparatively little effect, and that the nation, despairing of its instructors, has for this reason principally, made so little progress in the domain of religious culture?"

It will be readily seen from the foregoing why the author deems it necessary to dispense with religious instruction in the public school, at least provisionally. Dr. Schultze is of a different opinion. He is also convinced of the necessity of such instruction to a perfect educational system. He is also uncompromisingly opposed to the present method of imparting it, and in the course of his little work gives facts enough to show that his opposition is not without reason. But he believes in the possibility of reform, and of a reform that shall be radical. During the earlier years of school he would exclude all theological teaching whatever as beyond the child's powers of comprehension. This excludes all reading either of the Bible or of any of the educational manuals of Sacred History. The first religious instruction should consist in the imparting of an elementary knowledge of the laws of nature and morals. Morals should be taught independently of all religious dogmas and of all theology, in order that moral principles may rest upon their own foundation and not lean for support upon any opinion that may be shaken in the child's later development. This is no new suggestion in the rough, on the part of the author. He goes on to specify very carefully and definitely how such instruction may be given. Want of space, however, forbids us to enter upon a more detailed description of his method. When, by the aid of instruction concerning nature, "the theoretical understanding" has been sufficiently developed, and by means of instruction in morals "the practical understanding" is also sufficiently ripe, that is to say, when the permanent nucleus of all religion, the true religious disposition, has been formed, then, and not till then, begins the instruction in theology. It is a matter of course with the author that this can not be dogmatical; it must be historical. The history of the development of religion must be taught, not merely of the Christian, but of all religions, so far as our knowledge reaches. The effect of such teaching upon the ingenious minds of children is finely delineated. They will learn how the consciousness of God has manifested itself among the most diverse people, now in nobler, now in meaner form, and also that this consciousness everywhere comes to view and is not the prerogative of any race. They will thus learn which is the highest and noblest, i. e., relatively the truest, conception of God, and that to this alone they must hold fast. They will grow spiritually and morally by such instruction, not only acquiring knowledge of men, but learning to love them.

The value of the Bible as a means of religious instruction in schools Dr. Schultze very thoroughly discusses, treating the subject from various points of view, intellectual, moral, theological, and pedagogical. Many of the so-called stories of the Bible, of which such general use is made in the teaching of children, he subjects to a very searching analysis from a moral point of view. The point having been recently raised whether a teacher with any self-respect would consent to take a school so hampered in its regulations that she could not use "the story of Joseph" in illustration, this notice shall conclude with a translation of Dr. Schultze's remarks in regard to that story. In his opinion the moral lesson of it must be wholly rejected. His analysis is as follows:—

"Jacob has twelve sons, one of whom is dearer to him than all the others. This one, Joseph, is treated with distinction and receives a coat of many colors. His brothers envy him and can not speak peaceably unto him! Joseph makes them still more hostile to him by relating two dreams to them. According to one of them they were binding sheaves, and the eleven sheaves of his brethren made obelisk to the sheaf of Joseph. The brothers think that he means by this to indicate his future dominion over them, and they 'hate him yet the more.' In the second dream, the sun, the moon, and eleven stars made obelisk to him. Now the father also gets angry and rebukes him. This story contains very little that is typical to a child. What shall a child say when it hears that a father prefers one child to the rest; when it hears how the brothers of Joseph hate him on account of it and do not speak a peaceable word to him! The preference which the father gives to Joseph could, at least, only be understood and approved by the child if actions were reported of him by which he had really excelled them. But this is by no means the case; the partiality of the father appears to be wholly arbitrary. For the reason which the Bible gives (Gen. xxxvii. 3): 'Israel loved Joseph more than all his children, because he was the son of his old age'—is neither moral or intelligible to the child.

"Besides the partiality of the father, and the not very commendable discord of the brothers there is in this story another trait which ought to be altogether wanting in a model narration. This is the superstition in regard to the infallibility of dreams, such as is found, indeed, among all barbarous nations. Joseph's dreams are taken for infallible omens of a future perilous reality, for otherwise the excitement of the brothers and the father would be unnecessary. But how, now, is a teacher to act towards a child which asks whether dreams really 'come true,' and why Israel and the brethren didn't laugh at them just as father and mother at home laugh at children's dreams? Shall the teacher confess the truth or promote superstition? The brothers resolve to kill Joseph. Kill him! Can a child, even of the most uneducated parents in our country comprehend how anybody can commit a murder merely on account of a dream and a coat! They do not murder him; they sell him. Sell him? the child will exclaim with an air of incredulity. Sell a human being! What an enormous chasm between our social and political relations and those of the ancient Hebrews, between the moral ideas of our children and of those Orientals! And yet the teacher is even expected, if possible, to laud those ancient times, in which men were so good that God himself made them personal visits.

"Furthermore: can the child, on the basis of its home-training, be expected to comprehend how the brothers could deceive their aged father and cause him the greatest sorrow by sending to him Joseph's bloody coat? Even Reuben and Judah, whom one might be inclined to hold up as models—do they not also finally join in the conspiracy? Joseph is taken to Egypt and sold to Potiphar. The latter, perceiving that God is with Joseph, makes him overseer-general, and God is thereby caused to bless the Egyptian's house 'for Joseph's sake,' so that 'the blessing of the Lord was upon all that he had in the house and in the field.' Now comes the attempt at seduction, which remains altogether incomprehensible to the child and which is intentionally obscured by the teacher. But the mind of the child must be completely bewildered when it learns that Potiphar, who was in the first instance so quick to discover that God was with Joseph, has now not the slightest notion of Joseph's innocence, but throws him into prison without further ceremony. When now the child asks: 'Why does not God protect Joseph? shall the answer be: 'It is necessary for God not to do this, for the reason that from Joseph's misfortune proceeds his later elevation?' So we are to regard mankind as the playthings of God! What a moral God he must be! And what is the cause of Joseph's elevation? His skill in the interpretation of dreams. Even though Joseph says that he does not do it himself, but God through him, this is a prevarication worthy of a juggling dream-interpreter. The dreams are afterwards fulfilled. But even before this happens, the king is fully convinced of the truth of the interpretation and without further ado makes Joseph the ruler of the country. Seven years Joseph lives full of prosperity and happiness; he marries and children are born to him. Then follow the 'seven years of famine.' Famine breaks out in Canaan also, and Jacob is compelled to send his sons (with the exception of Benjamin) to Egypt to buy corn from the store-houses. Joseph recognizes his brothers at once, but not they him. Nor does he reveal himself to them, but calls them spies and thrusts them into prison for three days. Then he releases them with the command that they go and bring their youngest brother, Benjamin. He retains Simeon as security, and with brotherly love causes him to be bound and kept in prison. The brethren reach home, find their money in their sacks, and inform their father of Joseph's demand. Jacob cries out full of sorrow: 'Joseph is not, Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away; everything is against me.' After long entreaty and after the brothers had declared that they would not go without him, the aged father lets Benjamin go with his brothers into Egypt. Joseph receives them kindly, entertains them, and causes five times as much food to be given to Benjamin as to the rest, as he discriminates in his favor generally. Still Joseph does not reveal himself. After hiding his cup in Benjamin's sack, he suffers them to depart, but soon sends his steward after them to accuse them of theft. The brothers, conscious of their innocence, offer to have their sacks searched. The cup is found in Benjamin's, and in great sorrow they return to the city. Joseph is about to retain Benjamin as a punishment, but when Judah describes the sorrow of their father, he no longer refrains from revealing himself. His first question is: 'Doth my father still live?'

"The story of Joseph generally ends [in the manuals for religious instruction in schools] with the removal of Jacob from Canaan to the land of Goshen, which has been apportioned to the Israelites by Joseph. An intelligent child from one of our families will not be able to understand how a son, who has attained to the highest posts of honor, can so completely forget his parents and brethren as Joseph did. Seven prosperous years pass away; Joseph marries and is blessed with children—he sends no news at all to his parents. Only when his brothers come does he remember them. He does not merely play tricks upon them, he treats them cruelly. He keeps Simeon in prison while he sends the rest of them after Benjamin. His aged father might have died of old age or of grief over the demands of the stern man in Egypt. A teacher informs me that in his experience it has occurred more than once, that children have inquired: 'Why did not Joseph write to his parents at once? Or why did he not send for them immediately, instead of letting them suffer so long from hunger? What makes him prefer Benjamin to all the others?' Can the true reason be explained to the child; namely, that Joseph and Benjamin were the sons of one mother, Rachel, while the other ten were the sons of three other wives—in a word, can that polygamy which is at the bottom of all this be explained to the child? And why is not the mother mentioned? Why is it that Joseph does not concern himself at all about her? This is also a point which seems strange to children. Can the matrimonial relations of that period, the low position of woman, be made clear to the child without materially offending its far more cultivated moral sentiment?"

"In brief, the story of Joseph, which describes a condition of things that is morally far beneath our present views, can not possibly have any value as an ideal for our children. Joseph is not a pattern, he is not a moral hero who can be held up to children for imitation. He does nothing with his own power; God does everything for him. Why? Has he special merit? No; he is a mere favorite! The Bible relates much more concerning him, which affords an insight into his true character, but which is prudently omitted from the biblical histories for schools. The Egyptians are on the point of famishing. They have already given all their money to Joseph for food. He now compels them to part with their cattle. When they have nothing left but their land, he also takes this from them. Of the people themselves he makes serfs, and their fields become Pharaoh's. The people being now in his power, he distributes them over the country according to his pleasure. But what of that; he is still a moral man, a pattern for everybody; for he keeps friends with the priesthood—their fields he does not touch. How beautiful and how profoundly moral is the lesson which this one verse contains: 'Only the land of the priests bought he not!'"

T. V.

THOUGHTS FOR THE TIMES. Sermons by the Rev. H. R. Haweis, M. A., Incumbent of St. James', Westmoreland Street, Marylebone, London, Author of "Music and Morals," etc. New York: Holt & Williams. 1872.

This is a volume especially worthy the reading of radicals of all sorts, partly because there is so much capital radicalism in it, in a great many of its statements of fact and faith, and partly because the author is so perfectly free and candid, charitable and modest, when he is not extremely radical. He holds some things which extreme radicals have rejected; but he holds them as mere opinions of his own, confessing that he may be in error, and that more radical opinions may be correct. He is not afraid to look at, to fairly state, and to show respect to, any honest beliefs that are going in the world, whether he accepts them or not. His mind is as free from superstition as a June sky from cobwebs. He pointedly and good-naturedly rebukes the vices of Orthodoxy, which are legion; thus introducing a great deal of capital criticism into his book. He never hides a fact; never stops with half disclosing a new truth; but always makes a clean breast of all that he knows, and of the extent of his not knowing. He gets out of a world of false Orthodox pretences by candidly saying that as for himself he does not know anything whatever on these heads and does not mean to pretend, or to let his hearers assume for him, a knowledge which he does not at all possess. There is no end of letting down of Orthodoxy in the course of the volume. The structure of popular faith is taken all to pieces, and the materials laid flat on the ground. Now and then some part of these materials is declared worth saving, or at least worth seeing further about. He thinks a few of the old timbers will answer to use again; but the reader sees that he is not very anxious about even these, and would just as soon get new material throughout, if that should prove the better way. There is the least possible damage from the axe and the fire in the treatment the old building thus gets. You see that a good deal of old stuff is quietly laid aside to be burned, and that a good deal not yet designated to that fate will be cord-wood before it is timber again; but at present no conflagration is attempted. This makes a peculiarly useful book for people who are getting out of the old faith, or have recently got out of it. Possibly a hard-shell barnburner, who wants to see the old rookery of Orthodoxy reduced instantly to ashes, would not appreciate Mr. Haweis's moderate method, and would fail to see how thorough and how useful to average common people it is. But most readers, who have become radical without ceasing to have religious feeling, and who have a kindly recollection of what was once very sacred to them, will greatly enjoy the clever good sense and character with which the old faith is taken apart, and the pieces laid here and there with

"Don't know about that," "That may do again perhaps," "Looks like pretty bad dry rot in that," and "Punk, punk, there, nothing but punk and worms." The radical zealot may be sorry that no bonfire has filled the heavens with smoke, but none the less, and in fact all the more, will others see that the clear heaven has not fallen with the rafters of Orthodoxy. The next thing will come naturally—the conviction that no great harm would be done if every stick were used for kindling wood.

The topics which Mr. Haweis treats in his fourteen discourses are, "The Liberal Clergy," "The Idea of God," "The Science of God," "The Character of Christianity," "The Ethics of Christianity," "The Essence of the Bible," "The 'Doctrine' of the Bible," "Predestination, and 'The Church,'" "The Lord's Day," "Preaching," "Pleasure," "Sacrifice," and "The Law of Progress." The last sentence of the first of these sermons is this: "If, then, forgetting for one moment our morbid horror of nicknames, we are asked, 'What is Rationalism?' let us answer: Rationalism is reverence for all that is true and good in the past, thankfulness for every advancement in knowledge, willing acceptance of all the new revelations of science, and a belief in the infinite possibilities of the human soul. In three words, Rationalism means Infinite Sincerity, Infinite Aspiration, and Infinite Faith." In the fourth sermon appears this statement: "In these days thought is so rapid and many-sided that a man is unwise who pretends to make up his mind about everything upon which he is called to give an opinion. When I know very little about a thing, I say I know very little about it; and when I am in doubt about things which are fiercely discussed upon other platforms, I say I am in doubt about them; and when I know nothing at all about them, I say so. Of course this makes my teaching, such as it is, very unsatisfactory to those who want to know all about everything. There are numbers of clergymen in every sect and party who can supply that information, but I do not profess to be one of them. There are, perhaps, few who really prefer 'the malady of thought' to 'the deep slumber of a decided opinion.' Yet I will cast in my lot with these." In discoursing of the Bible Mr. Haweis expresses such sentiments as these: "The writers of the Bible were but men, and although in many cases they were highly inspired men, yet they were not any the more infallible for that. The Bible is not all God's book, nor the only book of God. God has many books. To some extent, the sacred books of all nations are his.

The Reformation is accountable for the survival and popularity of this doctrine of verbal inspiration, alias infallibility,—a doctrine which would have certainly expired along with Popery, had it not been found necessary to set up an infallible book in order to overturn an infallible pope." In the eighth sermon is this thrust at a very weak spot of Orthodoxy: "It is a strange thing to say with reference to the Christian religion, but it is a true thing, that it presents in its development—perhaps more than any other religion—the most abnormal indifference to truth. . . . Never was a time when there were so many religious sects in England, in Europe, in America; and yet, there is, for all that, a great neglect of the first principles of fair argument, the first principles of truth. That tendency dates far back from the very early days of the faith. In the first century there were numbers of lying biographies of Christ, and to these biographies St. Luke alludes. The first three centuries were full of myths about Christ and his disciples; as time went on, more and more fables were accumulated, and began to circle round the saints and bishops, till at last Rome found herself in possession of a vast mythology, which, like every other mythology, had some little substratum of truth in it; and then came one great reaction in favor of truth at the time of the Reformation, on which we have been living complacently ever since; and in our complacency we have once more grown as indifferent to truth as ever, and once more the voices of a new Reformation are sounding in our ears; and the sleepers will have to awake from the deep slumber of their decided opinions. But still they prefer their dream, they are closing their eyes to what they call the new and misleading lights of the age; they refuse to hear the truth when it interferes with their preconceived notions of religion; they won't let it interfere with their comfort; they won't let it interfere with their interests; they won't let it interfere with their settled opinions. Ah! There is nothing so stolid or immovable as opinions that have lived too long." At the end of his volume Mr. Haweis has put a sermon on his friend and teacher, the Broad Church theologian and preacher, Rev. F. D. Maurice, recently deceased. He ascribes Mr. Maurice's power to the fact that he united two things which are frequently separated in our day, the love of truth and enthusiasm for religion. It is in having both of these things that Mr. Haweis himself is most interesting and most useful.

E. C. T.

Religious ideas are evanescent—they rise and fall with the march of intellect.

Do to-day thy nearest duty.—Goethe.

PHILOSOPHICAL PAPERS.

V.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

THE MECHANIST AND VITALIST THEORIES.

FROM AN ARTICLE ON "PHILOSOPHICAL BIOLOGY," IN
THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW,
FOR OCTOBER, 1888.

The great questions of biology, considered in its philosophical aspect, are three: What is the origin of life in the first instance? What is the origin of species or the different forms of life? What are the causes of organic evolution in general? To each of these three questions two answers are given. Life is said to originate in the first instance either by natural evolution or by supernatural interposition in the course of Nature. Species are said to originate either by gradual transitions from one form to another or by the periodical introduction of absolutely new and underived forms. These unlike answers to the first two questions spring from unlike hypotheses. If consistent with itself, the development hypothesis attributes the origin of life in the first instance, and the origin of species or the various forms of life, to a natural and gradual process, while the hypothesis of special creations attributes both to supernatural volitional acts. The former epitomizes the history of the individual and of the species alike in the one word evolution (with its correlate, dissolution); the latter admits evolution in the individual, but denies it in the species, without, however, substituting anything intelligible in its place. Each hypothesis, therefore, admitting evolution as a fact more or less universal, is confronted by a third question; namely, What are the causes of organic evolution? To this third question many answers are given, which fall, nevertheless, into two general classes. The one class finds the causes of organic evolution solely in the direct or indirect action of cosmical forces external to the organism; the other class, fully recognizing the action of these external forces, finds a concurrent cause in forces which manifest themselves in the organism alone, and are therefore irreducible to known cosmical forces. Hence among biologists two great tendencies exist, which find expression in what may be designated as the mechanist and the vitalist theories. It is the recognition of the speciality of vital phenomena, as not accounted for solely by mechanical or physico-chemical causes, and not by any means the fanciful speculations respecting the unknown causes of these phenomena in which some vitalists indulge, that constitutes the essence of the vitalist theory; and it is the negation of this speciality which distinguishes the mechanist theory from it. The vitalist theory includes the mechanist theory, with the exception of this negation, affirming its affirmations, but denying its denials.

If we now inquire what relation the mechanist and vitalist theories bear to the development and special-creation theories, we find a curious reversal of natural affinities. The vitalist and special-creation theories are sometimes found associated in the supposed interest of dogmatic theology; while the mechanist and development theories are sometimes found associated in the opposite interest. But, philosophically, the vitalist theory is most closely allied to the development theory, and the mechanist theory to the theory of special creations. Regarding the evolution of the universe as a gradual change from homogeneity to heterogeneity, produced by natural forces which are at bottom diverse manifestations of a single inscrutable force, the spirit of the development theory, at least as generalized by Mr. Spencer, would seem to require the recognition of mechanical, physical, chemical, biological, psychological, sociological, and moral phenomena, as an ascending series of dynamical facts, which are reducible to unity, not by denying the essential diversity of the facts themselves, and thus ignoring the law of the series, but rather by tracing those connections of the facts which constitute them a series. If the cosmos is evolved as a universal whole by an immanent force, and not by a force operating ab extra, then, unless the law of evolution changes, those organized beings which exist in the cosmos as partial wholes must also be evolved by immanent forces. To place the primary cause of organic evolution outside the organism is a conception precisely analogous to the conception of a creator outside the universe,—a conception which Mr. Spencer, at least, repudiates. The spirit of the development theory manifestly allies it with the vitalist rather than with the mechanist theory. In like manner, the spirit of the special-creation theory, which regards the universe as originated by a First Cause external to the universe, not immanent in it, and which imagines each newly created species to have been in some way fashioned out of plastic materials and then vivified from without by foreign influences, would seem to be identical with the spirit of the mechanist theory, which regards the organism as only a living machine, created by the direct and indirect action of external forces alone. The special-creationist, it is true, attributes to the creative power both intelligence and will, and maintains the origination of life to be due to miraculous intervention in the course of Nature,—an assumption which the biological mechanist declines to make. But, regarding the organism as either supernaturally created or naturally evolved by external power, both look at it as practically a manufactured machine, and the resemblance is greater than the difference. Hence, we repeat, the mechanist theory is less closely allied to the development theory than to the theory of special creations, while the vitalist theory, maintaining the natural evolution of life by the reciprocal play of external and internal forces whose manifestations cannot be classified together, alone appears to harmonize with the spirit of the development theory.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errors.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

A LETTER FROM MR. TUTTLE.

TO THE INDEX:—

In the constant meddling with State affairs, the gradual union of Church-forces, and the persistent efforts of Jesuitical schemes to make religion a corner-stone of our government, I have observed what, it seemed to me, must sooner or later culminate in a grand onslaught on the civil rights of liberals. But it did not for a moment occur to me that the attack would begin on the other side, or that a liberal, not content to be let alone for the hour, would have the hardihood to carry the war into Carthage.

Most heartily do I endorse your "Demands," and regard them as not only a declaration of rights, but of war. No longer is each reformer to wage a single-handed conflict in guerrilla fashion, but a systematic, well-ordered assault is to be made on superstition, entrenched behind moss-gray creeds and proud shrines reared by ignorance and cunning. It was said in days that are past, "A negro has no rights a white man is bound to respect;" and it has been repeated, and is at present current, that free-thinkers have no rights Churchmen are bound to respect. If they have not, theirs is the fault, and still more in the future, if they do not emphasize these demands with such strength as shall cause them to be granted, every one.

This issue is of vital consequence to every lover of liberty, whatever may be his private belief. It is a re-assertion of the fundamental doctrine of our free government. Although we may differ in our understanding of Spiritualism, here we stand on the same ground, and make common cause; and you will find Spiritualism one of your strongest and most invincible allies.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

CLEVELAND, O.

NOW IS THE TIME.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—The following is from the Chicago Advance of January 9:—

"We cannot, therefore, judge as yet what the future will develop. If leading scientists shall continue to verge more and more towards materialism and infidelity, and shall train students and prepare text-books to propagate those views; and if the politicians (who generally care nothing for religious interests) shall place men of such principles in the professional chairs of the State universities and in charge of our high schools,—then a conflict must come which will shake the system to its foundation. And sooner or later the decision must be made judicially and at the ballot box, whether our accepted civilization, on which our schools and our laws are based, is or is not distinctively Christian."

The Advance represents the most advanced type of "Simon Pure" Orthodoxy. It accepts the results of modern science so far as it can, consistently with a fixed belief in the infallibility of the Bible, and the Deity, and authority of Christ. It is opposed to the Christian Amendment and the Bible in schools. Yet, while it is with us on these questions in a certain way, who can doubt as to where we shall find it when the supreme question is to be discussed and determined—"whether our accepted civilization is, or is not, distinctively Christian?" In the above extract we see the final drift and determination of popular Christianity. It foresees and is preparing for a tremendous, and perhaps successful, struggle to put our civilization, judicially and by the ballot box, upon a distinctively Christian basis; and it is from those who are apparently with us on the Bible in schools and Christian Amendment questions that, in the final crisis, we shall meet the most bitter and dangerous opposition. You have not sounded the alarm one whit too soon. Liberals must organize, and show their united strength and determination. It will be the saddest thing in all human history if our American civilization, with its splendid possibilities, is hemmed in and retarded and finally corrupted by being put upon a distinctively Christian basis, and by having an immense superstition and tyranny wrought into its organic law. I would not oppose one's individual Christianity; I would not lay rude hands on any sacred and heart-felt belief. But when a vast Church despotism is to be imposed upon our free growth, then I am ready for the struggle to the bitter end. The Orthodox foresee the crash, and shall we not foresee it? Our better vision of God and humanity is given us that we may put it to some practical use. It must not be an individual luxury, but a universal benefit. Christianity is aggressive in support of a non-progressive idea. Shall we be idle when we have that which thrills our souls with supreme hope for mankind? We are not to dream this thing out, to trust it to the mere stream of tendency. It is to be decided, not by the poetic fancies of our imagination, but, as the Advance says, "judicially and at the ballot box." In my opinion, there is plenty of hard work before us.

Truly yours,

S. P. PUTNAM.

NORTH PLATTE, Neb.

MUSTERING.

WELLESLEY, Mass., Jan. 20, 1873.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

My Dear Sir:—With all my heart I second your call for the immediate organization of the friends of Liberalism in opposition to the efforts now being made to secure the Christian Amendment. The movement is one that for some time past I have felt must be inaugurated soon, if we would not see the light of religious liberty darkened into the night of religious intolerance.

You have no doubt seen the exceedingly interesting review of your "Demands of Liberalism," by Louise M. Thurston, in the Boston Commonwealth of the 18th inst. But does the author of that review know that it is not against the Christianity that "minds its own business" that these "Demands" are urged, but against the Christianity that forever encroaches upon the rights and privileges of the individual soul? I trust none of us have any desire to "wipe out all trace of its" (Christianity's) "history." We have abundant need of all the light the history of the past can give us. But we do protest against the effort to permit Christianity to repeat its own history. We know too well that the greed of bigotry knows no limit. With the history of the dark ages before us, it were a crime to look listlessly on while a fierce religious fanaticism defiantly announces its design to abrogate the guarantees of American liberty, and dictate the channels of human thought.

The American Liberal Tract Society proposes to organize at once on a basis similar to the one you propose, and you have probably seen that a like effort on the part of the Liberals of Boston is urged through the columns of the Boston Investigator. That the intelligence of the country is opposed to this measure, traitorous as it is to the very genius of our government, there can be little doubt; but, in the warfare at the ballot box toward which we are now tending with ever increasing speed, we shall need numbers no less than intelligence. In order to obtain these, our people must be led to think, to study the nature of the controversy in which they will shortly, whether willingly or unwillingly, find themselves inextricably involved. This can only be done by stating as clearly and as plainly as possible the multiplied arguments against this effort to renew that peculiar tyranny which is the legitimate offspring of Church and State, and which in its turn becomes the parent of every conceivable form of oppression. There is no need for "Free Thought" to "turn aside from its rightful path that follows after truth to fight battles with Christianity." Christianity is aggressive; and its present effort is a menace to Free Thought. Let it be permitted to entrench itself behind the Christian Amendment as a part and parcel of the national compact, and where are we? That the American people would long suffer it to remain there, I do not believe; but to cast it out, when once secured such a place, would arouse more bitterness by far (even if it should not lead to a religious war, from the frightful horrors of which we may well seek to save our country) than can ever be engendered by timely efforts to prevent its becoming so entrenched.

But pardon me for detaining you so long. I only add that for every honorable effort to prevent the success of this measure,

I am yours most faithfully,

ELIZABETH M. F. DESTON.

A QUALIFICATION.

I think we shall have a Liberal League here I should myself like your programme better if it contained a qualification of the first article exempting from taxation, say, $3,000 of the assessed value of any building used regularly, but not exclusively, for public worship. Our little country churches sometimes do good service as places for literary and temperance lectures, concerts, singing-schools and philanthropic meetings.

F. M. HOLLAND.

BARABOO, Wis., Jan. 17, 1873.

A Prize of One Thousand Dollars.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—
Three questions have arisen in the practice of life insurance of great interest to the public:—

1. How to ascertain the proper commissions to be paid to agents, if they are paid.

2. How to assess the office or working expenses, including commissions, on the members of mutual companies.

3. How to ascertain the equitable surrender-value of a policy.

A new system, called—for want of a better name—"savings-bank life insurance," was presented by me to life insurance companies and the public about one year ago, which answers all these questions in a way radically different from that heretofore practised by any company.

The old system and the new cannot both be right. Compared with each other, on these three points, one of them is probably wholly wrong and indefensible, while the other is an approximation to the right thing.

If the new system accords with science and reason; if it is in the main and in principle just and equitable in regard to the points above named,—then the old one violates equity in regard to every one of them, and on some of the policies issued falls little if any short of obtaining money by false pretences.

There is no problem of social science more worthy of thorough discussion than this.

In the interest of policy holders, present and future, and to stimulate inquiry, always better late than never, into the possibility of improvement, I offer A PRIZE OF ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS to the writer who will first demonstrate that the old method of answering either of the three questions above is more correct, reasonable, and equitable than that given by the "Savings Bank Insurance" system proposed by me. This prize will be paid to the writer who first, within one year from this date, presents his or her demonstration to me, in print, with the certificate either of Professor Benjamin Pierce of the United States Coast Survey, or of Professor William H. C. Bartlett, Actuary of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, that in his opinion such demonstration is conclusive. And, in that case, either or both of these gentlemen shall be duly compensated by me for the trouble either or both of them may have taken in the matter.

Editors—especially aged ones who know me when I was an editor—are respectfully requested, as a personal favor, to give this an insertion. The younger ones will perhaps do it for the love they bear their own families and the public.

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

29 State street, Boston, Jan. 13, 1873.

A quaint Scotch minister was given somewhat to exaggeration in the pulpit. His clerk reminded him of its ill effects upon the congregation. He replied that he was not aware of it, and wished the clerk, the next time he did it, to give a cough by way of hint.

Soon after he was describing Samson's tying the foxes' tails together. He said, "Foxes in those days were much larger than ours, and they had tails twenty feet long."

"A-bem!" came from the clerk's desk. "That is," continued the preacher, "according to their measurement; but by our way they were fifteen feet long."

"A-bem!" louder than before.

"But as you may think this extravagant, we'll just say they were ten feet!"

"A-bem! A-bem!" still more vigorous. The parson leaned over the pulpit, and taking his finger at the clerk, said:—

"You may cough there all night long, now, I'll see take off a foot more. Would you have the foxes wild and teels at a?"

Rev Mr. Sanderson, a Baptist minister at Rome, Tenn., after praying and reading his text on a recent Sabbath, suddenly dropped dead in the pulpit. A similar death occurred in the same church ten years ago. What moral are we to draw from this?—Boston Globe.

The Boston Post thinks the Christian Milk Association of that city will prove failure. Likely enough. The trouble is, it possesses too much "Christian" and a little "milk."—N. Y. Commercial.

"Ye are the children of the devil," was a text of a divine in the morning; and the afternoon he said, "Children, obey your parents."

NOW READY!

THE BOUND INDEX FOR 1872
(VOLUME III).

In addition to many other attractions, it contains the full course of free religious lectures delivered at Horticultural Hall, Boston, last winter, which were published in full numbers else. A limited number only for sale. Price $2.50, and 72 cents postage. If postage is not prepaid by the purchaser, the volume will be sent by express at his expense. Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

Cultured Free Thought.

The Index Association,

With its Principal Office at No. 142, St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO, and Branch Office at No. 36, Day Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,
A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society. It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. BALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, London, England.
Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, Weston super Mare, England.
Rev. M. D. CONWAY, London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Professor MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America,—that such a journal should have been started and powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany, though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large."

Essays, lectures, and other papers of a thoughtful and liberal character; editorial articles; foreign and domestic correspondence; book reviews and notices; communications, selections, and other miscellaneous matter; in short, whatever can best promote the general cause to which THE INDEX is devoted will be found regularly in its columns.

Also, a highly interesting RATIONALISTIC STORY, entitled "PAUL GOWER," is now appearing serially in THE INDEX, and will run during the year.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial. All MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS must be addressed to

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 13) will be sent postpaid on receipt of eight cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word.") "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. Abbot; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. Abbot; "The Vision of Heaven," by Prof. F. W. Newman. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete Course of Ten Index for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

THE RICHEST MEN IN AMERICA are no more happy than those who earn their own living, and who read the PERENOLGICAL JOURNAL, published at $3 a year by S. R. WELLS, 589 Broadway, N. Y.

A FINE RADICAL ROMANCE!

TO BE PUBLISHED

SERIALLY

IN

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

WE ARE HAPPY TO ANNOUNCE that we have secured for publication in THE INDEX a most excellent novel, entitled

PAUL GOWER:

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

For the present the author desires to withhold his name. But he is well known in literary circles as a writer for the best English and American magazines. Of another story written by him Mr. JAMES PARTON says: "I consider it a master-piece of narrative." Mr. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, who was so kind as to read "PAUL GOWER" in manuscript with special reference to its publication in THE INDEX, permits us to publish the following:—

"I have looked over Mr. Gower's novel, and think it would be an attractive feature in THE INDEX. It is very strong, and I found it very interesting. The story is remarkably well told; the characters are firmly drawn; and the religious tone of it will suit the paper well. The style is nervous and simple; the incident is varied; the development is natural. The writer has put a vast deal of thought into it, and spent great labor on it with admirable effect. My judgment may be at fault, but I think it would adorn THE INDEX. It will divide well as a serial, which will be an advantage."

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAP.

1.—An Old Lady and Gentleman of the Old School.

2.—News from the United States.

3.—A Lover's Quarrel.

4.—Family Antecedents.

5.—Poor Relations.

6.—Mr. Bligh receives three Morning Calls.

7.—Is spent in Mr. Bligh's Office.

8.—A Shabby-Genteel Family.

9.—Mr. Daniel Pennorthorne.

10.—Harry Franklin.

11.—"Never Overtaking and always Pursuing."

12.—A Catastrophe.

13.—Locked-out for the Night.

14.—In which divers Persons call on each other without invitation or introduction.

15.—Sickness and Convalescence.

16.—Father Franklin.

17.—Contains Explanations and Confidences.

18.—Concludes with a Street Row at the Door of Mr. James Maberley.

19.—Involves a Meeting and a Departure.

20.—In which Richard Sabin talks like a Heathen.

21.—"That nasty, deceitful Clergyman who behaved so badly to poor, dear Ruth."

22.—"My Native Land, Good Night!"

23.—Epistolary and Maritime.

24.—Is mainly in Praise of New York City and Americans in General.

25.—Paul's Father.

26.—Transpires in or near Nassau Street.

27.—More New Faces.

28.—Is Conversational and Valedictory.

29.—The Christening of a Comic Paper.

30.—A New York Boarding-House.

31.—Paul's Letters.

32.—In which Dick Sabin returns to New York City and is seen by Somebody who has hereafter a Great Deal to do with Him.

33.—Wherein Richard Sabin lays down a Square of Hell's Pavement.

34.—"The Porcupine."

35.—In which Paul Gower and Richard Sabin amuse themselves.

36.—A short Chapter introducing a very long one.

37.—A Young Man's Theological Experiences.

38.—Consequences.

39.—A Descent into Bohemia.

40.—More of the same Subject.

41.—In which we talk about the Fourth Estate of New York City.

42.—"At Plaff's."

43.—The Reverend Jim Scobell.

44.—"The Cornucopia."

45.—"One More Unfortunate."

46.—In which the Story progresses for about Six Months.

47.—A Little Adventure.

48.—Injured Innocence.

49.—"Lead us not into Temptation."

50.—Just what might have been Expected.

51.—What People said about it; and an item of News concerning the Fugitives.

CHAP.

52.—In which Paul sets out for a larger amount of Travel than he intended, and visits some Old Friends.

53.—A Canadian Idyll.

54.—Wherein we journey from the North to nearly the most Southern of the United States.

55.—More Southern Experiences: a Look at New Orleans; and a sudden change of Programme.

56.—A Return and a Disappointment.

57.—The Contents of which ought to surprise nobody.

58.—In which Paul hears more News of Old Friends of an Unratisfactory Character.

59.—Wherein Paul Gower and the Rev. George Bligh smoke a cigar together.

60.—Accompanies Paul to London and describes his Doings in that Metropolis.

61.—Is a Continuation of Chapter 60.

62.—Contains an Accident and some Conversation.

63.—Treats of the Vicarage and Farm-house; and of the Machinations of a Wicked Woman.

64.—Shows that a Pliable Disposition may be wrought upon to Good as well as Evil Purposes.

65.—Which only those Readers who have some knowledge of Human Nature will think at all Truthful or Probable.

66.—Wherein we get rid of Mrs. Franklin for Good and All.

67.—In which the Engagement between Ruth Gower and the Rev. George Bligh comes to a perfectly natural conclusion.

68.—Contains various matters, Reflective, Rural, and Metropolitian, and concludes at Southampton.

69.—New York again. And what Paul did and heard there.

70.—A "Cut Direct" and other Experiences, too various for particularization.

71.—Is as Desultory as the one preceding it, and therefore introduced without Specification.

72.—More Boarding-House and Bohemian Details; the latter involving their own Moral.

73.—A Loving Heart, self-portrayed; and News from England.

74.—A Character: the re-appearance of a Scoundrel, and still more of Journalism.

75.—Another Return and a new Enterprise. Characterized on an Historical Occasion.

76.—In which a former Acquaintance takes Paul into his confidence concerning his Domestic Infelicity.

77.—Might have had the same Title as Chapter 76.

78.—More talk of Secession, and the sequel of Richard Sabin's Catastrophe.

79.—A Companion-Picture to what we have seen in Charleston, but on a larger Scale.

80.—Clears the way for the Next and Last.

81.—In which John Gower's Misfortune and the Story come to an End together.

Whoever desires to possess all the numbers of THE INDEX containing this novel should subscribe at once, beginning his subscription with the year. Send $3.00 for the FOURTH VOLUME OF THE INDEX.

Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE COMMONWEALTH

LIFE INS. CO. GENTLEMEN of standing and ability (either in professional or mercantile pursuits) are desired in all parts of the country to represent this reliable company. Our plans of Insurance are simple, popular, and honest.
Address 178 Broadway, NEW YORK.

REAL ESTATE,

In all parts of the U. S.,

RAILROAD AND OTHER STOCKS,

Also

MERCHANDISE OF ALL KINDS,

Bought, sold, and exchanged.

All wishing to sell, or who desire to procure bargains, will find it to their interest to apply to

S. T. POMEROY,
No. 3, Park Place, New York City.

ASA K. BUTTS,

Manufacturer's Agent, Broker and Dealer in

Domestic Cotton Goods

CORDAGE, &C.,

111 Worth Street, New York.

Refers to

JOHN M. CONWAY, New York,
O. W. BUCKINGHAM, "
C. A. WORTENDIKE, Godwitsville, N. J.
PEARSON BROS & Co., Boston,
FINLEY & SCHLICHTER, Philadelphia.

THE

BUTLER HEALTH LIFT.

LEWIS G. JAMES, MANAGER.

Principal Office—New York,

Park Bank Building, 214 Broadway.

ALSO,

BROOKLYN, 138 REMSEN STREET.

"This kind of exertion not only increases muscular power but refreshes exhausted nervous energy."—H. D. NOYES, M. D., Professor in Bellevue Medical College.

Apparatus for private use of the most perfect construction, and at the most reasonable prices. Refer to Rev. O. B. Frothingham, Rev. Dr. Bartol, D. S. Rogers, and many others.

Visitors Always Welcome.

"The Greatest Luxury in the World."

TURKISH BATHS.

63 COLUMBIA HEIGHTS, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Three minutes' walk from Fulton Ferry.

A series of these Baths will relieve, if not cure, nearly every form of disease. The beauty and simplicity of their action consists in the perfect adaptability, either mild or powerful, of this method of treatment to each and every case. It cleanses the body, purifies the blood, and equalizes the circulation, thus arousing dormant functions, and restoring the highest measure of health possible to the individual.

Unnumerable references can be given to cases cured by the Bath, and the proprietor will freely advise with those who desire any information regarding its proper use.

First-class rooms and board at moderate prices.

CHARLES H. SHEPARD, M. D.

A GREAT OFFER! HOLIDAYS!

HORACE WATERS, 481 BROADWAY, N. Y., will dispose of 100 Planos, Melodeons, and Organs, of three first-class makers, including Waters, at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during the HOLIDAYS. New 7-octave first-class Planos, modern improvements, for $275 cash. The Concerto Parlor Organs are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Price, for 8 stops, $185, 10 stops, $225 and $250 cash. Other Organs and Melodeons for $45 and upwards for cash. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S NEW BOOK.

The Religion of Humanity,

By O. B. Frothingham. Contents.—I. Tendencies; II. God; III. Bible; IV. Christ; V. Atonement; VI. Power of Moral Inspiration; VII. Providence; VIII. Moral Ideal; IX. Immortality; X. Education of Conscience; XI. The Soul of Good in Evil; XII. The Soul of Truth in Error.

One vol., 12 mo., $1.50. Sent free on receipt of price.

DAVID G. FRANCIS, Publisher,
17 Astor Place, New York.

HERALD OF HEALTH

FOR 1873.

(Three Numbers of 1872 Free to New Subscribers.)

READ WHAT IS SAID BY THE PRESS.

The N. Y. Evening Post says: "We can always commend this Journal without qualification."

"It contains," says the Scientific American, "more sensible articles than any other magazine that comes to our sanctum."

A SPLENDID CHROMO,

WORTH $10.00,

Given free to every subscriber. It is an original picture of

A BEAUTIFUL GIRL,

Beautiful in form and face, on a mission of love to the cottage of a poor family. She stands with her supplies of good things knocking at the door, clad in a handsome costume, with a face expressive of the highest qualities the heart possesses, the perfect picture of health and beauty. This chromo is handsomely colored

IN TEN COLORS,

AND

WILL PLEASE AND DELIGHT

all who possess it.

Every Home Should Have One.

It will give daily pleasure, and be a constant lesson of good to every one who looks on it.

Send your subscription for next year at once, and thus obtain the picture to exhibit to others when you are forming a club, and three numbers of 1873 free.

The January number contains a remarkable paper on the

CONDUCT OF LIFE,

written 346 years before Christ by Isocrates, and well worthy the attention of every liberal thinker. The February number will contain a well written article entitled,

The Physiology and Hygiene of Marriage.

The March number will contain an Essay entitled,

Do Mothers Mark their Children?

It is the aim of the publishers to make their Journal thoroughly useful and fill it with the productions of sound writers.

In short, the Herald for one year contains matter enough to make eight or ten dollar and a-half books, and yet it is sent with a picture worth $10 for the small price of $2.00.

The Herald for 1873 will be

RICH AND ROYAL

With the very best matter from the best writers, and each number will be worth the full subscription price—

$2.00 a Year

(12 cents extra for postage on premium). We will send the Herald of Health, with its splendid Chromo, and any $1.50 magazine, or paper, with their premiums, post-paid, for $3.25. The Herald of Health and its Chromo, and any $1 magazine, for $5.12, or the Herald and Chromo, and New York Times or Tribune, for $3.50.

Agents wanted. Liberal commissions given. Address

WOOD & HOLBROOK,
15 Knight St., New York.

THE BABCOCK

FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against Fire."

SURE, SIMPLE, SELF-ACTING.

Used by the Fire Departments of the principal cities of the Union.

F. W. FARWELL, Secretary,
407 Broadway, New York.

Over Twelve Hundred Actual Fires put out with it.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,
25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents Wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than in anything else. Particulars Free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Me.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS

for the

GREAT INDUSTRIES

Of the UNITED STATES; an historical summary of the origin, growth, and perfection of the chief industrial arts of this country. 1,300 PAGES, and 500 ENGRAVINGS. WRITTEN BY 20 EMINENT AUTHORS, including John B. Gough, Leon Case, Edward Howland, Jos. B. Lyman, Rev. E. Edwin Hall, Horace Greeley, Philip Ripley, Albert Brisbane, F. B. Perkins, etc., etc.

*This work is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufacture, etc., in all ages. It is a complete encyclopedia of arts and manufactures, and is the most entertaining and valuable work of information on subjects of general interest ever offered to the public. It is adapted to the wants of the Merchant, Manufacturer, Mechanic, Farmer, Student, and Inventor, and sells to both old and young of all classes. The book is sold by agents, who are making large sales in all parts of the country. It is offered at the low price of $3.50, and is the cheapest book ever sold by subscription. No family should be without a copy. We want Agents in every town of the United States, and no Agent can fail to do well with this book. Our terms are liberal. We give our agents the exclusive right of territory. One of our agents sold 123 copies in eight days; another sold 368 in two weeks. Our agent in Hartford sold 297 in one week. Specimens of the work sent to agents on receipt of stamp. For circulars and terms to agents address the publishers,

J. B. BURE & HYDE,
Hartford, Conn.,
CHICAGO, ILL., or CINCINNATI, OHIO.

GEO. E. BROWN, Late Cashier Toledo Savings Institution.
WM. A. FAUNCE, Late with Henry S. Stebbins.

BROWN & FAUNCE, BOOKSELLERS,

STATIONERS,

AND DEALERS IN

Window and Wall Papers,

(Successors to Henry S. Stebbins.)

115 SUMMIT STREET, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Keep constantly on hand a fine stock of standard and current literature, embracing books upon Science, Art, and Religion, and are in receipt of new books from publishers as fast as issued. Books sent by mail post-paid on receipt of publishers' price, and promptly ordered when not in stock.

Out-of-date and rare books furnished when procurable in this country or in England. Orders by mail solicited.

ROBERT WALLIN,

No. 463 North Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., keeps on hand a variety of LITERAL BOOKS and PAPERS—THE INDEX, and Index Tracts; also, an assortment of Stationery.

YOUR WIFE OR YOUR SWEET-HEART would thank you for a beautiful lady's gold watch; good time-keeper. Why not make her a present of one? A few subscribers for the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, at $2 each; for SCIENCE OF HEALTH, at $2 each, will secure one from the makers through S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

GOOD FOOD AND GOOD FUEL are indispensable to health and comfort. Good reading matter instructs and improves the mind. All leading magazines and newspapers are clubbed with the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, at $2, and the SCIENCE OF HEALTH, at $2, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BRYANT & BENTLEY,

Manufacturing Jewelers. Rings a specialty. 335 patterns hard solder rings, stamped and warranted 16 carats fine. 18 carat Bracelets, Cameos, Coral, Roman, and engraved sets; Masonic Jewelry, &c. No. 12 Maiden Lane, New York (up stairs).

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy. Published Quarterly in St. Louis, Mo. It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription;

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents.

Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in monthly, will be sent post-paid by mail for $3.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V., in music, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,
Box 2396, St. Louis, Mo.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH.

The first volume having been sustained beyond expectation, the Publishers are prepared with additional facilities for making the next volume respond more fully to the popular demand for an independent HEALTH MONITOR. Ample arrangements have been made to render each department a welcome and instructive visitant to the reader, and educate the people in all that relates to PRESERVING AND RECOVERING HEALTH.

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH will not be the organ of any person, business, or institution, but an independent, earnest Teacher of the LAWS OF LIFE AND HEALTH; the exponent of all known means by which HEALTH, STRENGTH, and LONG LIFE may be attained, by using and regulating those agencies which are vitally related to HEALTH and the treatment of DISEASES on strictly hygienic principles.

TERMS.—$2.00 a year; Single numbers, 30 cents; ten copies, $15.00, and an extra copy to agent. Please address S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, New York.

NEW TRACTS!

INTENDED TO TEACH RELIGION WITHOUT SUPERSTITION.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 5.

SECOND SERIES.....No. 21 to No. 25.

Either Series, 30 cents; Both, 50 cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,

19 FISK STREET, Boston.

Hall's Magic Shade Fixtures!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the Window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing Perfect Ventilation, Good Light, and at the same time Complete Privacy in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for Inside Blinds. Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY,
145 SOUTH CLINTON ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

GUNS FOR THE PEOPLE

Breach-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $300; Double-Barrel Shot-Guns, $25 to $150. Single Guns, $25 to $200. Breach-loading and Repetizing Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers, $6 to $25. Pistols, 75c. to $5. Gun material, fixtures, and ammunition of every kind very cheap. See Stamp for Large Illustrated and Descriptive Price-List to GREAT WESTERN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Samuel Johnson's Works on I

dis. Sent on receipt of price—$3.00.

Address S. H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

Send to same address for Catalogue of other scientific and religious works.

THE RADICAL

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

F. J. SCOTT, J. H. STOPPI

ARCHITECTS,

73 MADISON STREET (Near Boody Ho) TOLEDO, OHIO.

KELLER, SAITER, & CO

Manufacturers of RICH JEWELRY. 8 CANOE street a specialty. Office, 13 Maiden Factory, Bleeker St., cor. Bowery, New York.

A TREASURE—NOT TRASH.

PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, for 1873, contains just such information relating to 'culture,' as every individual, old and young, ought to read. It is only $3 a year.

WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

YOUNG MEN AND YOUNG WO

What they would know what they are going to do, what they can do best, should read the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. A new volume with Jan. No., and may be ordered at once S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

Published by the Index Association at No. 142,
St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio, with Branch
Office at No. 86, Dey Street, New York City.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. F. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.
M. D. CONWAY, England.

THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A new LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MONSIE, late editor of the RADICAL, whose EVENING NOTES will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 36, Dey Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. F. DRAKMAN, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order.

Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 86, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A UNIQUE PREMIUM.

Photographs and Autographs

OF

LEADING WRITERS

OF

THE INDEX.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

W. J. POTTER.

W. H. SPENCER.

F. W. NEWMAN.

CHAS. VOYSEY.

A. W. STEVENS.

F. E. ABBOT.

☞ The PHOTOGRAPH of any ONE of the above-named persons will be mailed post-paid to any NEW subscriber who shall remit $3.00 for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

☞ To any one who shall send a list of names of from one to eight NEW subscribers and $5.00 for each, a corresponding number of Photographs shall be mailed post-paid, to be given to these subscribers; and the same number of Photographs shall also be mailed, post paid, as premium to the sender himself.

☞ To any one who shall send $5.00 for three years' subscription to THE INDEX in advance, a full set of the Photographs shall be mailed post-paid.

☞ None of the above Photographs will be sent, unless specially requested and unless a choice is made from the list.

☞ The Autograph of each of the above American writers will in all cases accompany the corresponding Photograph; but no Autograph can be sent with the Photograph of the English writers.

☞ These Photographs are well executed, are not on sale anywhere, and can be obtained in no other way. In offering them as premiums, the INDEX ASSOCIATION rely on the good will and active co-operation of all friends of THE INDEX.

☞ All orders for Photographs and remittances of money should be addressed to
THE INDEX,
DRAWER 86, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A SYNOPSIS

PAUL GOWER,

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a Story of English and American Life; the localization being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York Journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not in-curious.

It is, also, in the very warp and woof of it, as heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potential with the uninquiring and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfillment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, didactically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is emphatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, Wm. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 30 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 8, 1873.

WHOLE No. 163.

ORGANIZE!

LIBERALS OF AMERICA!

The hour for action has arrived. The cause of freedom calls upon us to combine our strength, our zeal, our efforts. These are

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Let us boldly and with high purpose meet the duty of the hour. I submit to you the following

FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperiled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF —.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in —:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

Liberals! I pledge to you my undivided sympathies and most vigorous co-operation, both in THE INDEX and out of it, in this work of local and national organization. Let us begin at once to lay the foundations of a great national party of freedom, which shall demand the entire secularization of our municipal, state, and national government. Send to me promptly the list of officers of every Liberal League that may be formed, and a standing list of all such Leagues shall be kept in THE INDEX. Rouse, then, to the great work of freeing America from the usurpations of the Church! Make this continent from ocean to ocean sacred to human liberty! Prove that you are worthy descendants of those whose wisdom and patriotism gave us a Constitution untainted with superstition! Shake off your slumbers, and break the chains to which you have too long tamely submitted!

Toledo, O., Jan. 1, 1873.

FRANCIS M. ABBOT.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1873.

THE PROGRESS AND PERILS OF FREE THOUGHT.

BY THOS. WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.

SECOND LECTURE IN THE COURSE OF SIX "SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES," GIVEN IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, JANUARY 12, 1873.

It was said by one of the ablest religious writers of the last century—Rev. Richard Cecil—that if a single, serious, and moral man were to reject Christianity and to avow his reasons for doing so, it would be a trial far more dangerous to the faith of England than all the sneers of Voltaire or the sentimentality of Rousseau. The danger which good Mr. Cecil thought impossible has now come to pass. The men who impeach Christianity or renounce the name are not now the dissolute and reckless, but men of character and culture. This we know, not through their own assertions, but by the admission of those who defend the faith. Mr. Ruskin says that so utter is the infidelity of Europe, no statesman would dare, in defending a measure before Parliament or the Corps Legislatif, to quote from the Bible in support of his position. At the last annual meeting of the "Christian Evidence Society" in London, Lord Salisbury, the chairman, said that "the intense importance of the prevalent unbelief pressed itself on the minds of thoughtful Christians, and acquired new weight every day." They were standing in one of the most awful crises through which the intellect of Christendom had ever passed. They could point to many distinguished intellects from which all that belief had gone, in which until now the highest minds coincided." Lord Shaftesbury, following him, said that "bishops, deans, men of science, the greatest minds in literature, all avowed infidel principles. It was difficult, in fact, to find a man under the age of forty who would confess to a belief in anything at all." This refers to the cultivated classes in England. Of the uncultivated, the same Lord Shaftesbury said lately that, "of the whole mass of the working population of London, not two in a hundred go to any place of public worship."

Turning to America, we find an eminent Christian layman, Dr. J. G. Holland, calling the attention of his fellow Christians to the fact that the highest culture and the most lovable character are now more often to be sought outside the Church. We find the most influential newspaper in the world, perhaps, the New York Independent, met Mr. Abbot's "Demands of Liberalism," not with hostility, but with the assertions that the demands were superfluous, and the Independent had urged them all before. And Rev. Dr. Newman of Washington, lately keeper of the conscience of the national Senate, and now of President Grant's, made lately the following prediction, according to a Washington newspaper:—

"Within the next decade, ay, within the next five years, Christianity will be tried as it has never been tried before. There are men in England and America to-day who will bring to the assault a ripeness of scholarship, a power of intellect, and a breadth of view unequalled by the past. These assaults will continue, and there are men and women before me to-night who are destined to have their faith terribly shaken."

It is a strange thing to note, that this progress has not been made by help of favorable circumstances. Radicalism, now as always, is poor. Why should a rich man be a radical, and how can a free-thinker expect to be rich? There is in the Church no lack of riches. Her tract societies are so wealthy that the only difficulty is how to spend the money given by dying sinners for the spread of their theological opinions. Being no want of wealth, there is no lack of what wealth can always buy—the preaching of the Gospel, any gospel. In a certain sense, sincerity is to be purchased. There are numbers of young men in the Society of Jesuits and in all societies who have been trained by the pressure of a costly organization to preach doctrines which, if left to themselves, their souls would have abhorred. We are living in a period like that described in the story of St. Thomas Aquinas. A great prelate once showed him several great basins full of ducats, and said to him: "Look here, Master Thomas, now can the Church no more say, as St. Peter said, 'Silver and gold have I not.'" "That is true," replied the saint. "Neither can she say what immediately follows, 'In the name of Jesus Christ, stand up and walk!'"

And as it is not for want of wealth that the Church loses hold, so it certainly is not for the want of preaching. The more sermons heard, it would seem, the greater the recoil from the preacher. They say in England that Bishop Blomfield, revisiting the University Chapel at Cambridge after long absence, found the same old verger whom he remembered in college days. "You have much to be grateful for," said the bishop to the old man. "I have indeed, my lord," was the answer. "I have heard every sermon that has been preached in the chapel for fifty years, and, I bless the Lord, I am a Christian still!"

It is to be noticed, too, that this progress of free thought brings no falling off of moral power or philanthropic zeal. The great reforms of the world were never stronger, and most of them sprang, to say the least, from the secular side and not from the technical Church. The temperance movement dates back, so far as I know, to a pamphlet written in 1818, by Judge Thomas Hertell, an avowed infidel; and Miss Catherine Beecher has recently stated that the sixty thousand Jews in New York stand higher in this regard than any other class of citizens. The anti-slavery reform sprang not from the Church, but from a solitary young man in Boston, now the most renowned citizen in Massachusetts, who began by appealing in vain to the Church, which afterward repudiated him in turn. Slavery was systematically defended as a Scriptural institution, which indeed it was, and its opponents have come again and again from the anti-Christian side. The first nation in Europe that abolished slavery in the colonies (France, in 1793) did in the same session abolish Christianity—and when Christianity was restored, slavery came back also. The cause of woman's rights, next on the docket for labor and trial and triumph, by the special charge of its enemies was cradled in infidelity. Many as have been the noble men in the Church who have given the cause their heartiest support, its history proves the strength of a moral reform to be in human nature itself, and not inside any catechism or ritual. If you insist on giving the name of Christianity to the whole progress of modern civilization, you may claim these reforms as Christian, but in no mere technical sense. And the reason is plain. It is not that there were worse men inside the Church, but they were pre-occupied with saving the souls of men by some doctrine or ritual, and so left it to unbelievers and secular men to look after the bodies.

The world is thus entering, with no perceptible injury, on a period of greater religious freedom. It is not to be expected that those who still honestly believe in the Christian tradition can thus slip away from it, without an effort, even if that effort is called persecution. Persecution may not make a man more lovable, but if he is a sincere Christian believer, persecution shows him to be more logical. Mr. Fox, the English statesman, said to the poet Rogers, "The only foundation for toleration is a degree of scepticism, and without it there can be none. For if a man believes in the saving of souls, he must soon think about the means, and if by cutting off one generation he can save many future ones from hell-fire, it is his duty to do it."

Accordingly, in some parts of the English-speaking world, free thought is accompanied by speaking as well as progress. In Sydney, Australia, there is still imprisoned (I suppose) a man of unimpeached personal character—Mr. William L. Jones—a member of the Royal Academy of Arts, who was convicted of the crime of blasphemy, for asserting that much of the Old Testament was false and indelicate. It was proved for the defence that Mr. Jones spoke of God

"with great reverence," and declared Jesus Christ to be "the highest and purest character known in history." Evidence as to his good moral character was ruled out; and he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment at hard labor, and to a fine of £200. I take the facts from the Dubuque (Iowa) Times, as reprinted in the Boston Investigator.

Such a reaction in favor of superstition might here be impossible. But when we open our newspaper and find a citizen of Brookline arrested for playing croquet on Sunday, in his own grounds, behind a hedge too high for any one but an "evangelical" detective to look through; or when, in another newspaper, we find a man shot with three bullets by a policeman, when refusing to be arrested for fishing in a brook on Sunday,—we see the germ of the same tyranny that ordered the massacre of St. Bartholomew. No doubt every man who goes into a religious meeting has a right to the protection of the police on Sunday, and so has every man innocently employed outside. It will one day seem as absurd to prohibit any one from innocent sport on Sunday, as it does now to keep a public library closed on that day. It is as easy to have a harmonious difference of opinion everywhere else as it is in Westerly, R. I.—a manufacturing town of 7,000 inhabitants, where about half the people are Seventh-Day Baptists. Go there on Saturday and you find one-half the churches, one-half the shops, and one-half the mills open and in full operation. Stay there over Sunday and you find everything open that was closed the day before, and everything that was closed, open. Nobody tries to coerce his neighbor's conscience, and the result is harmony and peace.

Another peril of free thought is in the temptations that come to many a man, in business, or in a profession, to conceal his opinion for the sake of his bread. The pathway to indifference or conformity is easier to the radical than the conservative, for no man believes that his soul's salvation is endangered by going to church; whereas many believe that they risk eternal torment by staying away from it. Baptism, and the "Lord's Supper," and saying Mass, are matters of life and death to those who believe in them, while to those who have outgrown them they are only matters of indifference. And when young men come to me, as they sometimes do, and say, "Shall I give up my situation, or shall I hold my tongue?" although I always advise them to give up their situation, I am not surprised to hear of them afterwards as deacons or vestrymen.

Yet these, after all, are trivial things. The only really serious danger of free thought is in the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution; and I am not one of those who believe that this can ever be carried. We have had a hundred years of substantial religious liberty, under a Constitution which provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion," and I am not afraid that we are going to be, as a nation, false to this. We owe our religious liberties to the fact that the great founders of our government—Washington, Jefferson, Adams—were heretics, and knew what they were doing. The Constitution declares treaties to be "the supreme law of the land;" and the most precious autograph of Washington, for those who prize religious freedom, is his signature to the treaty with Tripoli, Nov. 4, 1796: "As the government of the United States is not, in any sense, founded on the Christian religion; as it has, in itself, no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquility of Mussulmans, and as the said States never have entered into any war or act of hostility against any Mahometan nation—it is declared by the parties that no pretext, arising from religious opinions, shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between these two countries." In this we have the policy of Washington. On the other side we have that of the Rev. Mr. McAllister, who maintained in this very city, in behalf of the proposed "religious amendment," that "the State must have its own religion, and teach it, and, if wise, will both proclaim and support it." As between these two authorities I confess I feel safer by the side of Washington.

This good effect at least may follow from the new efforts of this reactionary party. It may lead to the withdrawal of those inconsistencies which linger in our national practice; as, the exemption of churches from taxation, and the enforced reading of the Bible in schools. These are but subordinate inconsistencies, under the Constitution, and easily repealed. Once get the proposed "religious amendment" fastened upon us, and we step back two centuries. I do not think it possible that this should happen; but I cannot forget that most people regarded the late civil war as equally impossible—and yet it came!

But after all, the chief dangers to free thought are always from within, not from without. With our best efforts we can extract but little persecution out of the present age, for either thinking freely or speaking our thought. So much the more dangerous, often. Persecution helps truth. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church. But many a man who would have made a first-class martyr makes a very poor citizen. Arrogance, obstinacy, self-conceit, often looked sublime when they went up to heaven in a funeral pyre, whereas if you had let them alone, the world would soon have grown tired of them. He who died a saint might have lived to be a bore. The worst thing that could be done with the early Christians was to condemn them "to the lions." Now the heretic may be doomed to become a lion—which is worse.

We must remember that the free-thinker who cannot talk, who cannot write, who has only power to think and to be brave and good, may be doing more for free thought than one who is logical and eloquent and base. What honest people fear in free thought is that it will end in levity and vice. They are right to dread that. We hurt our cause more by frivolousness than by bad logic. We hurt it by pettishness—growing angry at little attacks, where we ought not even to feel the arrow. We hurt it inexpressibly by conceit. There is many a brave man who is now offensive to everybody, but who, if he could only assume for five minutes a look of humility, would charm the whole human race.

Above all, the spirit of love is more important, in the long run, than any argument. "An ounce of mother," says the Spanish proverb, "is worth a pound of clergy;" and an ounce of love like a mother's is worth all the sarcasms of Voltaire's seventy volumes. Life speaks the loudest and argues the most convincingly. In a village church of New York State, the other day, they put in a new painted window, representing the first scene after the death of Jesus; and from the lips of an angel at the sepulchre come the words, "The Lord is not here." So there stands a clergyman officiating in full canonicals every Sunday, and behind him the ominous criticism (before the eyes of the whole congregation): "The Lord is not here." Let those of us who are aiming at free thought take care lest, while we are shaping assiduously our arguments or our rhetoric, some angel of our own painting should say over our shoulders, "Beware! the truth is not here."

DARWIN ON BELIEF IN GOD.

"There is no evidence that man was aboriginally endowed with the ennobling belief in the existence of an omnipotent God. On the contrary, there is ample evidence, derived not from hasty travellers, but from men who have long resided with savages, that numerous races have existed, and still exist, who have no idea of one or more gods, and who have no words in their language to express such an idea. The question is, of course, wholly distinct from the higher one, whether there exists a Creator and Ruler of the universe; and this has been answered in the affirmative by the highest intellects that have ever lived." [Descent of Man, vol. I., pp. 62—63.]

"The belief in God has often been advanced as not only the greatest, but the most complete of all the distinctions between man and the lower animals. It is, however, impossible to maintain that this belief is innate or instinctive in man. On the other hand, a belief in all-pervading spiritual agencies seems to be universal; and apparently follows from a considerable advance in the reasoning powers of man, and from a still greater advance in his faculties of imagination, curiosity, and wonder. I am aware that the assumed instinctive belief in God has been used by many persons as an argument for his existence. But this is a rash argument, as we should thus be compelled to believe in the existence of many cruel and malignant spirits, possessing only a little more power than man; for the belief in them is far more general than of a beneficent Deity. The idea of a universal and beneficent Creator of the universe does not seem to arise in the mind of man until he has been elevated by long-continued culture." [Descent of Man, vol. II., p. 377.]

The religious divisions of the entire population of India are said to be approximately as follows: Native Christians, 1,100,000; Buddhists, 3,000,000; Aborigines, 12,000,000; Hindus, 110,000,000; Mahometans, 25,000,000; Parsees, 170,000; Eurasians, 91,000; Europeans, 158,000; Jews, 10,000; Armenians, 5,000. In Bengal, with its population of 40,000,000, it is said that no more than 500,000 children are receiving any education, though certain classes are anxious to have it. Most of that which is now afforded is given through the 30,000 native schools, which are described as only better than none.

Mr. FROUDE concluded a lecture with this observation:—"But it is said that things of this sort go on in most countries where there are popular governments; that corruption, more or less of it, is a necessary condition for the working of free constitutions. If that be so, then have the destinies pronounced sentence against free constitutions. Either liberty must cast out corruption, or corruption will destroy liberty."

A great man is always willing to be little.—E. mer-

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1858, by F. E. Anson, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER V.—(Continued.)

He was in many respects an original, in some a type of a large class of the old school of country clergymen. A gentleman by breeding and profession, of average attainments and mediocre abilities; simple-natured and narrow-minded, in consequence of his seclusion from the world; something of a gossip and, what the villagers denominated, a "jaddle" (meaning one who fusses over trifles); he also entertained such peculiar ideas of his authority over his parishioners, and his duty towards them, high and low, as not unfrequently betrayed him into conduct which it would be difficult to avoid characterizing as other than that of a spy and petty tyrant. Thus he was accustomed to write to the Squire informing him of such misdemeanors on the part of his servants as he became acquainted with through the tattling of his own or village gossip—for instance surreptitious attendance at fairs or wakes, staying out late at nights, or not coming to church—to which they responded by hating him cordially and going to sleep in sermon-time, an offence he particularly resented; moreover he had been known to attempt to abuse his influence in the same quarter to prevent the parents of such children as went to the Methodist school (instead of the orthodox one) from renting an allotment, or chain or two of land, wherein to grow corn or vegetables. The Squire, however, generally laughed at such suggestions, unless they involved some communication about poaching, when he could be more severe than the parson desired. Illiberal from position rather than nature, Mr. Blencowe was, notwithstanding, charitable to the poor (especially when propitiated); he thought the text asserting that they should never cease from out the land a literal expression of the will of Providence. He possessed only a surface knowledge of his parishioners, and was as incapable of comprehending the terrible barbarism which underlies rural life in England as of doing anything towards remedying it. A lover of books and poetry, a bit of an antiquarian, a conscientious and, in the main, good-natured old gentleman, he performed his professional duties in the old, orthodox fashion, preached twice every Sunday (except when he administered the sacrament), and detested Ritualism. That was the only subject on which he was thoroughly in accord with Mr. and Mrs. Gower, unless I should mention a notion of the old lady's, respecting the near advent of the millennium.

When he took charge of Ruth, it was with no more benevolent intentions than of giving the child a home until he should be relieved of her by her father; in default of which he thought of educating her for a governess—perhaps promoting her to the position of village schoolmistress; which would, of course, be a decent independence for a poor relation. But the little girl was very pretty and winning, though rather wilful (in that respect taking after her father), the ladies at the Hall noticed her, and the old bachelor's heart was softened. Probably, too, his conscience put in a special plea for the child, in consideration of her dead and gone great-grandfather's money. He had nobody in the world to care for him, except his housekeeper, who henpecked him almost as much as if she had a legal title to do so. He resolved to adopt the little girl as his own, and to give her all the advantages of such a relationship.

So Ruth was brought up, in all respects, like a young lady—had a governess of her own, instead of the prospect of being one—went to a first-class school at Leamington, and in due time did credit to her training. At the age of ten she was a charming, rosy-faced little creature, full of mirth and good spirits, and possessing such large blue eyes and beautiful fair hair that even her aunts—no bad judges—allowed that she would be a beauty some day—always adding that she took after the Gowers, and that her guardian spoiled her. Indeed her extreme vivacity gave color to the assertion, for she was never so happy as when roaming and frolicking—running about the garden or orchard, surreptitiously climbing trees, or riding the ecclesiastical pony, and generally imperilling her life and limbs, and frightening her elders. But she loved her guardian dearly and soon learned how to coax and wheedle him into condoning all her tricks, and to defy the housekeeper. Perhaps Mr. Blencowe secretly admired her on the latter account, though he always shook his head and inculcated obedience. Gradually, as the girl grew up, she became virtual mistress of the vicarage and almost forgot that she had ever known any other home.

Of course, her guardian brought her up in the tenets of the Church of England; indeed, taught her to say the thirty-nine articles by heart; and she was as orthodox as any young lady need be, having a proper sense of Mr. Blencowe's importance in the village, and, as remarked, a great affection for him. She had secretly idealized his character in the manner peculiar to loving, imaginative children, to make the usual, inevitable deduction in after years. As the old clergyman worked at his sermons, or in his garden, or trotted about the village, or dozed over the Record of evenings, he hardly suspected with what veneration he was regarded by the warm-hearted girl, who esteemed it a privilege to fetch his very slippers. At the same time she maintained a decidedly independent carriage towards most people and was generally considered rather haughty and intractable.

Thus, when she went to London to visit her grandparents, she held her own so successfully as to quite discomfit her aunts and Mrs. Gower in their early attempts at patronizing her; and established herself on a very different footing than her less fortunate brother. Henceforth she was received as the ward and probable heiress of Reverend Paul Blencowe rather than the daughter of John Gower. They never asked her to go to the "Rooms" on Sundays, but permitted her to attend the parish church unquestioned. Mrs. Gower took great credit for that act of toleration, remarking that she coerced nobody and could respect the conscientious convictions of others. I should have liked to see Paul take her at her word!

He soon learned to admire his sister exceedingly, which sentiment she returned with generous affection. Had they grown up together it is highly probable there might have been less liking between them; for, in such a relationship, daily intercourse is as severe a test as matrimony, and has less restraining influences. There was something romantic in their position towards one another; meeting so seldom and in homes which possessed but one common point of resemblance—they had no direct title to them. So they corresponded very punctually and made much of each other during the visits.

Their father's silence, which has already been explained to the reader, soon ceased to trouble them; by and by he became but a dim figure in Paul's memory, while Ruth's idea of him was entirely derived from fancy and what she had heard from others. Naturally, the brother and sister sometimes talked about him and, at first, indulged in day-dreams concerning his coming back and reclaiming them, but everything was vague and hypothetical and imaginary. Mr. Blencowe had his own reasons for hoping he would not return; Mr. Gower never spoke of his absent son after the first disappointment in not hearing from him; the old lady fretted and worried, and then buried her thoughts and hopes in her own bosom; the sisters were indifferent; years went and came, and it was, at length, tacitly supposed, by all but Mrs. Gower, that John must have died abroad, among strangers.

Paul's holiday-visits to Northamptonshire were the happiest periods of his life: he looked forward to them with the utmost eagerness, and always came back to London in the lowest of spirits, almost hating it, from the force of contrast. The comfortable vicarage, the beautiful, pastoral country, commonly seen in all the luxuriant pomp of summer, the old farm-houses (in one of which he made friends, to be hereafter introduced to the reader, the green fields and "unspeakable rural solitudes"—above all the kindness of people and sense of absolute freedom and independence—were ill-exchanged for town and his life in the house near the Hampstead Road. To him, Thorpe Parva was nearer heaven than other localities; a place in which care and trouble and oppression did not exist, a kind of Paradise. He drew its pretty, ivy-mantled church, the Hall, the vicarage, and the more picturesque farm-houses; explored the neighboring villages, loitered along the willow-fringed banks of the little stream (which he was delighted to find figuring in Spenser, at the marriage of the Thames and Medway), and idled away his time deliciously. Nor was it all idleness, for his elderly cousin possessed a library of a much more catholic quality than Mr. Gower, and in the words of a delightful writer already quoted, he "browsed at will on that fair and wholesome pasturage;" thereby indirectly qualifying himself for his future career. One year, the occupants of the Hall were away on the continent, when he obtained free admission to the grounds, and spent long, long, blissful mornings there, secluded among the trees, beside the stream, where the broad water-lilies lay tremulous on the surface, and now and then a shadowy pike darted athwart the dusky depths beneath; returning through the old arched gateway to the vicarage, when the pleasant old chimneys from the church-tower indicated the hour of lunch. He never cared for fishing, nor even shooting, but liked a ride on horseback; in which taste Miss Ruth cordially sympathized. Mr. Blencowe thought him a quiet, agreeable young fellow, but nothing more; and recognized him rather as the brother of his ward than in his individual capacity.

When Paul returned home after these visits—which were sometimes extended to a month—he was commonly more snubbed than usual, and subjected to a good deal of indirect questioning, by his grandmother and aunts; who entertained no little jealousy of his temporary glimpses of freedom and felicity. Moreover, they suspected Ruth of an inclination towards spiriting her brother to resistance against lawful authority—not without reason. But, as stated, he was a peaceably-disposed youth, and circumstances were strong against him. There came, however, a time when, under the influence of a more potent passion than he had hitherto experienced, he was stimulated to what Mrs. Gower called rebellion—but we shall speak of that in a future chapter.

Ruth Gower, before she reached her seventeenth year, had fulfilled her aunts' predictions by becoming a tall, handsome girl, with great, lustrous blue eyes and such beautiful, long, curling, golden hair, that when she went to Southend, one summer, Mr. Blencowe (who affected that once quiet watering place) remonstrated against her wearing it loose after bathing, because it attracted so much admiration from the gentlemen. Ruth did as she was told, though I cannot say she felt positive satisfaction in compliance. And immediately afterwards, on their return to Northamptonshire—in fact only a month before the commencement of this history—she obtained a very serious proof of the effect of her charms on the other sex, and one which presently did something towards diminishing them, by dimming the brightness of her blue eyes, and imparting that look of sadness to her countenance which we have noticed in our first chapter—of which we shall hear more in the course of a few pages.

On his sixteenth birthday, Paul entered the office of a London architect, as pupil, for five years. He had no particular inclination towards the profession, indeed had hardly turned his thoughts in any definite direction, but it was the only alternative that presented itself besides becoming a linen-draper's assistant, to which he entertained an insuperable objection. Luckily, Mr. Blencowe heard of the opportunity, Mr. Gower thought the business "very respectable," and Mr. Bligh agreed to take him without premium. In his office, then, he had sojourned till within a month of the expiration of his articles, when the arrival of his father's letter at the house near the Hampstead Road, and the proposition therein contained, bade fair to introduce him to such a future as he had never yet speculated upon, and began this narrative.

CHAPTER VI.

MR. BLIGH RECEIVES THREE MORNING CALLS.

Mr. Samuel Bligh, a bushy-whiskered, bald-headed, deep-voiced man of sixty, attired in an easy undress of shirt, slippers, and dressing-gown, and nothing else worth mentioning, sat in his office in Soho Square, at work upon some plans and specifications, on the morning subsequent to the day upon which this history opens. He commonly did so between the hours of nine and ten A. M., dressing by easy stages, and breakfasting simultaneously. It was later at the time I present him to the reader, being past eleven, but, engrossed by his occupation, he was still en deshabille. He was an architect in good practice, an author, a man about town, and a man of the world—rather incongruous characters, but, in this instance, curiously combined in one person. He was, also, brother to the very high and mighty dean of a western diocese of the Church of England, and derived a considerable portion of his business from that circumstance; though—again, oddly enough—it included more which was exceedingly secular: in so much that he sometimes boasted that he had built more theatres and written more farces than any man living. The latter part of the observation, however, might admit of question.

A knock at the door induces permission to "Come in." Mr. Bligh, in undress, would have cried "come in" to the Archbishop of Canterbury, or one of his own servants, with equal nonchalance. At present it is the latter, his coachman, who hands him a card and announces "Mr. Blencowe."

"Oh? show him in! My dear Blencowe, how are you? quite an unexpected pleasure, I'm sure. Nichols, a chair!" and Mr. Bligh shook hands with his visitor very cordially, getting up from his arm-chair to do it.

The in-comer responds to the architect's salutation in a loud, cheery voice, and, seating himself, turns towards him the countenance of an aged man—seventy and upwards, at least; but very hale and fresh-colored, with that wholesome redness of complexion and tough, wiry look which is immediately suggestive of country life, and, perhaps, of competence and comfort. Mr. Blencowe was small in figure and short in stature, very aquiline-nosed and white-haired, and scrupulously-shaven; and his eyes were so bright that they glistened, like those of some blind persons, and attracted your attention almost as much as his teeth, which were conspicuously artificial, and so badly inserted, or damaged by time, that he not infrequently entangled his upper lip among them, when laughing or talking. His peculiarity of appearance was also increased by his wearing very high, old-fashioned shirt-collars, cutting the lobes of his ears. He was, of course, dressed in the conventional black of a clergyman of the Church of England.

"Well," he said, crossing his extremely thin legs, throwing up one foot and laughing cheerily; "I've come up after my girl, you know—ran up last night, as usual, and slept at the Euston. I'm always fit for nothing after a railway journey—quite knocks me up till next morning. And, Bligh, I wanted to speak to you. Business first. You must positively talk to Gillingham about that stained glass window,—the way he has dawdled over it, ever since you left, is shameful. I can do nothing with him—nothing, upon my honor, and the family are quite impatient. It ought to have been finished by August. And, now, what d'ye think? I want your advice. Here's another fellow turned up—this time on the other side of the world—who wants to deprive me of my dear little Ruth! By the way"—this with a sudden access of seriousness—"have you heard anything of Mr. George?"

The architect nodded. "Yes," he said, drily. "He's in Paris—not doing any good there that I am aware of. Very foolish! very wrong-headed!—he must give in, you know, in the long run—the dean won't. A bad business, altogether."

Mr. Blencowe's face was suffused with a shade or so of deeper red, as he responded, rather sharply: "When you say that, Mr. Bligh, I am constrained to inquire whether your remark involves any reflection upon me or my ward?"

"Of course not! of course not! I was speaking generally. Don't be so peppery, my dear fellow—next thing you'll be challenging me to fight you on the first Sunday after Epiphany, like Sydney Smith's Irish parson. I'm not responsible for my brother's sentiments."

"No, but, my dear Bligh," returned Mr. Blencowe, who, as has been stated, was something of a gossip, and, besides, very much in earnest on this particular subject; "you should consider. A man cannot be too careful of his honor. I have the greatest respect for your brother's office and position; but if, as I infer, he supposes there was anything underhanded on our part in that most unfortunate affair—which has caused me more distress and anxiety than—yes—I ever experienced; to say nothing of my poor, dear girl, who, however, bears it like an angel—if, I say, this is the case, the dean does us monstrous injustice, and I am bound to protest against it on all possible occasions. 'Good name in man or woman, dear my lord!—you know the rest. He should remember we were wilfully deceived by his son, and have, perhaps, more to complain of than himself. And permit me here to say that if, as we supposed, there had been no other impediment than worldly considerations, the young man could not have made a better choice, for my girl's beauty and accomplishments would reflect credit on any station—any! I have no desire to be hard upon him, and—of course wholly irrespective of personal considerations (for your brother may be assured that we are, in our way, quite as proud as he is)—should rejoice to hear of his reconciliation with his father: still I must insist upon our entire justification. You will, I am sure, not object to bear this in mind on all convenient opportunities?"

Mr. Bligh nodded again. "It's quite understood," he said, "at least by me. I always make it a rule to avoid family quarrels—never interfere on principle. Let us drop the subject. You were saying—"

"That I wanted your advice, and about Ruth, on a very different business altogether than that we have been discussing. Bligh, I have only to comply with this letter, to relieve the dean of his apprehensions and myself of my comfort and happiness for the rest of my life."

"Oh?"

"Ruth's father wants her. Look here. Read that. I got it only yesterday."

"Can't you tell me?" asked the architect, glancing at the closely-written epistle.

"Yes. Bligh, you always remind me of the lawyer in Chaucer:—

"No wher so bovy a man as he ther 'n 'as,
And yet he semed bestler than he was."

(he repeated the lines with great enjoyment)—or of the lawyer in 'Tom Jones' who wants to divide himself into four quarters to be in several places at once. I wonder whether Fielding had read Chaucer—hardly likely—he admired Hardyknute though." Then, seeing that Mr. Bligh's attention was straying towards his papers, he returned to the subject and informed him of John Gower's application, which the reader has already heard of, in connection with Mr. Wheeler's visit to the house near the Hampstead road.

"You don't want to comply, eh?" said Mr. Bligh, when the clergyman had ended his rather lengthy explanation.

"Part with my little girl! I should think not, indeed. 'She is my goods, my chattels, and my house,' in a kinder sense than Petruccio's. I'd rather give him a thousand pounds—if I could spare the money."

"Well, write him word. A Louisiana slave-owner ought to be accustomed to such transactions."

Mr. Blencowe enjoyed this jest, if such it might be called, beyond its merits, laughing loudly and throwing himself back in his chair.

"There you go, Bligh!" he cried; "that's just like you. Do be serious and tell me what I shall say to him."

"Does the girl want to go to her father?"

"Bless you, she doesn't know a word about it—unless they've told her at Gower's—I haven't been there yet; and, you see, her father says he abstains from writing to her, at present, not wishing to do anything contrary to my inclinations. Very honorable, I'm sure." The speaker would have referred to the passage in question, had not Mr. Bligh signified, by a motion of the hand, his readiness to take it for granted. He then went on loquaciously: "My ward is the dearest and best of girls, the apple of my eye and the pride of my life; and I've never dreamed of parting with her until she should, in due course of time, come to be married; and I didn't take very readily to that idea, I promise you—but we needn't refer to that again. But if she wants to go to her father, go she shall—God forbid that I should prevent her! I hope I know my duty better. You'll observe, however, that as he left England when she was a mere child, she can't be expected to know or care very much about him, except by way of sentiment. She has lived with me nearly all her life, and I love her as well as if she were my own daughter; and I think she regards me almost as a father. Dear me! I'd no more notion of John Gower coming to life again than—the effigy of Sir Toby Edgewood and his two wives in my church. Then think of a girl, brought up as she has been, going such a voyage—and to America, my dear Bligh, to America! Let her brother go, if he likes, but spare me my one ewe lamb!"

"Hum! young Gower, eh? yes, I suppose his grandparents won't interpose any objection. You say the father seems not disinclined to accept such a compromise—at least for the present?"

"Exactly so—and there's the difficulty. The fellow puts it so modestly, talking of his obligations to me and the like, that I feel constrained to consider him as much as possible."

"Pack her off, then, and reward yourself by thinking of your own magnanimity. Candidly, I ought to advise it in my brother's interest. Miss Gower is altogether too fascinating a young lady for me to risk displeasing him by aiding and abetting to keep her in England."

Mr. Blencowe was a little piqued, notwithstanding the compliment. He had evidently come for the pleasure of talking the matter over, rather than consultation; while the architect, really not caring one straw about it (apart from the fraternal considerations he so frankly suggested), and thinking his confidence rather a bore than otherwise, only wanted to get rid of him with due civility. He resolved to do it by a coup de main.

"There, get along with you," he said. "You have no more idea of parting with her than of inviting me to a game of leap-frog in the Square, or of coming out in genteel comedy. You'll write him a long letter, expressing how dear she is to you, how desolate you'd be at losing her, and hinting at testamentary intentions in her favor, in the event of his not insisting upon his paternal prerogative. You'll suggest that a voyage across the Atlantic isn't to be thought of, unless under better convoy than that of a young fellow of one-and-twenty; and, after marshalling all the objections you can rake together against the project, you'll hint that the least he can do is to let it stand over until he can spare time to come and fetch her himself. And then you'll pray that the exigencies of the cotton crop may keep him employed till the Greek Kalends."

The old clergyman again indulged in one of his loud, cheery laughs, and acknowledged that he had meditated such an epistle. "It's the best thing I can do, I think," he said; "only—the objection was cut short by the knock and re-appearance of the coachman."

"Mr. Sabin wants to know if you can spare him just five minutes, sir. Not Mr. Richard—his father."

"Eh? I'm very busy, but tell him to wait." Mr. Blencowe immediately declared that he wouldn't occupy any more of his friend's valuable time at present, but look in again, and only took a quarter of an hour in returning to the subject of the stained glass window (concerning which the architect really had some professional interest) before Nichols showed him to the door; coming back with the new visitor.

We have had a glimpse of him already, at his own door in Newman street, while watching the departure of Mr. Wheeler's cab. Besides being a man of portly presence and large, jolly countenance, Mr. Sabin had an unctuous, jovial voice, in admirable keeping with his aspect, a voice possessing a natural gravitation towards a rich chuckle, and something of a Yorkshire accent. He inquired after the architect's health, and, in obedience to a nod and gesture, seats himself.

"Well, Mr. Sabin, what can I do for you this morning?"

"If you please, sir, I've come about Richard."

"Eh? What of him?" Mr. Bligh elevated his eyebrows and kept on writing.

"He talks of going to America, sir. It's very much against my wish, and his mother can't bear to hear of it; as Tom, our fourth, went there years ago, and we've only heard of him once, and that quite accidentally."

"Hum! America, again! Didn't know you had a son there. Largo family, yours, Mr. Sabin?"

"Eight, sir—five boys and three girls. I've had my troubles with 'em and, perhaps, shouldn't be sorry if some would emigrate; but not Richard. There's no need of it."

"He's doing well, then?"

"He might if he liked, sir. Fact is he makes money too easily—idles away half his time. I see very little of him, bless you! I hope he didn't forget to thank you for that very kind notice of his picture in the Epoch. It ought to be of great service to him."

"Wasn't mine—Crofts did it—I was out of town—what does he want to go to America for?—thinks Yankees want to buy pictures, eh?"

"Oh, mere curiosity, love of roaming, raw notions that he'll like it—a pack of stuff and nonsense easy to get into a boy's head, hard to drive out. If you'll only be good enough to speak to him—"

"I!" interrupted Mr. Bligh, looking up over his papers. "You don't think I should have any influence over him, do you? Besides, I never give advice—never. People never take it and always hate you for offering it, unless it is just according to their own inclinations. And young men invariably think they know more than old ones."

"So they do, sir," and Sabin senior shook his head with an air of great sagacity. "Sometimes I wish Dick had stayed with you, sir. He might have been more steady."

"Wouldn't have done!—clever enough, no doubt, but couldn't stick to line and rule—not at all business-like—wouldn't have earned bread and cheese at our profession. Who's that? Come in! Come in!"

It was the senior clerk of Mr. Bligh's office with drawings and plans for that gentleman's supervision, into which task he plunged with characteristic energy; the clerk recognizing Sabin with a nod and brief salutation. "There's your son up-stairs," he observed to the artist, when his employer had finished his comments and directions.

"Eh? send him down, then," said the architect. "I'll speak to him now, if you like, though I'm convinced it'll not be of the slightest use—what do you want, Nichols?" This was addressed to the coachman, who entered for the third time, again carrying a card.

"Mr. Maberley, sir! Wants to see you. He said it was of the greatest consequence."

The architect looked annoyed, irritated, and somewhat disgusted. "I'm not at home," he answered, curtly. "I can't see anybody." And he began to dress himself.

The man lingered, as if he had inadvertently admitted the contrary of his master's assertion.

"I've to lunch with Sir Henry at one," Mr. Bligh continued, bustling about and looking at his watch; "and it wants—dear me!—only twenty minutes of that now. See after the carriage, Nichols—I'm not at home, recollect, to anybody." Reiterating his business directions to the clerk, apologizing to Sabin for his inability to spare time to see his son, again assuring him that such an interview would prove useless, and doing everything in a great hurry, the half-dressed architect was brushing his whiskers and bald head until they shone again, when the dismissed artist and clerk, in leaving the room, almost ran against another visitor,—the person announced by Nichols—that discomfited servant's face appearing in the background.

"How d'y' do, my dear Bligh?" said the intruder, showing a mouthful of ivory-white teeth and a face fringed by elaborately dyed and curled whiskers. "I must trespass upon you, but not for long—really. One moment—positively!"

"I am obliged to go out immediately." And Mr. Bligh shampooed himself with increased vigor.

"I have something of importance to communicate—something very distressing!" urged the other, who was as elaborately over-dressed as his hair; who wore a profusion of chains and rings, and whose propitiatory grin had something furtive in it—furtive and false and slinking; though he strove to appear perfectly at his ease and was ostentatiously polite—in which his demeanor contrasted remarkably with that of the architect.

"Nichols! shut the door. Now, Mr. Maberley, what is it? Be quick, if you please. I haven't a moment to spare."

"It's about my wife." And Mr. Maberley's eyes—black, shallow-looking eyes, not too willing to encounter the steady gaze of others—glanced from Mr. Bligh's profile—for that gentleman was standing sideways towards him—to the top of the architect's arm-chair, and thence to the window.

"Well?"

"It grieves me to say that she has left my house this morning—ran away from me."

"Humph! again? Where to?"

"I think—indeed I know—to Mr. Gower's. I have just been there in search of her."

"Well, and what did she say?"

"There's the difficulty!" Mr. Maberley laughed not in a pleasant manner. "I didn't see her—" wasn't allowed to—and I've come to you as a man of the world and her ex-guardian, to ask your advice on the subject."

"Dear me!—very unpleasant, to be sure—third time I've been bothered this morning about other people's business. One would think there was a sign out, 'Advice gratis to folks in trouble with their relations.' I can't undertake anything of the kind."

"If you could only induce Mrs. Maberley to return. Think of the scandal, my dear Bligh!—the talk!—ruinous to me professionally! I acknowledge she has had some provocation; that I have my faults and may not have been quite a model husband; but we live in the world and must make allowances. She has been too precipitate."

"I'd rather not hear any particulars. What does Gower say about it? He's her uncle and should have more influence over her than I, at this time."

"Well, you know that Mr. Gower and his wife are very peculiar people—very strict in their notions; and I'm afraid—that is, I know—they side with Mrs. Maberley. In fact the old lady was so violent in her language towards me"—here the speaker grinned savagely—"that if I hadn't a great respect for her, why—"

"Sharp old lady!" said Mr. Bligh; "speaks her mind on all occasions! Rather you differed with her than I."

"Of course I could compel Mrs. Maberley to return by law," continued her husband; "but I wish to avoid scandal. So what am I to do?"

"Does she positively declare she won't come back?"

"Positively!"

"Wait a little, give her time. A married woman, in England, who has left her husband and is without money, is the most anomalous creature in the world. Everybody finds her a bore and advises her to go back; people's sympathy doesn't last, you know. Then there's the children; she'll think of them—four, aren't there? She'll come back, depend upon it!" Mr. Bligh had by this time dressed himself, and here rang the bell for Nichols and the carriage.

"If you could only make it convenient to see her," persisted Maberley, "and to mention that I very much regret the—behavior which induced her to take this rash step, and that it shall not be repeated, I shall consider myself your debtor. Your opinion, too, would have great weight with Mr. and Mrs. Gower."

"I don't know! I can't promise! Write to her!" said the architect, bustling into the passage and out at the street door, in front of which his brougham was waiting. Mr. Maberley followed, pressing his suit, and, doing the first rather hastily, he slightly jostled a tall young man with long, tawny moustache and whiskers, who had been talking to Nichols, and was smoking a cigar. In return he received such a savage push as caused him to totter and stagger, and nearly to fall headlong on the pavement.

"Why, Sabin, is that you?" asked Mr. Bligh from the cab.

"Yes, sir!" The tall young man raised his hat, and then, turning to the discomfited Maberley, demanded with much ferocity, "What the devil he meant by running against him?"

"Stop! it's a friend of mine!" cried the architect, adding a reproach to his ex-pupil for his violence, which produced not the slightest apology to Maberley, who had picked up his hat (which had been knocked off in the attack) and was grinning his anger at his assailant.

"Sabin, your father has been talking to me about you—I've not a second to spare, now, but if you'll look in at another time, I'll—"

"I'm obliged to you, sir; but my mind is quite made up on the subject. I'll not waste your time in discussing it."

"I thought so! Good day, then."

"You couldn't favor me with any letters of introduction, sir?"

"Thank Heaven I don't know a single American in the world!" With which liberal sentiment, the architect nodded a hasty farewell to Mr. Maberley, and drove off to lunch with Sir Henry.

HOW THE WORD "BOSTON" WAS MADE.—A writer in Good News thus incidentally mentions the curious derivation of the name Boston: "Lincolnshire, or Lindsey, as the land south of the Humber was formerly called, received the Gospel from the good Bishop Paulinus, in the seventh century. In the same century, a pious monk, known as St. Botolph, or Bot-bolp—that is, Boat-help—founded a church at a place called Y-ceanh. The town which grew up around it was called 'Botolph's Town,' contracted into Bot-olpha-ton, Bot-as-ton, and finally Boston. It was from this town that Rev. John Cotton came to America, and gave the same name to the seaport in which he settled in Massachusetts. St. Botolph, or Boat-help, is the patron saint of sailors, and the spire of his church supports, three hundred feet high in air, a lantern visible at sea for forty miles, thus both lighting the worshippers home from the stormy sea, and pointing their way to the haven of rest."

It was under the shadow of the tower of that old church Jean Ingelow was born.

SECTARIAN SCHOOLS.

[From the Sunday Morning News, Titusville, Pa.]

Universal education, supported and sustained by the united contributions of the whole people, may be justly regarded as the corner stone of our political fabric, and the palladium of our liberties. That the framers of the federal constitution jealously recognized the dangers which might result from religious interference with civil administration, is established by the unequivocal language in which they allude to the subject; and our own State is no less explicit in her declarations. We hold then that any appropriation from the public treasury, in aid of individual or sectarian schools and charities, is an unconstitutional and unauthorized disbursement of the common property of every citizen. Such, indeed, has been the concurrent opinion expressed by our earliest and latest statesmen. For, in a popular government, like our own, where the utmost latitude is accorded to freedom of thought and religious observance, there should be no partiality indulged or discrimination manifested by our law-makers towards any particular sect.

While we do not object to the establishment of institutions of learning or charity by Roman Catholics, specially devoted to the instruction and relief of members of that religious body, we do protest most earnestly against the appropriation of the public money or of the public land, to any sectarian organization, no matter what its tenets or principles. It is contrary to the genius of American institutions. We desire no approach to an alliance of Church and State. History's warning voice speaks in unmistakable tones, and bids us beware. We should be glad to see not only Pennsylvania, and every State in the Union, but their united Congress, interpose the strong arm of legislation, and settle forever this much vexed and vitally important question.

LIBERTY VS. TASTE.—A case has occurred in the Gironde which shows that a French jury understands the conditions of religious liberty. A Protestant pastor, named Steeg, the editor of a paper called the Progrès des Communes, was libelled last week in the Assize Court of the Gironde for outraging the Catholic religion by his publications. The language cited, in relation especially to transubstantiation, was certainly coarse, and not at all of the kind to make any impression except of disgust on Roman Catholics,—probably, it was intended rather to kindle the scorn of Protestants,—but it was precisely of the kind which most keen controversialists use in ridiculing doctrines they displease; and to have declared it unlawful and libellous would have been to close completely the mouths of those many half-educated controversialists who cannot assail their adversaries' faith without homely or even vulgar thrusts. This, for instance, was the kind of thing:—"What would the humble Son of Mary have thought if he had been told that one day the people would celebrate a festival in which a bit of dry bread put into a metal box was his body and would be worshipped as God Himself? This, however, is what is meant by the Fête Dieu." Pastor Steeg's defence was very able. He showed that in all ages Romanism had availed itself of an equal or greater license of speech in attacking its opponents, and he cited, not from M. Veuillot,—that he would not condescend to do,—but from an author (M. Auguste Nodding) stamped with especial approval for his "moderation" by Cardinal Donnet, the Archbishop of the diocese,—an author who speaks of "the Devil as the first Protestant," denounces the Reformers as "men of impure lives," and so forth. The jury wisely found M. Steeg "not guilty." To make defects of taste in controversy illegal would be to stifle everything like manly intellectual conflict.—London Spectator of Sept. 21.

HOW HE WAS SILENCED.—At the late meeting of the Presbytery, when the subject of Scripture was under discussion, Brother W— said early in his ministry he and another brother were conducting a meeting in which there was much religious interest. An old man gave expression to his joy by shouting, and continued it until it began to interrupt the services. Brother H— said to Brother W—, "Go, stop that old man's noise." He went to him and spoke a few words, and the shouting man at once became quiet. "Brother H—," asked Brother W—, "what did you say to the old man that quieted him so promptly?" Brother W— replied, "I asked him for a dollar for foreign missions!"

Here is a delicious story illustrative of the religious impotence of two sharp Yankees suddenly confronted with death. They were in a yacht on the Delaware River, in imminent danger of wreck. "Seth," said Peleg, "say a prayer." "I can't," said Seth; "I have forgotten how." "Then, let us sing a hymn," replied Peleg. "I can't," returned Seth; "I never could sing." "But, Seth, we are drowning men, and must do something religious. Let us take up a collection." And they took it up. And no doubt that is the one rememberable Anglo-Saxon doxology.

If God did not exist, it would behoove man to invent him.—Robespierre.

The Sanctuary of Superstition.

N. B.—Brief and pithy extracts for this column will be gratefully received. Please send marked copies.

IS IT WORTH IT?
OR,
THE GAIN AND LOSS.

For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?—Matt. xvi. 26.

THE GAIN.

A hurried dream of happiness,
A bubble colored bright;
A hollow, painted effigy;
A certain, blinding light;
A troubled, feverish grasping
After what seems away—
Sweet flowers madly cherished,
To wither in a day.

Lips smiling above breaking hearts;
Gay songs to hide sad tears;
Pretended friendships maddening
The world's most bitter sneers,
Much toil, and wear, and restlessness,
Dull cold and aching smart,
And dodging, in the end, there's naught
Can satisfy the heart.

THE LOSS.

To waken up among the damned;
To hear the devil's jeer;
To wallow in vile leprosy;
No thought can picture here!
Lost, Lost, the Soul! Oh, never more
A ray of light to see,
Of peace, or hope! Endless remorse,
Undying misery.

Oh, never more to get a glimpse
Of aught that's good or pure!
To see, at last, sin's loathsomeness,
Too late to find its cure!
And this for souls that heard of Christ!
Knew of His work of love;
Ah! that will be the ceaseless sting,
All other woes above!

Work out the sum—the gain, the loss—
And weigh the profit well;
Then tell the Loving One who asks,
Will you choose Christ, or HELL?
—Good Words.

THE ONLY SAVIOR FROM HELL.—Do you ask, sinner, what Jesus Christ has done for me that should so much endear Him? I answer, He has died for me; while I was yet His enemy He died for me. "Greater love than this hath no man, that a man lay down his life for his friends. But God commandeth His love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us." Yes, "In His own blood He has washed us, and made us kings and priests unto God. Worthy, therefore, is the Lamb that was slain, and is alive, to receive blessing and honor." And we unto him who withholds that tribute. If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema, maranatha. Do you ask what Jesus has done for me? He has suffered the penalties of justice; He has quenched the fires of hell in my behalf. He flung His sacred body between me and perdition. And that is now the only panoply that shields me from those flames by which the rebel angels were consumed—the only pledge I hold that they shall not hereafter kindle on me. Do you still ask what Jesus Christ has done for me? I answer, He hath disarmed Death; He hath hallowed the sepulchre. Death was my great enemy. He was my last enemy. I dreaded death. But death is conquered. Jesus Christ hath conquered death, and plucked the wreath of triumph from the grave. He has conquered death for me; mine is the victory. Me hath He released from that dreaded iron bondage. Me hath He released that I might serve Him, love Him, rejoice in Him, praise Him evermore.—Phil. Sunday Republic.

TO THE SUNDAY MORNING HERALD (Syracuse, N. Y.).—In your "Religious column" of the 22d inst. appears a very irreligious article over the signature of "Friend." The writer, who is evidently an enemy to Christianity, seems very much disturbed because by the united efforts of our noble clergy, the law suppressing the public sale of spirituous liquors on the Sabbath day has been put in force. The world is becoming full of such people, who seek to destroy the sanctity of the Sabbath day by assuming that "all days are alike holy," or that none of the days of the week are to be observed as holy time—for one assertion is just as reasonable as the other. If our Friend will read his Holy Bible, he will find between its blessed covers a direct command to "Remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy." God rested upon that day from his labors and was refreshed, and he sanctified it to all men—and for all time to come.

The Christian Church, with its clergy, have done many noble things, but much more remains for them to accomplish. Our present Constitution, which does not recognize Christianity, or Jesus as our Lord and Savior, is imperfect and must be amended so that we can, if necessary, legally enforce those who have no respect for God's laws, to at least desist from the publication and circulation of Radical tracts and other infidel documents that tend to unsettle and poison the young minds of our rising generation.—Christian.

THE JESUITS.—While the Society of Jesus is monopolizing public interest in Germany, a few statistical statements respecting it may not be out of place. The order comprises altogether twenty-two provinces, and a contingent of 8,809 members. Castilia takes the lead in point of numbers, its roll amounting to 944 members. Germany follows next, with 738. Austria has only 456. The application of the bill to Jesuits proper is practically limited to the kingdom of Prussia and the diocese of Ratisbon, in Bavaria, these being the only parts of the empire in which Jesuits are legally tolerated; and even in Ratisbon they have crept in by an evasion of the law. These figures, quoted according to Professor Von Schulte, convey a very inadequate idea of the real extent of Jesuit power; for Jesuit influence, as he points out, pervades and tinges, controls and directs, the entire clerical system in Germany, which has become a formidable organization. There are no fewer than 18,000 Roman Catholic priests in Germany, besides 11,000 members of convents. Adding to these the pupils in Catholic seminaries, the "Old Catholic" Professor computes the entire Romanist army at 50,000, led and marshalled by the Jesuits. The vigor of its growth in late years M. Von Schulte describes as marvellous. In the five cities of Breslau, Treves, Cologne, Munster, and Paderborn, alone, it amounts to 2,324, which is equivalent to the 126th inhabitant in Cologne, and the 140th in Treves. In Paderborn there is a priest, monk, or nun to every forty inhabitants. Altogether there are established in Prussia 97 monastic orders and congregations, comprising 1,060 members; 11 of these are Jesuit establishments, containing 160 members, and 5 are Redemptionist monasteries, with 69 members. The number of convents and sisterhoods recognized in Prussia is 626, with 5,586 members—i. e., 1,800 more than in 1865. Bavaria owns 71 monasteries, with 1,045 members, and 188 nunneries, with 2,563 members. What gives particular umbrage to German laymen is that most of these orders are subordinated to superiors resident in foreign countries; namely, the Dominicans, Mendicants, Jesuits, Redemptionists, Lazarists, Augustines, and Carmelites to Italians, and the Trappists, School-brethren of La Salle, Borromeus, School-sisters, and Benedictines to French.—Exch.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OXFORD HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1873. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED previously, Nine Hundred and Sixty-Seven Shares, $86,700
W. A. THURSTON, West Newton, Mass., One Share, 100
$86,800

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending February 1, 1873.

J. Landman.....	$ 2.00	T. P. Withrop.....	1.00
Jno. F. Arnold.....	3.00	D. A. Nicholson.....	1.00
D. H. Bond.....	3.00	Dan I. W. Wardwell.....	75
C. S. Minor.....	3.00	Frank J. Wood.....	3.00
Henry Stricker.....	2.00	V. B. B. Reber.....	1.00
M. H. Doolittle.....	3.00	R. M. Watson.....	75
Geo. Thornton.....	1.50	W. W. Randall.....	3.75
N. S. Aleock.....	8.00	Lyman Rice.....	3.50
E. H. Harris.....	75	Wm. Binne.....	1.70
J. C. Dexter.....	3.00	Burr Harris.....	3.00
Wm. Jabine.....	3.00	A. F. Freeman.....	1.50
C. S. Weeks.....	1.50	F. Lindley.....	10
Harriet Brothers.....	3.00	David Craig.....	10
H. N. Brown.....	8.00	James M. Aldrich.....	10.00
M. A. Talmage.....	3.00	Wm. Jabine.....	20.00
Andrew Stall.....	1.00	W. C. Gannett.....	50
H. Chapin.....	1.00	J. Andrew.....	50
Whitot Lake.....	1.00	Bell Hardy.....	1.00
G. H. Holbrook.....	1.00	Francis Alger.....	30.00
Jno. Butler.....	25	Joel S. Richards.....	10
W. C. Fisk.....	8.00	Jesse Matteson.....	10
R. Butler.....	1.50	Thos. Hunt.....	10
T. H. Callahan.....	1.00	Dr. Trefert.....	90
Arthur Springer.....	3.00	Rond & Martin.....	3.12
Fred G. Allen.....	3.00	E. M. Waddell.....	7.00
Jno. Sawyer.....	3.00	T. C. Knapp.....	35
Abner Forbes.....	1.50	J. D. Edmundson.....	3.00
L. Fritch.....	75	H. Thomas.....	25
Nina Moore.....	2.75	Jno. F. Conroy.....	20
J. B. Kingsley.....	1.00	A. F. Hartman.....	1.00
Wm. E. Mott.....	3.00	T. M. Cook.....	3.00
Alex. Bates.....	1.00	Mrs. Orren Gillett.....	85
David E. Uley.....	1.00	R. B. Hampton.....	2.00
Ango. Haigh.....	1.00	Joel Shaw.....	2.00
E. N. Cook.....	1.00	F. French & Son.....	4.00
J. H. DeLaure.....	1.00	Mrs. Farrar.....	3.00
J. S. Palmer.....	1.00	R. R. Parker.....	3.00
F. A. Ely.....	1.00	J. J. Brackett.....	8.00
Isaac Mills.....	30	John Carew.....	3.00
Horace Foster.....	50	C. A. Mitchell.....	3.00
Albion A. Perry.....	0.00	Mrs. D. G. Shillock.....	3.00
M. E. Martin.....	1.50	Mrs. T. Venable.....	3.00
Lyman Hodson.....	3.00	W. A. Parker.....	4.00
Geo. H. Kingsbury.....	3.00	Wm. Zimmerman.....	1.50
E. E. Bird.....	3.00	R. K. Price.....	1.00
Byron M. Smith.....	3.00	Geo. W. Shook.....	50
W. P. Gardner.....	3.00	Loighman Emmons.....	85
Chas. W. Newton.....	3.00	T. Ellsworth.....	8.00
M. M. Waterman.....	3.00	Adolph Loeb.....	25
W. Milligan.....	3.00	N. E. Boyd.....	25
Geo. Sanies.....	3.00	Mary C. Davis.....	25.00
Miss S. E. Donu.....	3.00	Ezra Phillips.....	75

The Index.

FEBRUARY 8, 1873.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers. The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 2, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.

OTAVIUS BROOKS PROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HINGINSON, WILLIAM J. PUTNER, RICHARD P. HALLGREN, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VORREY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Please send all matter intended for any particular issue of THE INDEX at least a fortnight in advance of date. We shall be very greatly obliged by attention to this request.

THE FIRST LIBERAL LEAGUE.

The honor of organizing the first "Liberal League," since the call for such organizations appeared in THE INDEX, belongs (so far as we know) to the Liberals of St. Louis, Missouri. A few of them met at a private residence, on the evening of January 10, and resolved themselves into "The Liberal League of St. Louis," electing the following officers: Mrs. M. A. McCord, President; J. Gallion, Vice President; P. A. Lofgreen, Recording Secretary; Louis La Grille, Corresponding Secretary; E. K. Thomas, Treasurer.

This organization is in the spirit of direct response to the appeal so stirringly put forth, in the first number of the enlarged INDEX, by Mr. Abbot. In his temporary absence, I give it my cordial welcome, being well assured also that I speak the language at least of his own heart. May the cause of religious emancipation proceed to its final sure success! A. W. S.

FREE RELIGION AND THE YOUNG.

Every cause appealing to the enthusiasm and zeal of men for support must depend largely for its success on the rising generation. Truth does not travel with seven-leagued boots, but arrives slowly and toilfully at the goal of triumph. Few reforms, in Church or State, are so fortunate as to secure any thing like success in the same generation in which they begin. Little more than the seeds of truth can be sown to-day: the coming-to-morrow must ripen and advance those seeds to full fruition. The present generation is possessed of accumulated prejudices, hardened convictions, dogmatic views, which offer but ungenial and stubborn soil to germs of larger thought and freer faith. Established institutions and ideas proceed to their dissolution with vigorous tardiness, disputing every inch of the way, and often dying out only in the death of those who have fortified them with a life-long devotion. The present generation inherits the past; the rising generation are heirs of the future.

Free religion must bethink itself of the needs, the claims, the hopes, the capacities of the young. It must do this for its own sake and theirs. Its plain interest appears in securing them as its allies, in winning them to come forward with ready hand and firm will and buoyant spirit, to take the banner it unfurls and carry it forward on its triumphant way. To enlist the ardor of youth in its behalf would be a mighty gain. How poor would have been the plight of our nation in its late day of sore trial, had not the young life-blood of the North bounded to its rescue!

Our young men (guided indeed by many wise counsels of age) really fought the war of civil freedom through to its close, and planted the nation's flag of victory over their own monumental graves. It is a noble sight, indeed, to see elderly men and women hail with welcome and cheer with heartiness any new cause that steps out in advance of the old fixed limits of thought and custom, promising better things to come than have ever yet transpired—a sight, thank Heaven, that we are sometimes permitted to behold; but caution and conservatism are natural traits of age, while daring and enterprise are equally so of youth. Old men for counsel, young men for action. And the time for action is at hand. Another war is upon us—a war whose mutterings, and sometimes pealing thunders, have been heard all along down the ages; not a war I believe of swords, nor of mere words, but a war of ideas, of thoughts, of arguments. Petitions are to be carried, documents circulated, clubs formed; and the energetic hand and spry foot of youth will be in great demand. The enthusiasm and hopefulness of intelligent, clear-headed, aspiring young men and women infuse new life into any cause and impart to it a vigorous impulse. When age falters in the path and holds with nerveless grasp the banner of progress and reform, youth bounds forward and grapples with lusty might the drooping standard and marches in the fearless van.

Let free religion therefore look to it, that, for its own sake, for truth's sake, it wins and secures the young for its allies. Their life-blood offers the freest channel through which the spirit of the age may pour its strong and freight-full tides.

But for another reason, let free religion appeal to the young. For their sake this is necessary. Although the condition of youth is one of which we can always hope much, and prophesy much, its actual condition is sometimes sad enough. The youth of any land stand ever in need of stirring appeals from high principles and noble causes, lest they sink into deeper ruts of conformity and conservatism than those in which their fathers jog. But shall I use a needless emphasis if I say that the youth of this land especially need to be roused by such appeals? Worldliness, inanity, shallowness, frivolity, stupidity, are their doom if they be not! This country is on the high-road to materialism at a rapid pace; not speculative materialism, but practical, which is worse. Our civilization is fearfully material; the intellectual, spiritual, and moral elements in it are lamentably undeveloped. American men, for the most part, are devoted either to money-getting or office-seeking. American women, for the most part, are either vain-seekers of pleasure or uninspired toilers at household drudgery. Every year, thousands upon thousands of our finest young men are graduated from school and college into active life as mere fortune-hunters. They give their time and strength and talent to just the end of amassing wealth. And for what purpose? Not to obtain noble leisure to carry forward the cultivation of their superior faculties—the intellectual, spiritual, æsthetic, social; not to obtain enviable power to do good,—to promote benevolent, philanthropic, humanitarian causes and interests. Were these the ultimate ends of their ceaseless toil and scheming, the pursuit of wealth in their case would be ennobled and justified. But it is to quite other purposes that they devote the dawn and noonday of their lives. It is to gratify a mad passion for excitement in business speculation and gambling; to roll up the means for lavish splendor and luxurious living and costly outshining of others; or, may be, to get into their hands the instrumentalities for swaying masses and assemblies of men, for controlling corporations, municipalities, legislatures,—in other words for corrupting politics, and preparing the smooth way on which they may slide into public station, all worthless and unmeritorious for such eminence though they be. American business and politics are largely a game of "toss up—heads you win, tails I lose;" and the cunning, not the righteous, take the prizes.

And American society, in which our women and girls figure, is it not shallow and frivolous to an alarming degree? Here, too, the mad passion for excitement reigns; the excitement of fashionable living, of pursuing pleasure, of spinning the top of existence round and round in the giddy mazes of social dissipation, until the poor victim's head is filled with light and volatile particles, and not ballast of character enough left to enable her to walk steady in any highly useful and truly happy career. Or, as wife and mother, our American woman settles down into the monotonous life of the family, losing well nigh all ambition for and interest in that other life of ideas and thoughts, whence inspiration comes to quicken and lighten duty.

This is the public and this the private life into which too many of our boys and girls are born, too many of our young men and women introduced. It is a life which drains the finest energies out of manly and womanly character, and which, were it not to be interrupted by a clarion summons to something vastly different and vastly better, would slide our rising generation downward into a degraded state of mind and morals. The late civil war was a godsend, in that in some sense it brought such a summons, as also an occasion which lifted our American society to a superior plane of thought and action, where it was kept for a time, baptized in the blood of martyrdom and in the name of liberty.

But free religion comes with a summons fuller and grander yet. It sounds the tocsin of another strife—a strife still for liberty, but now not the liberty of a race, of a nation merely, but the liberty of humanity; the liberty of the human mind and soul. Christianity, as a distinct and established form of religion, has done its best service for man; nobly done, indeed, and God be thanked for all its good. But henceforth its influence will preponderate to man's disadvantage rather than his gain. Christianity makes not the truest statement of man's actual and possible condition; it makes not the highest appeal to his human nature. It primarily appeals, not to man's self-respect, his latent natural capacity for magnanimous action, his slumbering interest in truth, his unquickenened zeal for right, his undeveloped sense of justice, his unenlightened perception of purity; it appeals rather to his selfishness and his cowardice. It tells him that he is a sinner, and that only Christ can make him anything else; that as a sinner he is hopelessly lost, now and forever; that as a follower of Christ his salvation, though post-mortem, is secure. His only alternative is hell or heaven, perdition or glory; to his fear of the one and his hope of the other it appeals, and makes the choice to turn upon the acceptance or non-acceptance of a doctrine, the observance or non-observance of a form, the performance or non-performance of a ceremony. Arbitrary rules are magnified into absolute duties, partial statements into positive truths. Thus Christianity does, in a certain sense, demoralize men; it degrades where it would improve, and darkens where it would instruct. It obfuscates the intellect, palsies the will, unhealthily stimulates the conscience. The young inherit this great legacy of crudeness, falsity, superstition, and immorality. By this process we find them manufactured into premature "saints," wearing the titles of "salvation" without the merits of character. We find scores and scores of young men and women, with their souls all nicely "saved" by the Church's most approved methods, whose characters are wholly unformed by any decent model, and whose lives are aimless, frivolous, and rapid to the last degree.

Free religion has a truer statement and a better appeal to make than all this. It comes with faith in man, first and above all things. Of man it never can despair. It makes no statement of his degradation which does not include also an announcement of his natural capacity for improvement and a prophecy of his coming perfection. It appeals to the native manhood in man, to the native womanhood in woman. It appeals to the self-respecting, brave, generous, knightly qualities in human nature; also to the gentle, tender, humble, pure, aspiring. It asks no abasement of the will, no surrender of the conscience, no disuse of the reason. It asks independence rather—utter, fearless, consistent.

It is especially adapted, in all this, to inspire youth, if it can but fairly make its appeal to them. It looks upon them with no lachrymose or morbid sentiment of anxiety, no rueful countenance of threatening or condemnation. It appeals to all in them that has natural belonging to their age; its method with them is education and development, not crucifixion or repression. It furnishes them with fair and noble ideals, lifts up before their eyes grand and glorious opportunities, invests this human life for them with unthought-of significance. It invites them to liberty; it invites them to action; it invites them to heroic enterprise. It gives them thoughts to think that are new, captivating, and inspiring; it gives them aims to cherish which are alluring to the noblest ambition.

Free religion, in short, is adapted to the needs and capacities of the young as well as of the old. It has an appeal to make which is stirring and saving alike to youth and to age. Let radical parents fear not to teach radicalism to their children. If it is truth, it will be safe for the young to know it; far safer, indeed, than to know error and falsity and superstition. It will set free their intellects—one of the prime conditions of growth into noble character; it will impart to them a new sense of the dignity of their nature, and lead them to recognize with joyful surprise their own possibilities. Let radical parents teach radicalism to their children, and then fortify such teaching with their own superior lives.

A. W. S.

AN APPEAL TO LIBERALS.

The Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association would hereby make an appeal to the liberal-minded people of America to increase the membership of the Association. This appeal is made for two reasons. First, it is a point of practical importance that the names of those persons in different parts of the country who are really in sympathy with the Association should be known. That there may be co-operation in the practical work of the Association, there must be this acquaintance. Secondly, it is important that the Association should have an increase of its funds. If all the people in America who really believe in the principles of the Association were to pay into its treasury the annual fee for membership, it would doubtless have all the funds that it needs. We cannot expect this of all. But why can we not have on its roll of membership before the Annual Meeting, the 20th of next May, as many as two thousand new names? It is safe to say that this notice will be read by at least ten thousand persons. Taking the ordinary estimate of the number of readers of each copy of every newspaper that is printed, it should be read by a much larger number than that. But we will suppose that ten thousand persons will not only glance over it, but actually read it. Of these ten thousand, certainly one fifth part must be sufficiently in sympathy with the objects of the Free Religious Association, and sufficiently able pecuniarily, to give it their active support, if they would only take the trouble to do so.

Friends, will not those of you who have not heretofore taken this trouble now take it? Certainly, it is but a small thing to ask of those who really believe in the Association, that they will send to it their names and Post-Office address and the One Dollar which is the fee for Annual Membership. Here is an organization to whose principles you assent; an organization which, through Conventions, Lectures, and Publications, is endeavoring to affect public opinion in America against the various evils of dogmatism, superstition, and sectarianism, and in favor of free, rational, humane, and joyous views of religion; an organization which imposes upon its members no test of speculative opinion or belief, but aims to promote through the free and better culture of human nature the highest interests of truth and virtue. Will you not give it your aid? Who will send us the two thousand new names?

It is desired also that all old members of the Association should renew their subscriptions. The old list of members was partially lost by the Boston fire; but we hope to be able to re-write all the old names. Names and remittances (whether of one dollar or a larger amount) may be sent to the Treasurer, R. P. Hallowell, 89 Commercial street, Boston, or to the undersigned, New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary of Free Religious Association.

The above Appeal for aid to the Free Religious Association will be received, I doubt not, with responsive sympathy by a large proportion of the readers of THE INDEX. I shall wait impatiently to hear how many names and dollars are sent to Mr. Potter by way of reply to it; and if all who send in consequence of it will please mention the fact in their letters, I venture to think that Mr. Potter will record it, and by and by tell us the sum total. The Free Religious Association, or rather the individual officers of it, have given to THE INDEX most constant and generous assistance; let us try, friends, to show that THE INDEX is not ungrateful, but that its subscribers are prompt to return one good act by another. We all believe in the Association; let us all help it now, after its severe losses by the great fire.

F. E. A.

FROTHINGHAM'S "RELIGION OF HUMANITY."

I have been waiting with eager interest for this book, because it has long seemed to me that the author was far better fitted than any one among us to formulate and systematize the thoughts that many of us hold. Certain men—often the most brilliant men—are compelled by their nature to speak for themselves only. It would be absurd to select Bartol or Weiss, for instance, to frame a statement in which many could unite. This would be to lose the peculiar power of the men, the subtlety of their thoughts, the vivacity of their sallies, the brilliant daring of their paradoxes, the freedom and originality of their methods. But Frothingham has his feet always on the earth; he knows precisely what he means to say, and says it. When it is said, he finds—so clear is his brain, and firm and consecutive his thought—that it is precisely the statement for which many are waiting, and in which many can sympathize.

It has sometimes seemed to me, on reading his printed sermons, that they suffer a little from the need of the orator to make points. An orator, in the pulpit or out of it, is constantly tempted to over-weight each important statement a little,—to over-accentuate it, in order to lodge it in the hearer's mind. An epigram or an antithesis will be remembered, where a more carefully guarded combination of statements will take no hold. Be this as it may, this book escapes this danger, and I have found but one instance where the writer has risked being seriously misunderstood for the sake of emphasis. When he says, on p. 103, "The effort to obtain human approval of conduct is incessant; it is the only effort made," he yields to the orator's danger: and, in emphasizing the importance of the human influence around us, he risks being misunderstood.

Comparing Frothingham with Parker, we feel of course a want of that full breadth of hearty humanity, that aroma of the soil, in which that great worker excelled all other men. Not that these things are wanting in the younger man—on the contrary they are always present; but in Parker they abounded and overflowed. Yet the careful student must recognize in Frothingham a more original, more continuous, and far better trained thinker. He is intellectually far closer-grained; rivets his thoughts together; whereas Parker was discursive, popular, and repeated himself profusely. More than any man in America, Frothingham occupies the middle ground between Emerson and Parker,—sharing the high literary standard of the one with the other's hearty allegiance to men and to affairs; and uniting a systematic method which is all his own.

And one thing that delights me in the book is its thoroughly genial and hopeful tone; a thing here especially admirable because it is not with the author a matter of mere temperament, but comes by resolutely trusting and using the best side of his temperament. There are men to whom it costs nothing to be buoyant; it is written in their blood that they should see the sunny aspect of everything. But the author of this book is not moulded all of sunshine. Those who know him know that not a fact of sorrow or of sin escapes him; he has his shadowy side: with a gloomier creed or a feebleness of moral purpose, he might have been driven into cynicism or misanthropy by the resistance or the incredulity of men. As it is, his book is brave, healthful, and heroic from beginning to end. The two closing chapters are, "The Soul of Good in Things Evil," and "The Soul of Truth in Error." They will help many a sensitive and noble nature in its struggle to save itself from a relapse into Romanism, Calvinism, or that greater peril of the age—the Saturday Review.

"We of the Religion," to use the triumphant old phrase of the French Huguenots, are often asked for some one book which shall say what we believe, on the positive side. For one, I know no Englishman, no Frenchman, no German whose statement I could so well accept "for substance of doctrine"—if one were required to accept any—as this of Frothingham's. It is small, but it is rich, strong, weighty, fresh, original—not merely in the sense of saying new things, but of stating old things in the new light of to-day. Add to this, an admirable literary execution (note, for instance, the magnificent statement on pages 119-20, of the results of gradual divergence: "A difference of level makes Niagara." "More or less makes the antipodes"); add also an essentially humane and noble spirit,—and it is plain enough that the President of the Free Religious Association has written a book which no other among its members could have written, but of which all its members may well be proud.

T. W. H.

FREE RELIGION AND SOCIAL REFORMS.

IV.

NATIONAL SCHOOL SYSTEM.

In considering the difficulties in establishing a national public school system, I have already incidentally referred to those offered by the religious differences of our people, which nothing but a faithful adherence to the free religious principle can overcome, and to the great differences of culture and sentiment in different parts of our widely extended country. Another difficulty arises from the different conditions and needs of various classes of people. However unworthy the millennial state or a true republic, there does still exist among us a wide distinction between the rich and poor, between those looking forward to a life of ease and varied enjoyment, and those who know that hard labor for daily bread must be their portion, and that they must bend all their energies to securing material success. The lines of distinction are constantly changing, and many have the opportunity of trying both experiences. Still the distinction exists and largely affects the problem of education.

Now, it is very important that a free public school system should enlist the interest of all classes in the community, so that all shall contribute cheerfully to its support. It needs the culture and perfection of means, which the rich and refined will claim for themselves; it must have the earnestness, economy, and practical aim which is essential to the welfare of the working classes—always the largest and most important portion of the nation.

The establishment of High Schools in New England is tending towards this result, by giving such superior advantages that many wealthy persons prefer to educate their children in them; and as they soon find that those pupils who come up from the grammar schools in regular course are best prepared for the high school, the disposition to send children to the public schools is extending even down to the youngest age. But while this custom raises the character of the schools and leads to better provisions for health as well as instruction, it is possible that the programme of studies becomes sometimes ill-suited to those who cannot look forward to a life of study or leisure.

Some high schools, for instance, are required to fit boys for college; and although but one or two in the town desire this preparation, it takes an undue proportion of the attention of the teachers, to the comparative neglect of the practical sciences. The long summer vacations, too, are very pleasant and may be made profitable to those who can spend them in travel or in pleasure, but are of very questionable advantage to those who have no resources at home, and who often acquire vagrant habits which are difficult to correct during the school term. Pupils who must leave school at an early age are not able to pursue a long course of thorough study, but the teacher should not dismiss them from her care without sowing some seeds for the future in a knowledge of the history of their country, and some taste for literature and art which will stimulate their desire for continued intellectual improvement. But the rich boy often loses as much from the luxurious habits of his home, and the want of motive for exertion, as the poor one does from limited opportunity for learning.

Another great obstacle to this desirable blending of all classes in the public schools is the want of attention to cleanliness and health among the poor. How much excuse there is for this in ill-ventilated and ill-ventilated houses, and in the high price of food, clothing, and labor, we all know; but the fact remains, that in any of the lower grades of public schools, even in our country towns where there is less excuse for it, the air of the school-room is liable to be so vitiated by the persons and clothing of the pupils, that no mother able to do otherwise is willing to expose her young children to it. No amount of care in ventilation on the part of the teacher is sufficient to overcome this evil. And yet it is important for the perfection of the National System, that its citizens should unite in it even in its earliest stages. But as each mother feels the individual care of her own children more strongly than the duty to the public good, there seems to be no remedy for this last difficulty but in the improvement and elevation of the whole people, by spreading abroad a knowledge of sanitary laws, and creating a public opinion that will demand that every child attending school shall be cleanly in person and dress. The reaction on the home life would be very beneficial.

Believing that the blending of all classes in the public schools would be as beneficial to the rich as to the poor, and that the frivolity and contempt for others engendered by exclusive, fashionable schools is more dangerous to public morals than the ignorance or rudeness of the poorer classes, and that each would benefit the other by uniting in earnest study under the care of wise teachers,—it seems to me that a national School System, open to all and adapted to all, is the goal at which we should aim; but that we shall not arrive at it the sooner for overlooking or under-estimating the obstacles in the way.

E. D. C.

METHODS OF REFORM. II.

The Labor Reform party is the only party that, in good faith, has presented Woman Suffrage as a political issue at any State election held in Massachusetts. The Suffrage plank of the Republican platform, regarded in the most favorable light, implies nothing more than good-natured indifference on the part of political managers. During the canvass that succeeded the adoption of this plank by the State Convention, it was not considered binding upon any candidate for any office high or low, and men were elected to the Legislature without the slightest reference to it. The announcement of the Woman's Journal, that Woman Suffrage is or ever has been a Republican issue in Massachusetts, is overwhelmingly disproved by the history of the party. And herein consists the blunder of the Journal. It has assumed to have a very large constituency in the ranks of the Republicans, and by its proclamations has attempted to commit a great party to a measure for which it is not prepared.

The enfranchisement of the women of this country is a foregone conclusion, but it is a conclusion that must be reached by a method different from that of the Journal. It will be arrived at through the religious and political education of the people. Public opinion cannot be forced; it must be educated; and on this subject the women of America must be enlightened before we dare look for substantial victory.

Our representative Journal should plead the cause without concealment and without compromise; in dealing with society, with politics, and especially with the dominant religion, it should be untiringly aggressive and always thoroughly independent. I gladly pay my tribute to the ability and devotion of the Journal, so conspicuous in some departments; but as an advocate of Woman Suffrage, I lament the infatuation of its political direction. An independent Journal, it seems to me, would have thanked such republicans as honestly voted for a suffrage-plank, and condemned such as were too indifferent to oppose it. It would have exposed and denounced the empty professions of a party, and the moral recklessness of a convention, that could declare in favor of an important measure and then deliberately nominate, for the highest office of the State, a man who had proved himself unequal to expressing an opinion on the subject. The Woman's Journal preferred to construe the indifference of a party as an earnest of its sincerity, and the contempt of party leaders as fidelity to the new issue. Entering the political arena, it thought to capture a party—and was itself captured.

I object to the method of the Journal not only because it brings discredit upon the good cause, but because it is essentially a wrong method. It is based upon the principle of expediency, and sacrifices the principle of truth; that is, of absolute right. The moral tone of reformatory journalism is lowered the moment an editor subordinates his idea to political expediency. The moment he consents to modify, to postpone, or to suppress righteous judgment of a political party, especially one from which he has gained something and expects more, that moment he commences his own moral destruction. Mr. Johnson tells us that "by Hindu law, the judge who sits silent and does not deliver his real opinion, is deemed guilty of deliberate falsehood." If Christian editors were subject to Hindu law, I believe we should soon perceive a development of moral courage that would add vastly to the value and credit of American journalism.

R. P. H.

TWO RADICAL BOOKS.

Two books recently published ought not to go unnoticed by THE INDEX, as they are remarkably fine examples of a kind of literature that radicalism alone produces, and that radicalism will by and by, it is hoped, produce in larger quantity. Their author is a young Englishman of excellent ability and university training who was brave enough to flee from a clerical destiny and from certain palpable social advantages in obedience to the call of his intellect; a thing easy enough to do in America where traditions are movable and social bands elastic, but a thing not so easy to do in England where mind only leaves the ruts of routine by force of severe wrenching.

The first of these volumes, reprinted here some years ago, but still almost unknown as yet, is entitled, "The Pilgrim and the Shrine." It describes with wonderful skill, vigor, and brilliancy the outward and inward experience of a young man of education who pushes away from his double home of country and of faith, to seek his fortunes on the opposite side of the terrestrial and intellectual globe. The account of his travels by sea and land, of the customs he falls in with, the people he meets, the minds with which he finds himself in fellowship, the adventures and adventures he encounters,—has all the charm of a romance, observation and reflection being so delightfully blended in every chapter that the reader's imagination is as much entertained as his eye, his intellect as much enriched as his store of information. And the story of the mind's journey from one region of speculative thought to another is narrated with an easy grace, that makes this most delicate and subtle portion of the book seem like the rich, natural bloom, the fresh balsamic odor of the ground over which the traveller passed. The reader is hardly aware of the processes of transition from point to point, so skilfully are the spiritual experiences blended with the natural. Mr. Maitland—for that, as his American publisher, Mr. Putnam, tells me, is his name—is so simple and rational in his methods, his purpose is so sincere, his heart so sound, his perception so true, that no gulf or crack is visible; he carries his reader round the world of belief without a jar, and brings him in cheerful spirits to his journey's end without homesickness or fatigue. He is happy in being where he is; the fresh delight in Nature, the full joy of mental freedom, the content of a healthy and busy soul being more than sufficient compensation for the spiritual flesh-pots he has left at home. "The Pilgrim and the Shrine" ought to be a favorite book with radicals, for it associates their views with knowledge, culture, elegance, wit, and imagination, disproving once for all the charge of baldness so often brought against them.

The second volume is in some respects even more remarkable than the first, though perhaps less easily interpreted. I need not say perhaps, for tolerably intelligent critics have failed to understand it, less through the author's fault, though, than through the cloudiness of their own perceptions. They suspected a mare's nest in it and turned their whole power of discernment on the suspected point, leaving the noble aspects of the book unnoticed. The title, "Higher Law," was not, I think, a fortunate one as it happened; for it had about it a savor which recent agitating discussions on the "Great Social Question" had made excessively offensive to refined people. It was less unpleasantly suggestive in England than here; had the author known that it would be so, he might have affixed to the American reprint a title that would have been more agreeable and equally expressive.

The story turns on the fortunes of two young married people whose personal characters as individuals and as mutually related, as modified by circumstances and determined by temperaments, are probed and exhibited with the mastery of a profoundly thoughtful and a deeply sympathetic mind. The book is a study of human character by purely rational methods, all conventional theories being put aside. The study is made on noble people in a noble style. The argument runs all the way over the uplands of the mind, where the verdure is rich, the horizon wide, the landscape varied, the air bracing, the frequent glimpse of river and hill superb; where the poisonous damps of the sunless valleys never come, and no stench from the low morasses penetrate.

The scenery of the book, natural and social, is magnificent. The old world and the new world send their attractions; the Druidical stones on Salisbury plain compete with the mountains in Mexico; life in ancient Rome and life at Silver Mine exhibit in turn the influences which opposite states of civilization exert on the mind. The chapters are if any thing too crowded with knowledge in many departments and thoughts on many themes; they must be read carefully and pondered well, but they who can appreciate their intellectual wealth will rejoice in their splendor, and they who cannot will find refuge at very frequent intervals in the warm sheltered retreats of human society.

Neither of the volumes contains the polemical passages that are common in books devoted to such high ends as these are. Though abounding in discussions, they are spontaneous, incidental, and facile, like the natural overflow of mental energy at work on favorite themes. Such books are truly emancipating in their influence; they at the same time stimulate and instruct, entertain and educate; entertain while educating and educate while entertaining. Products of a high culture, they create respect for culture; and this is one of the crying needs in America. The greatest questions are brought into disrepute by crudeness and coarseness of mind. It is only when trained and polished intellects grapple with them, that their bearing is disclosed.

O. E. F.

LONDON LETTER.

WHERE THE NEW YEAR FINDS US IN ENGLAND.

LONDON, January 1, 1873.

The London Times—which occasionally gives us an editorial written with a felicity worthy of Jeremy Taylor—closes its New Year greeting with the following sentences: "While we change, all the world changes; and as our own people at home become ripe for this or that addition to their powers or opportunities, all the nations of the world—at least, those within our pale—are advancing to that maturity which precedes a new phase, perhaps a glorious transformation. But they who are too eager for ripeness often find rottenness in its place, and have to be content with it. Let us all move on, gently, and together—at the pace, if possible, that does not kill, but yet makes a day's work. A New Year is the time to wish God-speed to all the wayfarers on the broad road of our common humanity. We would see no laggards, no wanderers, and none pushing on so impetuously as to lose all fellowship of thought and feeling. It is the world's work, not each man's own, that is to be done."

Let me now make another quotation. It is from the Pall Mall Gazette's farewell to 1872. Speaking of Strauss' new work for which Mr. Gladstone's denunciation has created a general demand, it says: "Strauss only says in his own dialect, and in an outspoken systematic manner, what large numbers of other people think in their hearts, and insinuate less distinctly with their lips. To take an illustration of a very different sort, look at the letters which have lately been appearing in the Times about prayers for fine weather. The archbishop makes a polite suggestion that such prayers ought not to be omitted under our present rainy circumstances, and he is immediately confronted by proposers of 'dilemmas for the clergy,' who say that rain is wanted and will do good in the long run, to say nothing of its relieving consumptive patients from the necessity of going to Madeira. We cannot think that we misinterpret these suggestions when we read them as oblique references to one of the great difficulties connected with the whole theory of prayer, the difficulty of knowing what to ask for if one expected to get it. To any one who has observed the signs of the times and the course of opinion, say, for a generation past, it is obvious enough that this state of mind cannot proceed further in the direction in which it has been steadily moving for several generations, without producing immense practical results of a sort which no one can distinctly predict, but which cannot be predicted, however indistinctly, without feelings of the deepest solemnity. Infinite controversy on moral and religious subjects combined with the progress of physical science, and the wide application of its methods to subjects which are not physical, have brought us to religious and moral anarchy. 'Tempus edax, tempus ferax rerum.' The year closes to-night; who knows what to-morrow will bring forth?"

The above two extracts from the ablest journals in England furnish, I think, a pretty fair mirror of the condition in which the new year of Seventy-three finds us. Hopelessly (and hopefully) unmoored from the old dry docks of Christianity, the educated world of England is resolved to move slowly, cautiously,—"gently, and altogether," as the Times advises,—and not set up its shrines on the first mossy or picturesque rock that rises on the sea, however labelled the "Isles of the Blest." The mind of England is not so small that it can be speedily made up. Nothing is more remarkable than to observe how few are they who are now ready to invest their new liberty in the consols of any theory. They use the method of one, and applaud the tendency of another, system; they have a friendly recognition for the Positivist, and a good word for the Secularist. But they refused to be initiated among their devotees. With all the ability associated with Conitism, very few follow it. Professor Jowett, who recently visited the Positivist "School," is said to have remarked that he found there "three per-sous and—no God." The plain fact is that it is a part of the general revolt from the Christian scheme that all schemes are looked upon with suspicion, and the new religion when it comes will come insensibly, without observation, as coral islands are built, or as the seasons are renewed.

And yet there are many appearances around us which would enable a reactionist to write just as hopefully of the signs indicating a backward march toward the Dark Ages. Corresponding with the tendency of the liberated to become ever more free, is a tendency of the enthralled to become more entangled with the yoke of bondage. Every year the Roman Catholics become more ultramontane, the ritualists more Romanist, the orthodox dissenters more superstitious. How few see that this intenser shadow is due to the intenser light! How few see in these retrogressions the evidence that the educated have abandoned these several systems and left to the ignorant that complete control by which they are able to degrade them without further hindrance from thinkers, and make them into their own image and likeness! The advance of error in churches is in the exact ratio of the ebbing away of intelligence from them. And that advance has gone on so rapidly that it tends more and more to distil all lingering elements of culture from them. We repeatedly hear of things occurring—especially in these Christmas times—in churches, that once would have hardly been borne by their worshippers; such as the worship of the babe in its manger, by toy-representation on altars with cattle standing around, in the Catholic churches, and in both Catholic and Ritualistic the novelty of adoring certain particular parts of the wounded body of Jesus. It is the belief of the Buddhists that Buddha, when dying, bequeathed his body to be made into separate objects of adoration. These physical relics of Buddha are preserved in fine temples, chiefly in Ceylon. In London we also now see in the ritualist organ advertisements for hair shirts. Greater sanctity than in former years seems also to be attached to sacred trees and plants. I doubt if any devout Tree-worshipper among our Saxon fathers—in deference to whom the holly, mistletoe, and ivy were retained for the Yule festival—would, should he appear now on earth, feel much like a Rip Van Winkle while entering some of our churches. And perhaps he would join warmly in singing such verses as these which I take from a Christmas Carol just composed:—

"Happy, thrice happy, the glorious time,
When the holly expels with its verdure sublime
The dulness that broods like a nightmare o'er all
From the poor man's low hut to the gorgeous lit hall.
CHORUS: For the ivy-decked roof-tree bids true to our sorrow,
And our Baby-King comes with salvation to-morrow.
"Now clean be the hearth-stone and blazing the log,
No cokes from the gas-house nor turf from the bog.
The log burning bright bids the faithful remember,
That in Bethlehem's crib wept the Lord in December.
CHORUS: For the ivy-decked," etc.

Where a little more "progress" of this kind will land our retrogressives I leave you to judge. Recently there occurred our annual Day of Intercession, on which all the clergy of the Established Church held special services and prayers for the sending of more laborers into the field of Foreign Missions. The occasion was followed by a sharp discussion in the press as to why more missionaries did not come forward to keep up the work so zealously begun by Heber and others; and why those who did go among the heathen had so little success. The actual and very obvious source of the difficulty was not touched; namely, that intelligent clergymen no longer believe that the "heathen" are going to hell for lack of Christianity, and that the said "heathen" find in the Christianity brought them by the unintelligent a poor re-bash of their own exploded myths. But you may judge with what feelings the cultivated Hindus, Parsees, and Mussulmans now in our English Universities and Law Courts read along with the intercessory services for their races such rural items as the recent sale of his wife along with other furniture for 10s. by a man at Watford; and also the following, which I quote from the latest newspaper laid on my table. At Hull, Henry Jackson, drum-major to the Hull Volunteer Rifle Corps, was committed on charge of swindling a farmer named Richardson of about thirty pounds, by pretending to cure him with magical prescriptions from India labelled, "Two Dozen Sacred Trees," the "Elixir of Life" etc.

"Remarkable superstition was brought to light to-day at the Dorset Quarter Sessions. Charles Curtis, an elderly man, of Ramplsham, was charged with obtaining money by false pretences from William and Jane Davis—a laboring couple living in the parish of Broadmayne. Davis had a son who is affected with idiosyncrasy and epilepsy. The poor man believed that some evil spirit was about the boy, and resorted to Curtis, 'he being a cunning man.' Prisoner said 'he'd see what he could do,' and obtained payment of ten shillings. In the autumn Davis went to Curtis again, and asked him 'How about the boy?' The wizard replied, 'He'll get better after a bit.' By this time Davis fancied himself possessed of an evil spirit, and prayed the pretended exorciser to deliver him also. He fancied both he and his son were overlooked by some evil person, and besought Curtis 'to take the spirit off them.' He was told it would cost some money to make him right; but he had faith. They had paid to the prisoner during the past eighteen months about £20 from their savings and earnings. He had given them no medicine, but he once told Mrs. Davis that her husband must do away with the pick he had lent to the stable-boy Trent, for 'that was the biggest part of the mischief'; accordingly Davis got the pick and buried it. So late as last Saturday Mrs. Davis took Curtis £2 4s. As to the result, Davis said his son was better, but with regard to the effect on himself he could give no satisfactory account. Superintendent Hare, of Dorchester, had heard of these proceedings, and caused prisoner to be apprehended. He was sentenced to six months' hard labor."

For a sixpence too the pagan in London may purchase Zadkiel's Almanac for 1873 which is widely circulated, and in the preface thereof read the following: "Not a day goes by without furnishing freely evidences of the power of the stars. Only now do I read of the assassination of the Governor General of India, who was stabbed twice in the back on the 8th of February this year 1872. I turn to the Ephemeris for 1822, on the 21st of February, at which time he was born; and lo! I find the Moon at noon that day in Aquarius, 28°10', and the evil Mars in close opposition to her, from Leo, 29°14', in which sign, as all astrologers know, he rules the back. Hence was he stabbed in that part of the body. (So was H. R. H. Prince Alfred—born with the evil Mars in Leo squaring the Moon—8th August 1814—and he also was shot in the back.) But there was no kind of fatality in the matter. Had he (and Mayo) been educated aright, had he understood the fundamentals of astrology, he might, and no doubt would, have escaped the fatal blow; for he never would have ventured into India when a large solar eclipse was pending, on the 22d December 1870; with the Sun, Moon, Saturn, and Venus all joined on the place of the malefic Uranus, in his nativity and in the ruling sign of India.—Zadkiel Tao Sze."

Truly said the wise Confucius to the Governor of Yih: "Make glad those who are near, and those who are distant will come. The falling of men is that they neglect their own field to dress that of others. They acquire much of others, but little of themselves." M. D. C.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

BOSTON RADICAL CLUB.—"THE VALIDITY OF CHRISTIANITY."

There was a large gathering of friends at No. 17 Chestnut street, to hear Dr. Bartol on the above-mentioned subject. He began by saying: "There seem to be three parties in the field—Christian, extra-Christian, and anti-Christian; and these exhaust the subject"—and continued substantially as follows:—

Our religion as observed and established has a value it is impossible to increase, and to defend the inheritance to which we have a warrant—deed is our whole duty; or, this is an old, antiquated superstition, an incumbrance on our prosperity, like Turkey, the sick-man; or, it is an estate to be altered and enriched, as you put new fertilizers into your field or the modern improvements into a house,—a capital not to lie dead but changed, re-invested in a thousand forms, and run like blood in the social frame. The methodical way is not to begin squarely outside of Christianity and end with impeachments of it. For one need not refer to what he is alien from; he has no interest in a duel with it; his logic were indifference: as we are more independent of Great Britain than we were in the Revolutionary war; the Israelites were peer of the Egyptians with the Red Sea rolling be-between; and when a religion is done you will not talk about it. Yet the destructive is not the character of any great man. Moses, Mahomet, Socrates, Buddha, Jesus, Saul,—they own the past which they come to fulfil. The window that overlooks your land after twenty years you cannot build against. Christianity is a great window. Possession is nine points of the moral law. Some twenty years ago a mouse among Boston titles brought an action against Harrison Gray Otis, whose success would have swept away a part of Beacon, Chestnut, and Mt. Vernon streets—a section perhaps big as the burned district—as a common for the poor. You cannot rip up the social system. What holds the ground has a certain right to hold it. Christianity is here as an appointed fact. The doctrine of Darwin is true of the mind and the species we belong to, as well as of animals and plants; there is a struggle for life and a survival of the fittest ideas, qualities, customs, institutions; and with what ill grace we kick at the antecedents which were the stem, and the commencements which were the root, though in deep clefts and vile mud, out of which a purity greater than Illies unfolds! The past is the ground for one foot of progress; the other is the air. Can any individual make his religious faith out of whole cloth? The architecture of the bank-swallow, the hive of the bee, is no original or sudden skill, but the triumph after ages of additions. Honor the divine and human parentage, not only in the house and head, but in the faith and temper they bequeathed you. Not only liberty and independence are their legacy, but instinct and custom too.

You would do away with Christianity. What have you to put in its place? No criticism, no negation, no philosophy, till you have persuaded society to accept and travel on the road-bed you lay, can fill the awful vacuum its sudden exile and total departure would make. Mr. Revere describes his encounter on high seas with that tremendous kind of billow rising from an earthquake or electricity, called a bore. But for his ship's high bulwark, the racing liquid mountain would have dashed his vessel like foam to the deep. Though a new island or continent of truth should appear as the consequence through the boiling main, what a void of distraction must attend the summary disappearance of a concrete fact like Christianity, which, with all its groundless assumptions and obsolete absurdities and every proud contribution of radical thinking, still represents in the present nations of the globe the majority by all odds of what sanctity and trust and piety and hope and zeal and love are yet in the world! Yet as the iceberg, a mile in girth, that dips from the pole, to roll and split and melt, doubtless Christianity undergoes change, is steadily assimilated and absorbed. A great swallow and digestion the whole Humanity has; nothing so big and grand in an idea, gospel, or revelation it can not take down and dispose of. Because we are appropriating the religion, getting what there is in it out into ourselves, and combining it with other things, therefore vanishes the old over-awing form. We are liquidating the draft on the human soul. Not a cent will be lost because it does not, as some stupidly insist, represent all our riches: it will accomplish its object in passing into other shapes.

There are flaws in every record, defects in all holy books. The Mosaic Law recognizes no obligation of truth; one of the ten commandments forbids false witness on the ground of injury to a neighbor, but veracity enjoined for its intrinsic beauty we do not find. And in the New Testament, with all its fine spirit, there is no doctrine of liberty on the strength of which we could unbind the captive, no emancipation but subservience proposed for woman, no rights of animals affirmed, no sentiment of temperance, no exposition of peace and war, or labor, education, or art. We are thrown upon reason and conscience, and our own hints from the Holy Ghost. Withal we take in the religion, not the religion us. It is impossible to recover the first discipleship. It is hunting for the morning star at noon-day. Christianity is not a fixture but a flow, a river of God full of water; but no two persons, far less generations, bathe in the same stream. This change is a transfiguration more glorious than amazed Peter and James and John. But Jesus is dramatized as an actor, dressed up as lay-figure, clothed with a consciousness of office, as a public functionary, with the weight of nations on his shoulders, and publishing his importance as a messiah to all time: when, I doubt not, he was as natural and familiar as any friend, and would not be a Christian or understand Christianity if he appeared now, but a loving noble person illustrating unawares all he said in what he did and was.

Christ did not unsent conscience as a go-between, so that we are saved and loved for his sake. No! If I am not saved for my own sake let me be hated and lost. For one thing I cannot give up to any assumed primogeniture, my place in the family, though I be the infant last born; and if I be a bondman and no child, I will cry out louder than "Prometheus bound" against this worse than human slavery, whose example is set by God, and say to the Almighty himself: "Give me liberty or give me death;" for, if I am not free of the household, I will have nothing to do with the house. Why am I able so to speak? Because the soul, so long a minor or a slave, has come of age and knows that it alone, beyond all proxy or representative, is constituent and has rights Heaven is bound to respect.

The book of inspiration closed? Nay, it never opened—that infinite volume. All flows, said the Greek. But who shall unseal the fount of this sacred Nile? It is an everlasting flux, older than any outward thing. We call this great modern bend of the current, Christianity. Best names import! Some great soul starts every enterprise, plants the new idea. I notice that radicals, who protest loudest against leadership, never get Socrates and Jesus out of their minds. When one said he did not think he should have liked such an inquisitive man as Socrates very well, or even Jesus altogether, another answered, "He is hard to suit." The soul is hard to suit with aught below beauty invisible and without bound; yet all the great religions have had a personal origin,—none of them born of abstractions,—every one an incarnation: in my free religious neighbor's window still hang the Christmas wreaths. It is the glory of Jesus that he stood for the soul. But we are not the soul; only poor part of it, and must revolve about who is more. And yet the hard urging on us of any historic character as the only example, is profanity in the guise of piety. "Desecrated by the British in 1775-6," is the inscription on a marble tablet at the Old South Church. Does the theologian think he may violate a greater sanctuary and trample on a purer shrine, when with his invading dogmas he subjects a child's liberty to think? Not only is one's thought sacred: nothing else in the universe is. It is God to us; it is God in us. We must have our thoughts of Jesus; he must submit to that solvent which he himself has made more searching; and if we find that his verbal portrait fills not, or anyway contravenes our conception of excellence; that he is not, as Pope says,

"That faultless monster which the world ne'er saw,"

—we must stand by our perception though the frame of nations and high altars of ages fall, for the voice of God, his perennial communication, must have room. Only your dam makes it rage and riot in your ruin; let it run, it will itself rear grace and safety for its banks. But it differentiates every moment its drops; no Son of God can be religious for another. Our religion must be a fresh procession. Even the glacier's particles shift in its course down the mighty gorge. Even the atoms of the rock dance. The pyramids stand, but were not to Egypt what they are to us. The Spirit says, "Behold, I make all things new."

In listening to the essay, Mrs. Cheney was reminded of a book she had just been reading, in which an artist at one time declared that the line of beauty is a curve; at another time he sees beauty only in straight lines. She thought we ought to recognize and value the curve of the past, and also believe in the straight line that leads into the new future,—as the essayist did. Still she thought there was a real demand for uncompromising statement. We are passing through a period of transition, and need all the light clear, strong, rational convictions can bring. She recalled a remark of a distinguished man who said that the reason women invented nothing was because they were too sympathetic, clinging to the past with so great a reverence. No one invented anything who did not despise the past. She did not fully endorse the sentiment, but seemed, as I thought, to find a degree of truth in it.

Mrs. Dall did not at all like the idea of despising any of God's manifestations, past or present. She thought all progress began with appreciation. The past was our inheritance. We were to improve upon it by first understanding it.

Mr. Morse asked if it were possible to understand the past. We had grown up out of it, and in a sense away from it. It would not be right to say we despise the past; but was it not true that all new inventions or original work came from a forgetting of the past, the person living rather in his vision, with face to the future? Too great a study of and reverence for past achievements had a tendency to repress original effort and leave genius satisfied with copying—as was the case with many artists who, fleeing to Rome, produced nothing better nor as good as the old. He was afraid at first that Dr. Bartol was going to put upon us the whole burden of the old Christian religion, but as he proceeded and swept out into the flowing stream of the present time, he seemed to bring us all out into the broadest light and liberty. He thought that the protest against Christianity was justified by the remark in the essay, that Jesus here now would not understand Christianity, nor accept it if he did. If Jesus would not accept it, why should we?

Mrs. Cheney spoke in regard to art. She did not think that genius could be harmed by a profound knowledge of the works of the old masters. The trouble was that the study was not faithful enough. She thought nothing so bad as a conscious effort at being original. The thing was to do true and faithful work, and the originality would take care of itself.

Prof. Clark said that the idea that we must in any sense despise the past was unscientific. We needed a knowledge of the past that we might not waste time in repeating what had already been accomplished. If we were unacquainted with discoveries already made, we put ourselves out of the line of progress.

Mr. Garrison spoke of the great difficulty of defining Christianity. Scarcely any two persons were agreed in regard to it. It was a matter of interpretation; and with such a variety of interpretations, it could not be a universal religion. So with the Bible. What does the Bible teach? He did not agree with Dr. Bartol that those who advocated slavery were supported in that position by either the Old or New Testament. He had found them both strongly anti-slavery. But that was his interpretation; others had other interpretations. It was better to fall back upon our sense of right and wrong, upon reason, and our humanity, instead of wrangling about authorities. He had, however, regarded Christianity as simply love of God and man. Thus each succeeding age gave a broader and nobler interpretation, gradually including more and more of the race, discovering new rights and duties. And in this line lay our progress. Mr. Garrison spoke at some length, and said many good things which I regret I cannot report.

Literary Department.

NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS.—All books designed for review in these columns must be addressed to THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

DIE SEMITISCHEN VOELKER. VERSUCH EINER CHARAKTERISTIK VON D. CHWOLSON, ORDENTLICHEM PROFESSOR AN DER KAIS. ST. PETERSBURGER UNIVERSITAET. (The Semitic Peoples. An Attempt at a Characteristic by D. Chwolson, Professor Ordinaris in the Imperial University of St. Petersburg.) Berlin, 1872. 8vo, pp. 64.

The most famous of modern works on the Semite peoples is undoubtedly M. Renan's Histoire Générale et Système Comparé des Langues Sémitiques. As is well known, the author did not confine himself to the discussion of problems purely philological; but announced a series of conclusions upon the general characteristics of the Semites, which were not destined to meet with a reception at all commensurate with the confidence with which they were put forth. The work no sooner appeared than it evoked opposition from various directions. It was so sweeping in its character, involving so many startling contradictions of accepted theories and, on many points, such a complete reversal of the settled estimate of scholars, that it naturally became subject to the most searching criticisms. M. Renan had taken pains to assert that the only races which were of any consequence in the history of civilization were the Aryan and the Semitic; but, unfortunately, his estimate of the peculiarities and the achievements of each of these races was such as to offend the learned representatives of both. The scholarly Semite might be willing to "lay the flattering unction to his soul" that the world would never have attained to the conception of the One God if it had not been for his ancestors; but how could he bear to be told that his kinsfolk were a race inférieure, utterly without capacity for the higher order of poetry, for science, philosophy, the plastic arts, or for civil life? So, on the other hand, the erudite and philosophic Aryan might well regard with complacency the mighty part which M. Renan assigned to him in the history of culture, but how could he submit to the humiliating assertion that with all his "superiority," and all his philosophical acuteness and profundity, all his powers of generalization and abstraction, he was wholly unable to arrive at the idea of the Divine Unity, and had been compelled to take it as a gift from an "inferior race"? The very position could not be otherwise regarded by the representatives of both of M. Renan's great factors in the civilization of mankind than as a declaration of war. It was not only an outrage upon the pride of race on both sides, but it was the negation of some of the surest results of philological and historical investigation.

In his brilliant paper on "Semitic Monotheism," Max Müller gave M. Renan's hypothetical religious "instinct," which had evolved the notion of the Divine Unity, a most terrible mauling. So terrible, indeed, was the havoc which he had made with it, that he was evidently seized with a kind of sorrow for what he had done. It has been playfully said that, after Kant had marched the theological and philosophical God out of the front door of his mansion of "pure reason," his trusty servant Lampe compassionately opened the back door into a little "practical" parlor, and let the old gentleman in again. Mr. Müller read M. Renan an excellent lecture on the danger of "transferring expressions from one branch of knowledge to another." He told him that the word "instinct" had its legitimate application in natural history, but that when applied to the conscious thoughts of conscious beings," it was "strained beyond its natural capacities." He demonstrated, moreover, that the alleged monotheistic instinct of the Semitic race was inadequate to explain the phenomena of history. But, alas! in a moment of weakness, Mr. Müller allowed himself to commit the very fault for which he had reproved his opponent. He imagined himself confronted by M. Renan with the difficulties which had led him to adopt the hypothesis of a monotheistic instinct, and, forgetting what he had said about the danger of transferring expressions, he immediately proceeded to make the most dangerous of all conceivable transfers—that of the notion of "special Divine revelation" from the domain of theology to that of philology and philosophy.

Here was M. Renan's fault in a grosser and less excusable form. For while it is unquestionable that the term "instinct" has its legitimate application in natural history, it is, as Mr. Müller must have known, a matter of very great question whether the term "special Divine revelation" has any real application, i. e., whether it corresponds to any fact, even in the science from which he borrowed it.

The objections which Mr. Müller raised against the hypothesis of a monotheistic instinct were absolutely unanswerable; but when he substituted for it a special divine revelation he surrendered all the advantage of his victory, and assumed a position even less defensible than the one he had so successfully carried. He voluntarily withdrew from the impregnable fortress of positive knowledge to take up his stand in the bottomless morass of theological speculation. After all the brilliant argumentation, it turns out simply that what the prodigal Frenchman had spread out over the whole Semitic race, the chary German concentrates in a single man. The indebtedness of "the rest of mankind" is transferred from a race to a single individual. In Mr. Müller's view it is a perversion both of the language of science and of the facts of history, to talk about an entire race, with all its diversity of tribes, arriving at the notion of the Divine Unity by instinct; but perfectly scientific and unquestionably historical to aver that this notion was a gift or grace "granted to one man," after God had "tried and tempted" him and found that he could be "trusted" with it. [Ide "Chips," vol. I., pp. 368-369, Am. ed.] By special favor of the Deity, in consequence of "special faith" and through "special revelation," Abraham became the fountain-head of all the monotheistic religions. If this astonishing announcement were not accompanied by the grave declaration on the part of the author that he "means every word to its fullest extent," we should feel compelled to suppose that for the moment he had condescended to the "parler enfantin of religion," however much out of place such a façon de parler might be in a scientific statement. But, if Abraham is to be made to stand in this relation to the religious development of mankind, we may be pardoned for saying with Mr. Müller, "We want to know more of that man than we do." Why, however, one of the foremost representatives of modern science should have made such extraordinary assertions concerning a man of whom we can scarcely be said to have a single notice that will stand the test of historical criticism, will, perhaps, only be fully clear to minds capable of comprehending how one who, notwithstanding "the little we know of him," has been exalted to the dignity of being "the life-spring of that faith which was to unite all the nations of the earth, and the author of that blessing which was to come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ," can be justly dropped, in the next paragraph but one, to the rank of secondary importance in comparison with the very person (Jesus) who simply transmitted the blessing of which he (Abraham) was the author. Still, apart from all this, it must be remembered that Mr. Müller's refutation of Renan has no necessary connection with his own hypothesis. We may heartily thank him for showing that indisputable facts make it impossible to acknowledge that the Semitic race was endowed with a monotheistic instinct, without going so far in our gratitude as to accept his Abrahamic theory, which also denies to the Aryan race any part in the evolution of "the faith in the One living God." His own published researches into the religious history of the Aryan people contain indications that the theory is not broad enough to embrace all the facts, and a little special attention to the development of the monotheistic idea among the Greek poets and philosophers will put the student on his guard against making any rash admissions.

Professor Chwolson is a Semite and also a very decided opponent of the views of M. Renan concerning the Semite race. The most striking thing about his brochure is the exceedingly condensed style in which it is written. Out of the matter which is contained in its sixty-four pages the majority of authors would have made a respectable octavo volume without adding to the information given or to the clearness with which the arguments are presented. The first fourteen pages are devoted to a discussion of the principal theories which have been adopted to explain the diversity of historical development in the various racés and nations of the earth. The author agrees with Buckle in rejecting the notion that either religion or laws and political institutions have been "the prime movers in human affairs." In addition to this, however, he also utterly rejects Buckle's own theory, that the nature of the soil, the situation and climate of a given country have determined the character, deeds, and destiny of the people dwelling therein. It would be interesting, if the limits of this notice permitted, to exhibit his argument on this point in detail. He certainly adduces an array of facts which cannot be explained on the above hypothesis. But it is more important to call attention to the theory which Professor Chwolson himself advances. Religion, government, soil, climate, and the like, he says, only influence "the form in which the character, whether of an individual or of a people, expresses itself;" it is the character itself which is the constant factor in the history of both individuals and races and which in the last analysis determines their whole development and destiny. The character, we are told, is innate and in its essence unchangeable; and if we want to know why one race or nation has under certain conditions developed itself thus and so, and under certain circumstances has acted thus and so, while another race or nation has under like conditions and circumstances developed itself quite differently and pursued an entirely different course of action, we must find out wherein the character of the two peoples differ. To determine with scientific precision the character of a whole race would seem to the uninitiated an arduous and delicate task, and yet Professor Chwolson is confident that it can be done. He gives us a specimen of such work in what he modestly designates as his "attempt" at a characteristique of the Semitic peoples.

The peculiarities of a people, it is said, are attributable to four main causes: "(1) To the quality of its intellect; (2) to that of its heart and nervous system; (3) to the relation of proportion which these bear to each other; and (4) to the manner in which its mental gifts are distributed, i. e. whether they are represented by a small number of individuals or are generously divided among the mass of the people." Under these rubrics the author proceeds to give a description of character which he assumes will apply to all the Semitic peoples. It is as follows:—

"In regard to intellect: The Semite possesses no such wealth and diversity of ideas as does the Aryan; but he has a sound, practical, one might almost say mathematical, intellect, the power of easy and quick comprehension, and an acuteness that often degenerates into hair-splitting. With such new ideas and conceptions as flow from the intellect alone the Semites have not greatly enriched mankind; but the ideas of this kind which they have once grasped, they have elaborated with the greatest subtlety and pursued to their ultimate consequences.

"In respect to the emotions and to the organization of the nervous system: The Semite possesses deep and easily excited sensibilities, and is capable of powerful emotions; he is therefore vivacious, mobile, excitable, passionate, enthusiastic, active and enterprising, flexible and plastic, easily comprehends new and strange circumstances and conditions, and accommodates himself to them without difficulty, without allowing himself to be absorbed by them.

"Concerning the relation of the qualities of heart and intellect to each other: The excitability and passionateness of the Semite are regulated by the intellect; there is in him a certain equilibrium between head and heart, which preserves them mutually from excesses. The Semite seems, therefore, to oscillate between extremes; for while in the Aryan either the intellect or the heart predominates, we find in the Semite a sharp, incisive intellect in connection with deep poetical emotional nature—reflection coupled with enthusiasm.

"With reference to the distribution of mental gifts: Among the Semites there have been comparatively fewer great men of eminent mental endowment, so-called geniuses, than among the Aryan nations; on the other hand, the masses of the people are more richly endowed among the former than among the latter; so that, if among the Semites fewer geniuses are found, there are among them proportionately more gifted individuals than among the Aryans. There are fewer obtuse and stupid persons among the former than among the latter.

"From these fundamental peculiarities of the Semites are derived the following characteristics: 1. Sobriety of intellect and lack of extravagant phantasy. 2. Sharply defined individuality of each person. 3. Depth and inwardness of the emotional nature, excitability of the same, and, as a consequence thereof, receptivity for humane ideas, inclination to benevolence, easily awakened enthusiasm for an idea, disposition to place mind, ideas, above material forces, a more spiritual conception of the external world and a tendency to idealism."

Now the palpable objection to all this is, that while it may be sufficiently accurate for the ordinary purposes of popular description and delineation, it is by the very nature of the case wanting in the absolute exactness of scientific classification. There is a subjective element in the making up of such judgments which it is impossible to eliminate. It is quite improbable that even that same achevé would satisfy the requirements of all observers, and the filling up would be quite sure to vary very considerably when undertaken by different persons. So when the author informs us that from these characteristics all the manifold phenomena in the life, fortunes, institutions, and intellectual productions of the Semitic peoples can be explained, we confidently expect, before proceeding with him to make the trial, that facts will be selected, and some of them twisted, to suit the theory, and that those which cannot be made to fit into it will be quietly ignored. And so it turns out. Still, it must be admitted that, in spite of the method, the essay is extraordinarily instructive, and the characteristique, perhaps, in the main, quite as successful as any attempt to embrace in one picture the whole spirit and history of so many more or less divergent nationalities, as are comprised under the Semitic race, can ever hope to be. It may be remarked in conclusion that Professor Chwolson does not claim for the Semites the exclusive honor of having given to the world the idea of the Unity of God; and also that, while signaling the virtues of his people, he does not fail to note many of their faults. T. V.

PHYSICS AND POLITICS; Or, Thoughts on the application of the principles of "Natural Selection" and "Inheritance" to Political Society. By Walter Bagehot, Esq., Author of "The English Constitution." New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1873. [Toledo: Brown & Faunce.]

This is the second volume of "The International Scientific Series," a series which should go volume by volume into every radical hand in the country. It—the series—is projected on a plan which will make it a kind of Bible of Positive Knowledge for To-day. It is thoroughly adapted to the non-scientific public, yet gives the best and latest results of advanced science, and it is readable and attractive as well as instructive. Mr. Bagehot, even, who may be thought to have a dry and heavy subject, has made a very interesting book. His style is brisk, clear, vigorous; he deals with a great many interesting facts; he is as thorough a thinker, free and radical and scholarly, as any one could ask; and he touches a great many points which are of keen practical interest. One of his six chapters is on "The Age of Discussion," and in the course of it he says: "In much of Europe, and in England particularly, the influence of religion has been very different from what it was in antiquity. It has been an influence of discussion. Since Luther's time there has been a conviction, more or less rooted, that a man may by an intellectual process think out a religion for himself, and that, as the highest of all duties, he ought to do so. The influence of the political discussion, and the influence of the religious discussion, have been so long and so firmly combined, and have so effectually enforced one another, that the old notions of loyalty, and fealty, and authority, as they existed in the Middle Ages, have now over the best minds no effect." It is by such broad radical views that Mr. Bagehot makes his pages very interesting and valuable. In his first chapter he discusses matters of primitive preparation for political society, the original elements. In the second he considers the part which conflict between these elements plays. Then come two chapters on the way in which nations come into being; after which the part played by discussion in developing public progress is considered; and the work concludes with a chapter summing up the argument of the book in regard to the political pre-requisites of progress. E. C. T.

PHILOSOPHICAL PAPERS.

VI.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

SPONTANEOUS GENERATION.

FROM AN ARTICLE ON "PHILOSOPHICAL BIOLOGY," IN THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, FOR OCTOBER, 1888.

Since the spontaneous-generation hypothesis simply supposes the gradual evolution of the lowest forms of life out of inorganic matter, while the special-creation hypothesis supposes the instantaneous creation of the highest forms out of the same inorganic matter, it is clear as noonday that special creation is neither more nor less than spontaneous generation in its most monstrous form. The one hypothesis harmonizes with the idea of universal law, the other glaringly contradicts it. Nor is it on philosophical grounds alone that the hypothesis of spontaneous generation rests. Regarded in a purely scientific light, it is strictly an open question. Although incapable of verification in some of its aspects, actual experiments, conducted by men of the highest scientific reputation, justify the statement, that, in other aspects, spontaneous generation may be a normal fact, even at the present time. A few words on this subject will not, we trust, be deemed out of place.

In its widest sense, generatio requiroca, or "spontaneous generation," called also spontaneité by Duges, and heterogenesis by Burdach, means the coming into existence of an organized being otherwise than by parentage. The phrase is by no means intended, as vulgarly supposed, to signify fortuitous generation (Huxley, Origin of Species, p. 90, uses the word in the same manner), that is, to imply the absence of causation; it does imply that organisms of the lowest order may originate in appropriate media in other ways than by ordinary reproduction, but it also implies the action of natural causes, and the invariability of natural laws in the most vigorous sense of those words. The processes of heterogenesis, if facts, are conceived to be as truly regulated by the laws of Nature as the commonest facts of observation; there can be no more "chance" in the one case than in the other. The hypothesis of heterogenesis assumes no deviation from universal laws; whereas the hypothesis of special creations, postulating the sudden apparition, without parentage, of the most highly developed animals and plants, and that, too, confessedly by supernatural volitions, takes for granted a kind of spontaneous generation which is utterly irreconcilable with universal order. Every objection, therefore, brought against the former hypothesis tells with tenfold force against the latter. Either hypothesis is consistent with theism; the former alone is consistent with faith in the harmonious economy of the universe. Much of the popular repugnance to the doctrine of heterogenesis arises from its supposed atheistic tendencies; whereas such tendencies no more exist in this than any doctrine which implies the strict universality of natural law. Apart, however, from all theological prejudices, it encounters a formidable obstacle in the justifiable demand of science itself, that all genesis of new organisms shall be explained by parentage until genesis without parentage is proved,—that the law of homogenesis shall be assumed to be strictly universal until a complementary law of heterogenesis is experimentally established. Harvey's famous maxim, Omne vivum ex ovo, as amended by Charles Robin into Omne vivum ex vivo, and by Milne Edwards into Tout corps vivant provient d'un corps qui vit, unquestionably justifies the opponents of heterogenesis from the standpoint of positive science, and throws the burden of proof upon its advocates. But, looking at the question from a higher point of view, the scientific advantage seemingly gained by rejecting heterogenesis is more than offset by the greater philosophical disadvantage of not being able to explain the first origin of life without having recourse to miracle. If life ever originated without miracle, it is fairly presumable, that, under similar conditions, it so originates now. Whether the conditions are now similar or not, experiment and observation must decide. But the nebular hypothesis would necessitate the admission that there was a time when no organisms existed,—that there was a time, consequently, when a first organism appeared. This first organism must be supposed to have been naturally evolved out of inorganic matter by heterogenesis, or else to have been miraculously created by supernatural intervention,—a supposition as contrary to the spirit of positive science as it is to the spirit of philosophy. The question of the first origin of life cannot always be ignored by scientific thinkers; and when it is once fairly raised, the burden of proof is transferred to the advocates of universal homogenesis, who must explain the apparition of the first organism, which ex hypothesi had no parents, as best they can.

The chasm, however, between homogenesis and heterogenesis is not so wide as is commonly supposed. In the last analysis all generation is spontaneous. Throughout the entire animal kingdom, generation commences by ova, which exist as organisms prior to fecundation. Heterogenesis is not supposed to create suddenly an adult organism, but to proceed in the same way as normal ovulation, which must be itself spontaneous in the commencement. As in the tissue of the stroma an ovule spontaneously originates under appropriate conditions, so it is supposed to originate by heterogenesis in other proliferous substances. That ova, thus spontaneously originated, may develop into living individuals without the previous process of fecundation, is shown by the singular phenomena of so-called parthenogenesis, as illustrated in the case of certain Lepidoptera, in some species of which the males have never been found. Nothing more than this is supposed to take place in heterogenesis, except that the nutritive medium in which the germ originates is different. "It is surprising," says M. Pouchet, "that we should have to wait till the nineteenth century for the discovery that the initial process in both forms of generation is precisely the same." In either case, that "tendency to individuation," by which Schelling defined life, manifests itself under appropriate circumstances in the formation of a new individual. "There is, however, one fact implying that function must be regarded as taking precedence of structure. Of the lowest rhizopods, which present no distinction of parts, and nevertheless feed and grow and move about, Professor Huxley has remarked that they exhibit life without organization." Whether in homo-genesis or heterogenesis, life must first manifest itself in the production of a germ in an appropriate medium of environment,—manifest itself without antecedent organization,—manifest itself in peculiar motions and arrangements of matter not explicable by any known causes in the environment; and the question at issue between the two hypotheses is simply this: Are previously existent organisms the only natural media productive of such germs? The modes of reproduction known as fission and gemmation (schizoparité and gemmaiparité), which are still farther removed from ordinary gamogenesis than even the phenomena of parthenogenesis, seem to stand as connecting links between the two extremes of ovarian and "equivocal" generation. Here, too, the philosopher must accept the maxim, Natura non facit saltum. If Mr. Darwin, in the acknowledged paucity of intermediate forms, may reasonably appeal to the "imperfection of the geological record" in behalf of the natural evolution of species, so may the heterogenist, with equal reasonableness, appeal to the imperfection of the biological record in behalf of the natural evolution of life itself. Whether the appeal is reasonable or unreasonable, it is, at least, a logical necessity of the development hypothesis in both cases.

M. Milne Edwards conveniently divides the question of spontaneous generation. Designating production by parentage as homogenesis, and production without parentage as heterogenesis, he divides the latter into the three following classes:—

1. Agensis, or the formation of a living being by the spontaneous organization of non-living matter.

2. Necrogenesis, or the formation of living beings in consequence of the dissociation of the parts of a dead organism, which, as parts, should still preserve the faculty of living, and of developing into new organic forms.

3. Xenogenesis, or the formation of living beings by the physiological action of a living organism which should transmit to them the principle of life without impressing on them its own organic characters; the new being would not be of the same nature as its parent, and would represent a different species.

We have no space to devote to the history of the hypothesis of heterogenesis, which, however, has the authority of many of the most eminent names in science, both ancient and modern; but we cannot dismiss the subject without saying that the most recent and most trustworthy experiments tend as much to confirm as to invalidate the hypothesis, on the whole. The investigations of M. Pouchet, an ardent advocate, and of M. Pasteur, an equally ardent opponent of this hypothesis, have given fresh interest to the question within the last few years. Very recently M. Donné has performed experiments which render it probable that heterogenesis is a fact; and this probability is increased by the results obtained in England by Dr. Child, and in this country by Professor Jeffries Wyman, whose reputation for accuracy and impartiality has no superior. After comparing the various degrees of temperature shown by trustworthy evidence to be compatible with organic life in various thermal springs in Nature, and concluding that 208° Fahrenheit is its extreme limit of endurance, as thus far determined by observation, Professor Wyman minutely describes a long series of delicate and ingeniously devised experiments conducted by himself for the purpose of ascertaining "how far the life of certain low kinds of organisms is either sustained or destroyed in water which has been raised to a high temperature." The most remarkable of these experiments showed that seven flasks, hermetically sealed, and containing a boiled solution of "extract of beef" (Borden's concentrated juice of beef, evaporated to a nearly solid substance, free from tissues and entirely soluble), became the seat of infusorial life after being continuously boiled for four hours,—three of the flasks on the second day, and four of them on the fourth day. If the boiling was prolonged to five hours, as was done with other flasks, no infusoria appeared. If the infusoria thus developed in hermetically sealed flasks, after prolonged boiling for four hours, came from germs or spores previously existent in the organic solution, then these germs or spores must be capable of resisting the destructive action of boiling water during that period of time; but if these germs or spores are incapable of resisting the destructive action of boiling water during so long a period, then the developed infusoria must have been generated spontaneously; that is, independently of pre-existent organisms. To determine this point, if possible, Professor Wyman instituted additional experiments. The usual signs of life manifested by infusoria being locomotion, growth, and reproduction, and initiation of the processes of fermentation or putrefaction, he inferred that "inactivity in the presence of organic material suitable for nourishment, and of air at the ordinary temperature, added to the absence of the other signs of life, must be considered as the best indication of death." Experiment showed that all motion of the vibrios ceased at about 135° Fahrenheit, and all motion of the ciliated infusoria ceased at less than 130°; and that "the solutions to which boiled infusoria were added did not become invaded by animalcules sooner than those to which none had been added, while those to which unboiled infusoria were added were in all cases invaded at least one day, and in some two or three days, earlier." These results confirm the opinion of Spallanzani himself, perhaps the most determined opponent of heterogenesis, that the action of boiling water a little prolonged destroys the vitality, not only of developed animals and plants, but also of their eggs and seeds, and render the hypothesis of heterogenesis by far the most plausible explanation of the appearance of infusoria in organic solutions, after continuous boiling for four hours, in hermetically sealed flasks. To dismiss the whole subject of spontaneous generation, therefore, as Mr. Spencer has done, with a polite shrug of the shoulder, instead of at least honoring with his opposition a theory associated with the names of such men as Buffon, Oken, Lavoisier, Bremsler, Treviranus, Tiedemann, Burdach, J. Müller, Duges, Dujardin, Endes Deslongchamps, A. Richard, Pouchet, Joly, Donné, Professor Wyman, and Professor Owen (whom Milne Edwards calls l'anatomiste le plus éminent que l'Angleterre possédât aujourd'hui), does little credit to Mr. Spencer either as student of science or philosopher, especially when this theory is self-evidently a corollary from his own fundamental principles.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to detect them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

TAKING INTEREST A CRIME.

Boston, Jan. 5, 1873.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

In the course of your leading article in THE INDEX, No. 158, you make the following statement: "Usury laws, in especial, which sometimes work great detriment to the business interests of whole communities, are in fact based upon the Bible conception that it is a crime to take interest for money loaned; although the common sense of mankind rejects the notion in fact." I sometimes think that you, in your eagerness to escape the idea that a thing is true because the Bible says so, rush into the equally absurd but opposite idea that a thing is false because the Bible teaches it.

But, be that as it may, passing over the question concerning the detriment worked by usury laws, I proceed to the more important proposition, that to take interest is a crime: which it seems to me is capable of the most logical and convincing demonstration. I lay it down as a fundamental proposition, recognized by Adam Smith and all succeeding political economists of note, that labor is the creator of all artificial wealth, and that the performers of the labor are entitled to all they create. Consequently the owning by one man of more than he creates necessitates the owning by some other man of less than he creates. Therefore any man, owning property not the product or reward of his own labor nor a gift from some person who has honestly earned it, is guilty of theft,—in most cases unconsciously so, but none the less guilty. In all exchanges, either of labor or its products, the thing given must be exactly equivalent to the thing received; in other words, cost must govern price. Cost includes labor performed, sacrifices made, and risks incurred. Now, apply this principle to the transaction of lending money. What is the cost to the lender? Evidently the labor performed in conveying and receiving back the money lent, together with (in some cases) sacrifice and risk. Clearly these are the only elements in the transaction which may be legitimately considered. But interest, as ordinarily viewed, namely, as a sum of money paid to the lender in return for the benefit conferred upon the borrower, is based upon the false principle that value, in distinction from cost, is the limit of price; and it is therefore extortion. This principle, that "a thing is worth what it will bring," which lies at the bottom of interest, dividends, rents, and profit, is the whole cause of the present unjust and inequitable (not unequal) distribution of wealth. Make cost the limit of price, and you have taken a long step—yes, in my opinion, the final step—towards the long-sought solution of the social problem.

But you say "the common sense of mankind rejects the notion" that to take interest is a crime. So, a century since, it might have been said with equal truth that "the common sense of mankind rejects the notion" that chattel-slavery is anything but a just, wise, and beneficent institution. "The common sense of mankind," Mr. Editor, is not always to be relied upon. I am aware that this subject is somewhat foreign to those usually discussed in your columns; but, inasmuch as you introduced it by stating that you were in favor of a practice which seems to me so utterly at variance with the principle of justice, perhaps you will pardon me for indulging in this bit of criticism.

Yours for equity (which no existing religion inculcates),

BENJ. R. TUCKER.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. F. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debating character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. F. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, confusion, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. F. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to insure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests every body. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. F. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. F. ABBOT. Third Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 50 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. F. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. F. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents. Address, THE INDEX, Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

Back Numbers of The Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete set of THE INDEX from the beginning, either bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address.

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that some interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX, Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

NOW READY!

THE
BOUND INDEX FOR 1872
(VOLUME III.)

In addition to many other attractions, it contains the full course of free religious lectures delivered at Horticultural Hall, Boston, last winter, which were published in full nowhere else. A limited number only for sale. Price $2.00, and 75 cents postage. If postage is not prepaid by the purchaser, the volume will be sent by express at his expense. Address

THE INDEX,
Drawer 28,
Toledo, Ohio.

Cultured Free Thought.

The Index Association,

With its Principal Office at No. 142, St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO, and Branch Office at No. 38, Dey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX, A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society. It is edited by FRANCIS F. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. RALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, London, England.
Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, Weston super Mare, England.
Rev. M. D. CONWAY, London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Professor MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America,—that such a journal should have been started and powerfully supported by the best minds of your country, is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany, though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large."

Essays, lectures, and other papers of a thoughtful and liberal character; editorial articles; foreign and domestic correspondence; book reviews and notices; communications, selections, and other miscellaneous matter; in short, whatever can best promote the general cause to which THE INDEX is devoted will be found regularly in its columns.

Also, a highly interesting RATIONALISTIC STORY, entitled "PAUL GOWER," is now appearing serially in THE INDEX, and will run during the year.

Send $5.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial. All MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS must be addressed to

THE INDEX,
Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 13) will be sent postpaid on receipt of eighty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. F. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. F. ABBOT; "The Vision of Heaven," by Prof. F. W. Newman. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete Edition of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 75 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

THE RICHEST MEN IN AMERICA are no more happy than those who seek their own living, and who read the PHERNOLOGICAL JOURNAL, published at $3 a year by S. R. WELLS, 222 Broadway, N. Y.

A FINE RADICAL ROMANCE!

TO BE PUBLISHED

SERIALLY

IN

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

WE ARE HAPPY TO ANNOUNCE that we have secured for publication in THE INDEX a most excellent novel, entitled

PAUL GOWER:

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

For the present the author desires to withhold his name. But he is well known in literary circles as a writer for the best English and American magazines. Of another story written by him Mr. JAMES PARTON says: "I consider it a master-piece of narrative." Mr. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, who was so kind as to read "PAUL GOWER" in manuscript with special reference to its publication in THE INDEX, permits us to publish the following:—

"I have looked over Mr. Gower's novel, and think it would be an attractive feature in THE INDEX. It is very strong, and I found it very interesting. The story is remarkably well told; the characters are firmly drawn; and the religious tone of it will suit the paper well. The style is nervous and simple; the incident is varied; the development is natural. The writer has put a vast deal of thought into it, and spent great labor on it with admirable effect. My judgment may be at fault, but I think it would adorn THE INDEX. It will divide well as a serial, which will be an advantage."

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAP.

- 1.—An Old Lady and Gentleman of the Old School.
- 2.—News from the United States.
- 3.—A Lovers' Quarrel.
- 4.—Family Antecedents.
- 5.—Poor Relations.
- 6.—Mr. Bligh receives three Morning Calls.
- 7.—Is spent in Mr. Bligh's Office.
- 8.—A Shabby-Genteel Family.
- 9.—Mr. Daniel Pennothorne.
- 10.—Harry Franklin.
- 11.—"Never Overtaking and always Pursuing."
- 12.—A Catastrophe.
- 13.—Locked-out for the Night.
- 14.—In which divers Persons call on each other without Invitation or Introduction.
- 15.—Sickness and Convalescence.
- 16.—Esther Franklin.
- 17.—Contains Explanations and Confidences.
- 18.—Concludes with a Street Row at the Door of Mr. James Maberley.
- 19.—Involves a Meeting and a Departure.
- 20.—In which Richard Sabin talks like a Heathen.
- 21.—"That nasty, deceitful Clergyman who behaved so badly to poor, dear Ruth."
- 22.—"My Native Land, Good Night!"
- 23.—Epistolary and Maritime.
- 24.—Is mainly in Praise of New York City and Americans in General.
- 25.—Paul's Father.
- 26.—Transpires in or near Nassau Street.
- 27.—More New Faces.
- 28.—Is Conversational and Valetudinary.
- 29.—The Christening of a Comic Paper.
- 30.—A New York Boarding-House.
- 31.—Paul's Letters.
- 32.—In which Dick Sabin returns to New York City and is seen by Somebody who has hereafter a Great Deal to do with Him.
- 33.—Wherein Richard Sabin lays down a Square of Hell's Pavement.
- 34.—"The Porcupine."
- 35.—In which Paul Gower and Richard Sabin amuse themselves.
- 36.—A short Chapter introducing a very long one.
- 37.—A Young Man's Theological Experiences.
- 38.—Consequences.
- 39.—A Descent into Bohemia.
- 40.—More of the same Subject.
- 41.—In which we talk about the Fourth Estate of New York City.
- 42.—"Al Pfaf!"
- 43.—The Reverend Jim Scobell.
- 44.—"The Cornucopia."
- 45.—"One More Unfortunate."
- 46.—In which the Story progresses for about Six Months.
- 47.—A Little Adventure.
- 48.—Injured Innocence.
- 49.—"Lead us not into Temptation."
- 50.—Just what might have been Expected.
- 51.—What People said about it; and an item of News concerning the Fugitives.

CHAP.

- 52.—In which Paul sets out for a larger amount of Travel than he intended, and visits some Old Friends.
- 53.—A Canadian Idyll.
- 54.—Wherein we journey from the North to nearly the most Southern of the United States.
- 55.—More Southern Experiences; a Look at New Orleans; and a sudden change of Programme.
- 56.—A Return and a Disappointment.
- 57.—The Contents of which ought to surprise nobody.
- 58.—In which Paul hears more News of Old Friends of an Unsatisfactory Character.
- 59.—Wherein Paul Gower and the Rev. George Bligh smoke a cigar together.
- 60.—Accompanies Paul to London and describes his Doings in that Metropolis.
- 61.—Is a Continuation of Chapter 60.
- 62.—Contains an Accident and some Conversation.
- 63.—Treats of the Vicarage and Farm-house; and of the Machinations of a Wicked Woman.
- 64.—Shows that a Pliable Disposition may be wrought upon to Good as well as Evil Purposes.
- 65.—Which only those Readers who have some knowledge of Human Nature will think at all Truthful or Probable.
- 66.—Wherein we get rid of Mrs. Franklin for Good and All.
- 67.—In which the Engagement between Ruth Gower and the Rev. George Bligh comes to a perfectly natural conclusion.
- 68.—Contains various matters, Reflective, Rural, and Metropolitan, and concludes at Southampton.
- 69.—New York again. And what Paul did and heard there.
- 70.—A "Cut Direct" and other Experiences, too various for particularization.
- 71.—Is as Desultory as the one preceding it, and therefore introduced without Specification.
- 72.—More Boarding-House and Bohemian Details; the latter involving their own Moral.
- 73.—A Loving Heart, self-portrayed; and News from England.
- 74.—A Character; the re-appearance of a Scoundrel, and still more of Journalism.
- 75.—Another Return and a new Enterprise. Characterized on an Historical Occasion.
- 76.—In which a former Acquaintance takes Paul into his confidence concerning his Domestic Infelicity.
- 77.—Might have had the same Title as Chapter 76.
- 78.—More talk of Secession, and the Sequel of Richard Sabin's Catastrophe.
- 79.—A Companion-Picture to what we have seen in Charleston, but on a larger Scale.
- 80.—Clears the way for the Next and Last.
- 81.—In which John Gower's Misfortunes and the Story come to an End together.

Whoever desires to possess all the numbers of THE INDEX containing this novel should subscribe at once, beginning his subscription with the year. Send $5.00 for the FOURTH VOLUME OF THE INDEX.

Address

THE INDEX,
Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

THE COMMONWEALTH

LIFE GENTLEMEN of standing and ability (either in professional or mercantile pursuits) are desired in all parts of the country to represent this reliable company. Our plans of Insurance are simple, popular, and honest.

INS.

CO. Address 178 Broadway, NEW YORK.

REAL ESTATE,

In all parts of the U. S.,

RAILROAD AND OTHER STOCKS,

Also

MERCHANDISE OF ALL KINDS,

Bought, sold, and exchanged.

All wishing to sell, or who desire to procure bargains, will find it to their interest to apply to

S. T. POMEROY,
No. 1, Park Place, New York City.

ASA K. BUTTS,

Manufacturer's Agent, Broker and Dealer in
Domestic Cotton Goods
CORRAGE, & C.

111 Worth Street, New York.

Refers to

JOHN M. CONWAY, New York.
O. W. BUCKINGHAM, "
C. A. WORTENDIKE, Godwinville, N. J.
FRANKLIN BROS. & Co., Boston.
FINLEY & SCHLICHTER, Philadelphia.

THE BUTLER HEALTH LIFT.

LEWIS G. JAMES, MANAGER.

Principal Office—New York,
Park Bank Building, 214 Broadway.

ALSO,
BROOKLYN, 128 REMSEN STREET.

"This kind of exertion not only increases muscular power but refreshes exhausted nervous energy."—H. D. NOYSE, M. D., Professor in Bellevue Medical College.

Apparatus for private use of the most perfect construction, and at the most reasonable prices. Refer to Rev. O. B. Frothingham, Rev. Dr. Bartol, D. S. Rogers, and many others.

Visitors Always Welcome.

"The Greatest Luxury in the World."

TURKISH BATHS.

& 23 COLUMBIA HEIGHTS, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Three minutes' walk from Fulton Ferry.

A series of these Baths will relieve, if not cure, nearly every form of disease. The beauty and simplicity of their action consists in the perfect adaptability, either mild or powerful, of this method of treatment to each and every case. It cleans the body, purifies the blood, and equalizes the circulation, thus arousing dormant functions, and restoring the highest measure of health possible to the individual.

Innumerable references can be given to cases cured by the Bath, and the proprietor will freely advise with those who desire any information regarding its proper use.

First-class rooms and board at moderate prices.
CHARLES H. SHEPARD, M. D.

A GREAT OFFER! HOLIDAYS!

HORACE WATERS, 481 BROADWAY, N. Y., will dispose of 100 Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of three first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during the HOLIDAYS. New 7-octave first-class Pianos, modern improvements, for $275 cash. 7 1/2 Concerto Parlor Organs are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Price, for 8 stops, $135, 10 stops, $225 and $250 cash. Other Organs and Melodeons for $45 and upwards for cash. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S NEW BOOK.

The Religion of Humanity,

By O. B. Frothingham. Contents.—I. Tendencies; II. God; III. Bible; IV. Christ; V. Atone-ment; VI. Power of Moral Inspiration; VII. Providence; VIII. Moral Ideal; IX. Immortality; X. Education of Conscience; XI. The Soul of Good in Evil; XII. The Soul of Truth in Error.

One vol., 12 mo. $1.50. Sent free on receipt of price.
DAVID G. FRANCIS, Publisher,
17 Astor Place, New York.

HERALD OF HEALTH

FOR 1873.

(Three Numbers of 1872 Free to New Subscribers.)

READ WHAT IS SAID BY THE PRESS.

The N. Y. Evening Post says: "We can always commend this journal without qualification."

"It contains," says the Scientific American, "more sensible articles than any other magazine that comes to our sanctum."

A SPLENDID CHROMO,

WORTH $10.00,

Given free to every subscriber. It is an original picture of

A BEAUTIFUL GIRL,

Beautiful in form and face, on a mission of love to the cottage of a poor family. She stands with her supplies of good things knocking at the door, clad in a handsome costume, with a face expressive of the highest qualities the heart possesses, the perfect picture of health and beauty. This chromo is handsomely colored.

IN TEN COLORS,

AND

WILL PLEASE AND DELIGHT

all who possess it.

Every Home Should Have One.

It will give daily pleasure, and be a constant lesson of good to every one who looks on it.

Send your subscription for next year at once, and thus obtain the picture to exhibit to others when you are forming a club, and three numbers of 1873 free.

The January number contains a remarkable paper on the

CONDUCT OF LIFE,

written 846 years before Christ by Isocrates, and well worthy the attention of every liberal thinker. The February number will contain a well written article entitled,

The Physiology and Hygiene of Marriage.

The March number will contain an Essay entitled,

Do Mothers Mark their Children?

It is the aim of the publishers to make their journal thoroughly useful and fill it with the productions of sound writers.

In short, the Herald for one year contains matter enough to make eight or ten dollar-and-a-half books, and yet it is sent with a picture worth $10 for the small price of $3.00.

The Herald for 1873 will be

RICH AND ROYAL

With the very best matter from the best writers, and each number will be worth the full subscription price—

$2.00 a Year

(12 cents extra for postage on premium). We will send the Herald of Health, with its splendid Chromo, and any $1.50 magazine, or paper, with their premiums, post-paid, for $3.25. The Herald of Health and its Chromo, and any $4 magazine, for $5.12, or the Herald and Chromo, and New York Times or Tribune, for $3.50. Agents wanted. Liberal commissions given. Address

WOOD & HOLBROOK,
15 N. 1st St., New York.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS

for the

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES; an historical summary of the origin, growth, and perfection of the chief industrial arts of this country. 1,300 PAGES, AND 600 ENGRAVINGS. WRITTEN BY 50 EMINENT AUTHORS, including John B. Gough, Leon Case, Edward Howland, Jos. B. Lyman, Rev. E. Edwin Hall, Horace Greeley, Philip Ripley, Albert Brisbane, F. B. Perkins, etc., etc.

This work is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufacture, etc., in all ages. It is a complete encyclopedia of arts and manufactures, and is the most entertaining and valuable work of information on subjects of general interest ever offered to the public. It is adapted to the wants of the Merchant, Manufacturer, Mechanic, Farmer, Student, and Inventor, and sells to both old and young of all classes. The book is sold by agents, who are making large sales in all parts of the country. It is offered at the low price of $3.50, and is the cheapest book ever sold by subscription. No family should be without a copy. We want Agents in every town of the United States, and no Agent can fail to do well with this book. Our terms are liberal. We give our agents the exclusive right of territory. One of our agents sold 100 copies in eight days; another sold 300 in two weeks. Our agent in Hartford sold 397 in one week. Specimens of the work sent to agents on receipt of stamp. For circulars and terms to agents address the publishers,

J. B. BURR & HYDE,
Hartford, Conn.,
CHICAGO, ILL., or CINCINNATI, OHIO.

W. A. FAUNCE,
Late Cashier Toledo Savings Institution.
Stebbins.

BROWN & FAUNCE,

BOOKSELLERS,

STATIONERS,

AND DEALERS IN

Window and Wall Papers,

(Successors to Henry B. Stebbins.)

115 SUMMIT STREET, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Keep constantly on hand a fine stock of standard and current literature, embracing books upon Science, Art, and Religion, and are in receipt of new books from publishers as fast as issued. Books sent by mail post-paid on receipt of publishers' price, and promptly ordered when not in stock.

Out-of-date and rare books furnished when procurable in this country or in England. Orders by mail solicited.

THE BABCOCK

FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against Fire."

SURE,

SIMPLE,

SELF-ACTING.

Used by the Fire Departments of the principal cities of the Union.

F. W. FARWELL, Secretary,
407 Broadway, New York.

Over Twelve Hundred Actual Fires put out with it.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

Are You Going to New York?

If so, and you wish to stop where you can FEEL AT HOME, and get GOOD FOOD HEALTHFULLY PREPARED and PLENTY OF IT.

Go to the Hygienic Institute,

Nos. 13 & 15 Laight Street.

Horse Cars pass near the door to all parts of the city, making it a very convenient stopping place for persons visiting New York, either upon business or pleasure. Open at all hours, day and night. Board by the day or week, at reasonable rates. Rooms can be secured in advance by writing.

Address
WOOD & HOLBROOK, Prop'rs,
Nos. 13 and 15 Laight Street, New York.

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address
SYDNEY H. MORSE,
35 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

HARLAN P. HYDE.

REAL ESTATE AGENT,

AND

Negotiator of Mortgages.

95 1-2 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents Wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than in anything else. Particulars Free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Me.

MUSICAL GIFT BOOKS!

"Gems of Strauss."

The "Gem" of the season is having a remarkable sale. Contains all of Strauss' best music; 320 large pages.

"Musical Treasure,"

Latest collection of choicest Vocal and Piano Music.

"Wreath of Gems,"

Entirely Vocal Music. Songs, Ballads, Duets, etc.

"Piano Forte Gems,"

Entirely Piano Music, Nocturnes, Dance Music, etc.

Price of any of the above, $3.50; or, in Full Gift, $4.

MUSICAL LITERATURE.

Mozart (by H. Rao) $1.75	Rossini (Life of) $1.75
Beethoven (Life of) 2.00	Schumann (Life of) 1.75
Mendelssohn (Life of) 1.75	Gottschalk (Life of) 1.50
Chopin (Life of) by Liszt 1.50	Polka's Musical Sketches 1.50
Beethoven's, Mozart's, Mendelssohn's Letters, each 1.75
Ritter's History of Music 1.50
Moore's Encyclopedia of Music 6.00

Any one of the above sent, post-paid, for retail price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.
CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy. Published Quarterly in St. Louis, Mo. It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription,

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents.

Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in mailing, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V., in mail, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,
Box 2398, St. Louis, Mo.

NEW TRACTS!

INTENDED TO TEACH RELIGION WITHOUT SUPERSTITION.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 9.

SECOND SERIES.....No. 10 to No. 18.

Either Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cents.

Address CHAS. E. WHIPPLE,

19 PINCKNEY ST., BOSTON.

Hall's Magic Shade Fixtures!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the Window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION Good Light, and at the same time COMPLETE Privacy in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for inside Blinds.

Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY

145 SOUTH CLINTON ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

GUNS FOR THE PEOPLE

Breech-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $30 Double-Barrel Shot-guns, $9 to $150. Blag Guns, $3 to $20. Breech-loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers, $8 to $25. Pistols, 75c. to $5. Gun material, fixtures, a ammunition of every kind very cheap. See STAMP for Large Illustrated and Descriptive Price-List to GREAT WESTERN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Samuel Johnson's Work on I

dis. Sent on receipt of price, $5.00.

Address S. H. MORSE,

35 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

Send to same address for Catalogue of other scientific and religious works.

F. J. SCOTT,

J. H. STOPPL

ARCHITECTS,

73 MADISON STREET (Near Bowdoy Hot TOLEDO, OHIO.

KELLER, SAITER, & CO

Manufacturers of RICH JEWELRY. 89 CAMEO sets a specialty. Office, 12 Maiden L. Factory, Bleecker St., cor. Bowery, New York.

BRYANT & BENTLEY

Manufacturing Jewelers. Rings a specialty patterns hard solder rings, stamped and ranted 16 carats fine. 18 carat Bracelets, C. Coral, Roman, and engraved sets; Masonic slry, &c. No. 12 Maiden Lane, New York stairs.

and
LOOKING GLASSES.

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

Published by the Index Association at No. 145,
St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio, with Branch
Office at No. 36, Dey Street, New York City.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.

T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.

W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.

W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

F. W. NEWMAN, England.

CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

M. D. CONWAY, England.

THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a London Letter containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A new LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MORSE, late editor of the RADICAL, whose EVENING NOTES will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 36, Dey Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. F. DONAHUE, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post office money order.

Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A UNIQUE PREMIUM.

Photographs and Autographs

LEADING WRITERS
OF
THE INDEX.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

W. J. POTTER.

W. H. SPENCER.

F. W. NEWMAN.

CHAS. VOYSEY.

A. W. STEVENS.

F. E. ABBOT.

☞ The PHOTOGRAPH of any ONE of the above-named persons will be mailed post-paid to any NEW subscriber who shall remit $3.00 for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

☞ To any one who shall send a list of names of from one to eight NEW subscribers and $3.00 for each, a corresponding number of Photographs shall be mailed post-paid, to be given to these subscribers; and the same number of Photographs shall also be mailed, post paid, as premium to the sender himself.

☞ To any one who shall send $9.00 for three years' subscription to THE INDEX in advance, a full set of the Photographs shall be mailed post-paid.

☞ None of the above Photographs will be sent, unless specially requested and unless a choice is made from the list.

☞ The Autograph of each of the above American writers will in all cases accompany the corresponding Photograph; but no Autograph can be sent with the Photograph of the English writers.

☞ These Photographs are well executed, are not on sale anywhere, and can be obtained in no other way. In offering them as premiums, the INDEX ASSOCIATION rely on the good will and active co-operation of all friends of THE INDEX.

☞ All orders for Photographs and remittances of money should be addressed to

THE INDEX,

DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A SYNOPSIS

OF

PAUL GOWER,

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a Story of English and American Life; the localities being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York Journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not in-curious.

It is, also, in the very warp and weft of it, an heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potent with the uninquiring and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfilment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, dialectically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is emphatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "DEBT AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. Milla, on the question, "DOES RELIGION PRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE MAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUSTENTATION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE LIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B., Everett Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 35¢ packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER

Secret

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 15, 1873.

WHOLE No. 164.

ORGANIZE!

LIBERALS OF AMERICA!

The hour for action has arrived. The cause of freedom calls upon us to combine our strength, our zeal, our efforts. These are

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformable to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Let us boldly and with high purpose meet the duty of the hour. I submit to you the following

FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF —.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in —: Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

Liberals! I pledge to you my undivided sympathies and most vigorous co-operation, both in THIS INDEX and out of it, in this work of local and national organization. Let us begin at once to lay the foundations of a great national party of freedom, which shall demand the entire secularization of our municipal, state, and national government. Send to me promptly the list of officers of every Liberal League that may be formed, and a standing list of all such Leagues shall be kept in THIS INDEX. Rouse, then, to the great work of freeing America from the usurpations of the Church! Make this continent from ocean to ocean sacred to human liberty! Prove that you are worthy descendants of those whose wisdom and patriotism gave us a Constitution untainted with superstition! Shake off your slumbers, and break the chains to which you have too long tamely submitted!

Toledo, O., Jan. 1, 1873.

FRANCIS F. ABBOT.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1873.

THE RISE OF UNITARIANISM IN NEW ENGLAND; A STORY OF EVOLUTION.

BY WILLIAM C. GANNETT.

THIRD LECTURE IN THE COURSE OF SIX "SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES," GIVEN IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, JANUARY 19, 1873.

EVOLUTION IN RELIGION.

Science has lately borrowed from the flowers a great doctrine—that of Evolution. Instead of "Be," the creative word now in our ears is "Become." All things grow. The flower is type of the universe, and the lily of the field is solving over again for us all the problems. "Consider it," said Jesus. Dimly could Jesus see how his "consider" would help to interpret all Nature and all history. Star-systems are supposed to grow from nebulae; the planet grows to shape; the races of life upon it grow from uncouth forms up to the beauty of man's stature, and mind grows in the races up to the range of human faculty; civilization grows from nation to nation; ideas grow from century to century; morals grow; religions grow. "Religions grow." It is this last hint on which we are to dwell to-day. I am to tell a story of the evolution of religion in our New England.

Take, first, two or three examples of the general fact.

In Geneva, some three hundred years ago, under Calvin's accusation, Servetus was burned at the stake for being a Unitarian. To-day, the Unitarian would be found in Calvin's pulpit.

A century later the English Presbyterians in Parliament passed a law by which teachers teaching persistently against the doctrine of the Trinity, or the Incarnation, or the body's Resurrection, or the Bible as being God's own word, should be put to death. The law never was enforced, but they prevailed to pass it.

Another hundred years passed by, and the English Presbyterians had nearly vanished into Unitarians themselves.

When the Pilgrims landed on our shore in 1620, they left on other shores no Calvinists more sturdy in the doctrines. Their "Mayflower church, the mother of us all," was almost the very first in which a break occurred in the Unitarian movement here. In 1801, a faithful Calvinistic minority withdrew, for the majority had grown to be Liberals. And many other Puritan "First Churches" in the towns of Eastern Massachusetts followed the lead.

A grander example of religious evolution than these is that of Christianity itself. Eight hundred years of traceable growth it took for the cardinal doctrines of Christianity to get their definite shapes and names. Four hundred years before the birth of Christ, four hundred years more after him. And when the idea of Christ had thus grown up in the Greek mind, through mounting Trinity and Incarnation theories, till he held the rank of Deity, and in the West the governmental Latin genius in Augustine had finally formulated the system of Original Sin and Predestination and Vicarious Atonement, then again by another gradual growth, taking fresh centuries,—the idea of a visible Church gained strength and widened its circuit, till by and by the Pope of Rome was hailed by all the lands of Western Europe as God's vicegerent on the earth. The history of the rise of Christianity is one long story of evolution. "Consider the lily, how it grew;" not miraculously, not suddenly, did the wonder of its fairness come to being, but by long, slow, gradual unfolding of ethics and ideas and institutions.

EVOLUTION DOUBLE—DECAY AND GROWTH.

Another word of previous explanation. This process of evolution is always double,—a decay of the old, a growth of the new. Not first one, and then the other; but the first ministers to the second all the time. Yet in intellectual development for long periods it is the first and not the second that attracts most notice. We see the negation long before we see the affirmation. The watching minds within two hundred years, on both sides of the Christian era, were much more impressed by the decay of the old faiths than by the vision of the growing faith. And thus it always is. For one Paul shouting "glory," there are a hundred lovers of the vanishing who raise the voice of desolation.

In tracing the process, therefore, that we are to mark in New England, we must keep our eyes watchful to note two things,—that which is waning and that which is waxing; and we must expect that the wane will long seem to be the larger part of the fact.

DECAY OF "REVEALED," GROWTH OF "NATURAL" RELIGION.

And what is the general fact that we shall see? It will be plainer if I point it out beforehand. What have we seen waning everywhere since Luther's day? This: Religion as based on authority external to human nature,—on the Revelation, the Christ, the Bible, the Church. What have we seen waxing since that day? This: Religion as based on human nature,—its reason, its feelings, its moral aspirations. "Revealed Religion," so-called, constantly transforming itself into truer, grander, tenderer forms of "Natural Religion,"—that is what we have seen everywhere. The rise of Protestantism also is simply another long story of evolution. Everywhere, I say; for this rationalistic movement has been a movement of the whole Protestant mind. Escape from Rome was the achievement of the sixteenth century. To escape from the little Romes of Protestantism and secure a toleration of dissent from its established creeds became the attempt of the seventeenth century; and partial success was won, always at the price of strife and hatred, sometimes at the price of martyrdom. Then in the eighteenth century appeared the fruits of the freedom thus attained. Without much new knowledge and only a dim perception of the new historic method to help her, Reason then for the first time began to discard the dogmas of Christian Orthodoxy,—those ancient dogmas whose origin long antedated the Reformation and even the rise of the Roman supremacy.

Look round for a moment at those elder lands in that eighteenth century. Holland, richest in experience of ecclesiastical tyranny, had already long before made room at her hearth for the religious exiles of all nations. Poland had sent thither her Socinians; France had sent Descartes and the Huguenots and Bayle; and by 1700 England was sending her young Presbyterian preachers to study their divinity. For in the face of a fuming Orthodoxy a series of noble Arminian teachers, that reached back to the time when our own fathers were among the refugees, had been promoting there a spirit of tolerance and systems of theology and Bible-criticism more enlightened than could be found in any other schools of Europe. In France, Voltaire and the Encyclopedists were soon engaged in their desperate revolt from the old Church that had fastened itself again upon the land after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. In Germany, rationalism appeared early in the century at Halle, and, by its middle, the first-born of her great race of Bible-scholars were working at Leipzig and Göttingen. In Switzerland, the Genevan company of Pastors in 1705 released the candidates from the necessity of subscribing to the Helvetic Confession and the decrees of Dort, and shortly afterwards one of their Professors published, with the local applause, his disbelief in Christ's deity and the imputation of Adam's sin. In England, during this century, four results appeared. Deism, Unitarianism, the Evidential School of Christian champions defending Revelation by reason against the deists' attack, and, finally (in part created doubtless by this purely intellectual tendency), that heart-thirst among the people which gave the opportunity for Methodism.

A general movement, therefore, of the Protestant mind. New England only shared the impulse with its mother and the other elder lands.

And the movement has been vastly broader than mere Unitarianism. That is only one among the many results. But Unitarianism by its long unbroken continuity will give us a very good conception of it as a whole.

This, then, is what in general we are to trace in New England. As a fact of growth, it will be the growth of "Reason in Religion," the increasing reliance on human nature as the only basis of religion. As a fact of decay, it will be the decay of the old doctrines of Christianity.

THE ORDER OF DECAY.

One word more. We shall find also that the order in which the Christian ideas drop away exactly reverses the order of their growth that was just now sketched. First to fade was the authority of the Church, which was the last great idea to appear in Christianity. Next, those dark dogmas of Augustine, which we know by their modern name of Calvinism,—those that concern man's practical relations to the Deity and now so shock the moral sense. Next the abstract dogmas of earlier Greek origin that concern the nature of the Deity, the relation of his own parts to each other, and so bewilder the mind that tries to realize them. And, lastly, the still earlier idea of supernatural revelation. First Rome, then Calvinism, then the theories of the Incarnation and the Trinity, and last of all the authority of the Bible and the Mediator.

THREE STAGES IN UNITARIAN GROWTH.

With Rome, however, we have nothing to do in New England. We were born after the escape from her, after the escape from the Church of England, too—were born Congregationalists in an empty land. But the successive decay of the three remaining groups of doctrine marks the three stages of the Unitarian story I am to tell. For the sake of distinctness we will put down dates. First, the Calvinism gave way to what is called Arminianism. That single process lasted till about 1750. Then the dogma of the Trinity gradually grew dim, and this special phase lasted till about 1825. Since then the authority of the revelation itself has been decaying. Of course it is not meant that lines between these "stages" can be sharply drawn. They are simply successive phases of decay in one continuous process of growth; each phase begins in the one preceding it, and finishes itself in the one that follows. Nor is it meant, of course, that all minds moved together in moving onwards. By and by thinkers were to be seen in all three stages contemporaneously—some back, some farther on, the fewest in the front.

These "stages" in the rise of Unitarianism here are no arbitrary invention. In the Unitarian movement in Old England the same three occurred in the same order; and for each one at least two generations there were needed; and as just said, each lapsed insensibly into the next. The main differences in the Unitarian history of the two countries arise from the fact that there the change took place chiefly within a tolerated body of Dissenters, while here the change went on within what was practically the Established Church; it was itself the first serious dissent. The movement here was therefore slower to begin; but, once begun, it created more unrest and came to its crisis more violently than in England. Each of the "stages" was later here than there by half a century or more. But in spite of this and of the similarity throughout, it seems to have been mostly an independent advance, native to our fathers. It began in the same general conditions of mind, and went on by the same necessities of thought towards the same results; aided, indeed, but only slightly, by the thinkers over the water.

THE STARTING-POINT—EARLY N. E. PURITANS.

How shall I draw in a few lines the picture of that Bible-Commonwealth which our fathers tried to establish in their New England Canaan?

They were men in homespun whose conversation was in heaven. They endured as seeing Him who is invisible. They looked not at the things which are seen but at things which are not seen. To few has the Eternal been so real. And therefore they were men of upright lives and dauntless hearts and unwearied hands. They framed their State as a temple and invited God to reign there over them. They inlaid his moral law into the nerve and instinct of their children, and we are what as Massachusetts men we are to-day because for fathers we had the Puritans. For all that, we could not be Puritans ourselves and keep to-day's common-sense.

Fancy a State that was a Church; its Assembly being likewise a Church-council; its voters, all Church-members, only voters because members, only citizens because saints; its first Constitution being "Moses his judicials," its second drawn up by a minister and bulwarked and illustrated with Bible-texts, its third made by another minister still aiming to shape a strict theocracy. Fancy the Bible that lies on your table regarded as a book literally full of God's own language,—Old Testament as well as New,—and every "Thus saith the Lord" therein a pattern by which the General Court of Massachusetts was to model its enactments. Fancy the meeting-house supported like the school,—and before the school or any thing else,—by public taxes; attendance required by a five-shillings fine for absence; the week-days illumined like poor planets from the Sunday; the minister, the chief man in the town, and next to him, the deacons. Fancy the martyr-feeling common in the log-houses; and each man able to enter in to personal covenant with God like Israel of old. Fancy these members, ministers, Bible, Church, and State, all representing pure Calvinism.

The decisions of the Synod of Dordt were just freshly printed when the Mayflower Pilgrims started, and though John Robinson told them as a parting word that more truth would break out from God's Word than Luther or Calvin saw, doubtless he and they felt pretty sure it would not contradict that synod. New Englanders were in firm accord with the Westminster Confession when their English Presbyterian brethren drew it up, and approved the Savoy Confession when the Independents drew up that; and those two creeds mark a very high tide of Calvinism. Not for general religious liberty by any means did the colonists of Massachusetts Bay transform themselves from a trading-company into a Church and then transport themselves as a band of Church-exiles to the wilderness; but only for liberty to be religious themselves in their own way. For that they spent their estates, ventured their lives, left their country; and so they felt they had a right to the soil and its privileges,—a right to say on what conditions new men should come in to their partnership, and who should be kept out, lest they be involved again in the religious wreck they thought impending in their mother-land. It was "the time of sects and schisms" there. That land was full of vagrant religions begging and gesticulating for followers. And the Puritans of New England kept their holiest horror therefore for all claims of private inspiration and "inner lights." An unscriptural revelation was as bad as a bishop! Even the first generation of the settlers found out repeatedly that the State which they had fashioned as a Church and fondly hoped to keep a Church could be retained in pristine Orthodoxy only by such stern measures as had driven themselves from their old homes. Antinomians, Anabaptists, Quakers (thus were called New England's earliest Transcendentalists), and even one "Socinian" (Pynchon of Springfield) suffered exile from the exiles.

I.

FIRST STAGE OF GROWTH—CALVINISM INTO ARMINIANISM.

It was all in vain. The Age was too much for them—too vital. The first children were still young men and women when the change began.

THE ORDINANCES RELAX.

A royal mail warned our fathers to take down the church-door to their citizenship. But it was a synod of their own that took down the bars to baptism. The "Half-way Covenant," approved in 1662, was the first plain sign of Puritan relaxation. Previously church-members only could bring their children to baptism; thenceforward a milder form of allegiance was passport to the privilege.

Another period about as long passed by, and then (1707) through the influence of "the venerable Stoddard," minister at Northampton, the "unconverted" began to be admitted also to full church-membership. The word passed from pulpit to pulpit that the Communion service was intended as a means to regeneration, not as the symbol of its attainment. A second surrender of ancient Puritanism. Between the two surrenders the change had been most painfully remarked by those earnest for the old ideas, and the annual Election Sermons served to glass the darkening fear. For ten or fifteen years in succession the governors elect were flattered by the cry, "How is New England in danger this day to be lost! How is the good grain diminished and the chaff increased—and our wine mixed with water! Have not the people in great measure forgot their errand into the wilderness?" A special synod summoned in 1679 to build up again the walls of Zion only checked their crumbling for a little while.

The relaxing of a sacred custom makes visible to men's eyes the fact that the beliefs from which the custom grew are waning. At that some minds always start back in alarm; to others it gives a sanction for further change. And when the religious ideas are changing thus, "piety" must of necessity decline, because piety is the feeling which religious ideas generate, and can be warm only when the ideas are held as strong convictions. There was a real decline of piety in New England in the early part of the last century, and it was chiefly due to the gradual decay of those beliefs which had been so intensely vital in the Puritan's creed. While vital, they had inspired a piety that strengthened Englishmen at home to a might that overthrew the "divine right" of kings, and here had greened a handful of exiles into founders of an actual democracy. But of course these beliefs were not final truths than which Reason could never find her way to better. And at the end of a century from the time of those who first chose voluntary exile for their portion in order that Calvinism without bishops might be their creed and discipline, Reason began to move toward something better.

The second "Convention Sermon" preached before the Congregational ministers of Massachusetts, in 1722—it was preached by Cotton Mather in a parlor—laments "the threatened banishment from the ministry of the truths which all real and vital piety forever lives upon." Calvinism at this time with such men as the Mather really meant the Calvinism of the creed, and not at all in Beecher's sense—or nonsense—what Calvin would have thought had he been living now and thought as we think! It stood for Predestination that was Predestination; for Election and Reprobation that did select a few for heaven and leave the multitude to endless hell; for Original Sin that was transfer of Adam's guilt to us, and a Vicarious Atonement that exchanged it a second time for Christ's righteousness. I do not think I am too precise. These were the truths "upon which real and vital piety forever lives," and which now were threatened with banishment from the churches. A few years later and the growing anti-Calvinistic tendency was known and named with the name of dread—Arminianism. But now the season of "the Great Awakening" was at hand.

THE GREAT AWAKENING.

The revival began with Jonathan Edwards in the Connecticut valley, and, after slackening awhile, was then brought to its crisis by Whitefield and the exhorters who upstarted in his track. Whitefield came to New England, in 1740. The churches suddenly flamed as with fire from heaven. Not that the words preached were new,—they were the doctrines of the Westminster Catechism, the same that so long had been rehearsed to closing ears. Need of the "new birth" was an old appeal; but now that cry died through the land so uttered that it wrought resurrection-miracles in the torpid parishes. Every household had a man or woman in it who had felt the touch of God and could tell the story of that touch. "Justification by faith" became an actual experience instead of a dull church formula. Hearts trembling at their helpless sinfulness first felt themselves in the hands of a justly angry God; then felt their terror give way to joy as the sacrifice of the sin-bearing Son of God rose upon the mind and filled it with that peace that signified election, that sealed those saved by the "irresistible grace." The old Calvinism was galvanized into its young vigor and its dogmas were suddenly as real to multitudes as ever they were to the forefathers. The churches filled themselves with members; not the unconverted members who sought the ordinance as a means to salvation, but those who came with glowing hearts as men saved but hardly saved to own grateful allegiance. Many who had long been members—not a few ministers even—confessed that for the first time they knew what religion meant.

The revival passed away, but not into a mere memory. Jonathan Edwards re-appeared on the field to harvest half its fruits by the success with which he combated his grandfather Stoddard's innovation, and led the churches back to their old strict terms of membership. The Evangelical sects based on the Calvinistic creeds are strong to-day with the strength then made sure to them.

ARMINIANISM.

That however was but one-half of the revival's fruit. The other half was this,—that in other minds Calvinism died the speedier death. The very sharpening of the doctrines, and the new emphasis with which the parts that most choked conscience and most strained the reason were urged, increased the revolt of reason and conscience already begun. Between the two visits of Whitefield the churches had been frightened by the invasion of itinerants whose preaching split the parishes and produced strange physical excesses of enthusiasm. And when he returned in 1745, his welcome lacked much of the admiration that had speeded the young apostle on his way five years before. Several ministerial associations and both the Colleges united in advising that the pulpits should be shut to him, and Dr. Chauncy of our First Church in Boston headed the crusade. The objections were practical rather than doctrinal, and yet they reveal divergence of doctrine also and at a very vital point,—the theory of the "New Birth,"—just the point in which a revival carries all its power.

Thus the change that had been going on before the Great Awakening was hastened by it. By the time it was over, the word of dread, "Arminian," had grown familiar. The pro-revival ministers called the rationalistic spirit that opposed the excitement by that name; and ever added already a word of deeper, far deeper, horror—"Socinianism!" Edwards, that valiant watchman of the times, says, in 1750, that if as the dangerous doctrines were before the revival, "within seven years" (i.e. from its crisis onwards) "they have made vastly greater progress than ever before in the like space," an alludes to Boston as being threatened with ruin by them. Then this religious genius, this thinker of New England, went into exile among the Stockbridge Indians, and in the quiet began to write his famous books to stem the rising tide—how vainly we shall see. While he was writing, some New Hampshire ministers improvise the catechism by leaving out the Calvinism.

In this way what I called the first stage in rise of Unitarianism was completed, or rather completed so far as this,—that now Arminianism or anti-Calvinism was an established fact in Massachusetts. The change towards Rationalism had been long and gradual,—first crumbling away certain church-rites, then silently affecting doctrine, till towards the middle of the century, when it grew yearly into clearer recognition. The new name, however, was very vaguely used. It covered the whole new emphasis in behalf of man's free will and responsibility and power to win salvation, and in behalf of God's impartiality; and therefore covered many degrees of dissent from Calvinism. No split in the Church was thought of yet. But from this time forward the two parties constantly and consciously diverged, and watched each other. In England, we may note in passing, the same point had been reached fifty or sixty years before. There the dispute broke up the union between the Presbyterians and Congregationalists (as the Independents had come to call themselves); a union which had just been hailed with rapture—to last three years! The former party fast increased its liberality, and became the Unitarians about the very time we have touched in our New England story—the middle of the century; while the Congregationalists remained firm Calvinists. Here it was just the other way. The New England Congregationalists grew liberal, while the Presbyterians of New York and Pennsylvania were rigid, loud-tongued guardians of the Creed.

II.

SECOND STAGE—ARMINIANISM AND UNITARIANISM.

That second stage of growth we now must sketch.

Again there was a long period of silent change during which less and less was heard of the Athanasian Trinity; and again the nearer one came to Boston the more he was in the heart of the silence. Now and then some thinker in advance of his brethren broke the stillness with a slighting word; now and then some justly frightened old believer, like Edwards or Hopkins or Prof. Wigglesworth, murmured a warning. But in general the sceptics did not know what they thought,—only they knew that their ideas were not clear-cut like their fathers'. What did the Bible really say?—that was the great question now. Were the venerated doctrines really there after all? Many a Massachusetts minister, in the quiet of his study, bent over the holy book with his ten fingers between the leaves, drawing up lists of texts on this side and on that, trying to focus the rays of Bible-light into one clear word. Silent they had to be, unless they had said, "We doubt;" and that is the last thing but one that a man learns to say in religion.

THE LIBERALS' THREE WATCHWORDS.

And yet they were not wholly silent. Three special emphases grew slowly louder. The first was—Few fundamentals in religion. The second—No human creed. The third—Only Bible words to phrase the mysteries. The third was really only the other way of putting the second; and both these followed from the first—few fundamentals. Whatever was essential to religion must lie on the surface of the Bible where the common folk might read it, not deep within to be quarried out by scholars; and then, "Do good and live" made all the rest. So they began to think. Whatever mysteries Revelation held, faith in them was one thing; faith in fine-spun speculations drawn from them another. Could man improve on God's own language? It was asked. No human explanations of that language should be deemed essential to Christianity. So with increasing boldness the secret seekers took their stand against creeds as tests of Orthodoxy—and this stand began to mark them off as Liberals over against the Evangelicals. Those were the two party-names of the second epoch. To the former such an attitude seemed necessary, mere common sense. To the latter it seemed an indifference to Gospel-truth that was altogether misnamed by its fine name of charity. Really, it was a claim for free-thinking within the limits of Revelation.

SIGNS OF THE NEW GROWTH.

The chief sign of this new attitude was the withdrawal of the mystic doctrines from the pulpit; and when they did appear there, their careful retreat into the Bible phrases. Another was, that broad toleration was distinctly advocated in ordination and convention sermons. Another, that at ordinations in and around Boston the ministers often abstained from examining a candidate about his Orthodoxy. Another, that the books of Emlyn, Clarke, and Taylor—all English Unitarian leaders—were in circulation. Another, that the Orthodox began to be alarmed, and to grow more definite themselves, and already to charge the Liberals with evasion. Quite early a little breeze sprang up in Boston over a volume of Dr. Mayhew's sermons. Jonathan Mayhew, pastor of the West Church, was the freest man in Boston. His words much more nearly matched his thought than was common at that time among the ministers. Where they mildly opposed, he denounced creed-making; where they practised, he strenuously urged the right and duty of private judgment; where they disbelieved, he boldly denied the doctrines of total depravity and justification by mere faith. The Boston clergy had declined to assist at his ordination. It was not for his anti-Calvinism, says his biographer—"for many of them were as anti-Calvinistic as he was; but because it was well-known that he did not believe in the Trinity." The ministers' refusal shows that they were still waiting at the Oracle; and when Mayhew in a fine-print note of his volume had flung a slur at the idea of three or four being one, they wrote lectures to vindicate Christ's divinity as well as they still were able. But this was back in '55; twenty years later they would probably have left his note alone.

Besides, Jonathan Mayhew, Dr. Chauncy of the First Church—he who had led the onset against Whitefield—and Dr. Gay of Hingham, were specially recognized as leaders in the Liberal movement. President John Adams says they—and others with them, many laymen too in all ranks of life—were Unitarians as early as 1750.

THE FIRST UNITARIAN CHURCH.

But the first church that was willing to bear the reproach of Unitarianism was, after all, not Congregationalist but Episcopalian,—an alien in our midst—the King's Chapel; and because it was an alien, probably. The position of dissent from an established Church naturally makes men bold; and here Episcopalianism was the dissent.

The revolution was just closing when James Freeman was invited to become reader at the Chapel. He soon felt himself in perfect sympathy with the liberality all around him; but while the other ministers could change their Trinitarian doxologies to a Bible phrase, and leave out all the Athanasianism from their sermons and get ordination without signing a creed, he found his conscience constantly tripping against the dogmas in the prayer-book. The chapel proprietors loved him and were Liberals themselves, and promptly authorized him to purge the Liturgy of what he disbelieved. And then, as no bishop would lay hand on the young heretic, they gave him a Bible themselves instead, and made him the first professedly Unitarian minister, and themselves the first Unitarian church, in America.

Over in London, Mr. Lindsey, a friend of his, had just tried a similar experiment; and Freeman tells him the whole story—how he didn't venture to alter quite as much as he would have liked to, and how the public at first were shy but soon approved the change, and how Priestley's books were being read, and how many ministers had lately given up the Trinitarian doxology, and how there was only one minister in New England who openly preached "the Socinian scheme," although "there are many churches in which the worship is strictly Unitarian, and some of New England's most eminent laymen openly avow their creed." A little later, in '96, he writes: "There are a number of ministers who avow and preach their sentiments, while there are others more cautious who content themselves with leading their hearers by a course of rational but prudent sermons gradually and insensibly to embrace it. Though the latter mode is not what I entirely approve, yet it produces good effects."

SIGNS IN 1800.

Opinion was plainly ripening. When 1800 came, the Universalists had four churches in Massachusetts. The Pilgrims' Church at Plymouth was just about to break in two because a Liberal was to be settled. There were nine Congregational Churches in Boston, and in every one minister and people were deeply infected with the heresy. The Old South was probably the most Orthodox, yet Joseph Eckley, its pastor, "hesitated to affirm the entire equality of the Father and the Son." The two most important features of Boston thought at this time were the certainty of the decay not only of Calvinism but of Trinitarianism, and the vagueness of the new growth that was emerging. "He was classed with Liberals," "he avoided controversial subjects in the pulpit," "the type of his Unitarianism was unknown," "he was probably an Arian,"—such expressions abound in Sprague's account of the early Unitarian worthies of Massachusetts,—the elders who passed away between 1800 and 1825, while their younger brethren were accepting the new name and deflating their heresy. And in this on-growth from the faith of the fathers, though Boston led the way, she was by no means alone. The other large towns of Massachusetts, first-born of her Puritanism, showed a similar spectacle. Of two hundred Congregational churches east of Worcester County at this time not more than two in five were under Evangelical ministry,—says the Orthodox historian of those churches.

HOPKINSIANISM.

But perhaps the most striking sign of change after all was this fact, that the change was not confined to the Liberals. The Orthodox themselves had changed. Nearly the whole of New England Calvinism was suffering "change into something rich and strange,"—something richer at least than the harshness of old Calvinism, and stranger because it is not so easy to understand. For twenty years past, there had really been three parties in the field,—besides the Arminians or Liberals, and the old Calvinists, a third, the "Moderate Calvinists" or "Hopkinsians" or "the Edwardsean School," as it was variously called.

This new Calvinism rose with Orthodoxy's great champion, Jonathan Edwards himself, and his pupils, Hopkins and Bellamy. A younger band of earnest men had spread it far and wide. Its advocates claimed that it was essentially the faith of the forefathers, but were quite as anxious also to urge its superiority. The balder features of Imputation—actual transfer of Adam's guilt and of Christ's righteousness to the sinner—were disclaimed. The Total Depravity however was as total as ever, and as innate; but now it was explained that man's natural inability to be holy, due to Adam's sin, was not "physical" but "moral" i. e., apparently man can do what he will, but he cannot will what he would. His best deeds are sinful, and he cannot will the holiness necessary to salvation till re-born by a second creative act of God. The Atonement also was still vicarious; but the warlike theory of a mere ransom effected by exchange of victims was giving way to a "governmental" theory that wore a much nobler look. The honor of God's moral government, it now was said, required that unabated penalty should follow sin, but not that the penalty should fall upon the sinner himself; therefore as Christ's self-sacrifice, the sacrifice of Deity, had satisfied the law, it made forgiveness of the actual sinner a moral possibility to God. Election also was still as truly election as ever; but in the new explanation it had shifted its place from before to after the Atonement. The Atonement, indeed, was general, designed for all; but Redemption was still "particular," and Reprobation none the less a fact: because God, in applying this universal opportunity which the Atonement gave him, chose out only whom he would, and called them only by his Holy Spirit, leaving all the others to that native inability which made destruction sure,—destruction through eternity. That he saved anybody was solely by his sovereign choice, and had he not used at all his opportunity of mercy, he still would have been just.

The character of these modifications, however slight and nominal, shows a degree of yielding to the rationalistic spirit. At least they certainly blunted the sharp points of Calvinism, and softened them into that mystic state which makes Spring-growth again possible in long-rigid dogmas. The effect was therefore partly good for Orthodoxy, for they served to keep some in the old faith who might otherwise have joined in the revolt. But it was partly bad for it, because these explanations, preached with the ardor of a new idea, served to make still more emphatic in both the old and the new forms those general doctrines that shocked so many minds and hearts.

The changed interpretations were very popular in New England. By the end of the Revolution the three parties were well marked off from one another. But as the Arminian tendencies grew more pronounced, the two schools of Orthodoxy joined forces, and the newer Hopkinsian theories gradually prevailed. Before long they built a home for themselves at Andover, and eventually they have become what is known to-day as "the New England theology," over against the older kind of Calvinism. Meanwhile in the stronghold of that older Calvinism, the Presbyterian churches outside of New England, the change had been very unpopular—and still is so. The New York and New Jersey clergy of those churches hurled many of the same hard words at New England Orthodoxy which the New England Orthodox lavished on the rising Unitarians. "The new Hopkinsian light," they said, was darkness; its "improvements" of Calvinism were nonsense, were impiety,—they led to infidelity and atheism; the New England Evangelicals taught "another gospel," whereas "the way of salvation was one," and that of course was the old Calvinistic path.

[To be continued.]

When Molière, the comic poet, died, the Archbishop of Paris would not let his body be buried in the consecrated ground. The king, being informed of this, sent for the archbishop, and expostulated with him about it; but finding the prelate inflexibly obstinate, his majesty asked how many feet deep the consecrated ground reached. This question coming by surprise, the archbishop replied, about eight. Well, answered the king, I find there is no getting the better of your scruples; therefore, let his grave be dug twelve feet deep, that is four feet below your consecrated ground, and let him be buried there.

Some of the early English Bibles, as Mr. Disraeli states, contain as many as 6,000 errata, which were intentional; consisting in passages interpolated and meanings forged for sectarian purposes, sometimes to sanction the new creed of a half-hatched sect, and sometimes with the intention to destroy all Scriptural authority by the suppression or omission of texts.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1878, by P. S. ABBOT, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER VII.

IS SPENT IN MR. BLIGH'S OFFICE.

Mr. Bligh's ex-pupil stood puffing his cigar and looking at Mr. Maberley with extraordinary coolness, until that gentleman, white with rage and cowardice, slunk away; when he turned on his heel and sought the clerk's office, which he had only quitted at the senior's suggestion. I invite the reader to bear him company.

This office was in the rear of Mr. Bligh's house, across a little paved yard, having a special outlet into a court, and commanded by the architect's back windows, through which the clerks and pupils could discern the shining bald head of their employer, as he sat at work, when the door of the back parlor happened to be open. These gentlemen had an injurious tradition that the scene of their daily labors was originally a tailor's shop, which it might be supposed to resemble in virtue of its low roof, its continuous window on one side, and a broad, permanent desk, not unlike the professional board upon which the sedentary craft is wont to be practised. You ascended to it by means of a shabby staircase, deficient in balusters, many of which had been wrenched out and used for firewood; while a few holes, punctured in the pew-like casing, by the agency of a red-hot poker, allowed the approach of anybody from below to be visible above—a prudent precaution when young men are in the habit of diversifying their graver employments with fencing, boxing, and "toeing" for pots of beer. This staircase divided the office into two compartments, one tenanted by the clerks, the other by the pupils. Here the occupants in general worked, laughed, and chatted from nine in the morning till six P. M.

"No smoking allowed here!—go to the public-house!" cried the senior clerk, as Sabin emerged from the staircase. Mr. Coulton was a thin, little, elderly man, with gray hair, a long face and a good-humored, intelligent countenance; his parents had been emigrants of the first French Revolution; his grandfather one of its earliest victims. The pupils liked him considerably, respected him a little, and obeyed him as much as they pleased. He had held his present position on a not too liberal salary, for ten years. Whenever he suggested its insufficiency to provide for himself, Mrs. Coulton, and three daughters (rumored to be very pretty by the pupils), who dwelt in the remotest wilds of Kensington, and talked of leaving Mr. Bligh, that astute person invited him to dinner, or took him out for a drive in his carriage, which always induced a postponement of that intention—a fact commented upon with much sarcasm by the young gentlemen.

"Pa's going to be taken into partnership, and is practising autocrat!" shouted one of them, from the top of a high stool, which he was making revolve on one leg, using the desk as fulcrum, as Sabin threw away his cigar. The pupils called Mr. Coulton "pa" in virtue of his seniority and position, and as regularly nicknamed their principal.

"We are getting up a design for a stunning brass-plate on the front-door—Bligh and Coulton, Architects and Surveyors, and repairs neatly executed in town and country—hands taking a sight at the corners and 'Don't you wish you may get it?' in Gothic letters for a border!" adds another. In reply to which artless "chaff," Mr. Coulton only laughs, shakes his head and announces his intention of having a very different state of things in that office when he is partner.

"Will you stop our beer, pa?" "Or lock up the gloves so that we shan't spar any more?" "Or demand a doctor's certificate when we don't show up regular?" Thus pupils 1, 2, and 3. Only one of the young gentlemen articulated to Mr. Bligh was working—as he happened to be engaged on a task which it was necessary to get completed by a certain time; the others, with stools tilted against the desk, or bestriding the rickety office-chairs, were indulging in lunch, porter, and general conversation. Sabin went to the worker, Paul Gower (whom he had been talking with previous to receiving the intimation that Mr. Bligh wanted to speak to him), and leaning his arm on the desk beside his friend, asked, carelessly:—

"Whom do you think I met down stairs?"

"Your father. Coulton told us, you know."

"I don't mean the governor—bless his stupid old head for coming here to bother Sam about me!—but that scoundrel of a Maberley! Met him rushing out of the house after Bligh and nearly knocked him into the gutter instinctively. I wish he had resented it!" And the young artist related the incident, in detail, to his gratified auditor. "I wonder what brought him here?" he concluded.

"I think I can guess. Mrs. Maberley came to our house, this morning, with a black eye, given her by her husband."

Sabin vented an imprecation on Mr. Bligh's recent visitor, which was more fervently echoed by Paul, who continued:—

"He had been drinking and gambling over night, and came home furious with loss and intoxication, to vent his temper on his wife, who bore it until he struck her. If you'd broken his neck, Dick, I believe my grandmother would have been reconciled to you. The old lady vows my aunt shan't go back to him. I hope she won't."

Paul, be it incidentally observed, was accustomed to call Mrs. Maberley his aunt, though she was in reality only first-cousin to his father; indeed the very same pretty cousin whom John Gower had fallen in love with, and whose loss had utterly estranged him from his parents, and exerted such a disastrous effect upon his disposition and fortunes. She had got married afterwards, and that was what had come of it.

"I can't tell you how I hate the fellow!" Paul went on. "He's a drunkard, a debauchee, and a blackguard, who dyes his hair and paints his face—actually wears rouge—and gives himself the airs of a lady-killer and a man of fashion. He married my aunt for her money and would have broken her heart long ago, if neglect and profligacy could have done it. And now he's got to beating her! She's one of those women whom everybody likes—a handsome, fair-haired, blue-eyed, lady-like woman, none the less agreeable for being rather conscious of it. She was always very kind to me when I used to go to the house in my school-days. Of course I knew nothing, then, of what was going on; she kept it secret, as women will, you know, until it came out that he kept a mistress—two—was, in short, a perfect reprobate. He has been forbidden my grandfather's house for some years, though my aunt came to see us—I suppose unknown to her precious husband."

"Seen him myself in some uncommonly shy places for a married man!" said Sabin, who had heard something of the story before, from his friend, and acted upon the information in his recent behavior to Maberley. "A swell doctor, isn't he?"

"Yes, and had a good practice, once. Lives in Hanover street, Hanover Square, keeps a footman and a boy in buttons and talks about the peerage and the opera. I used to think him a tremendous swell, when I was a boy, though I never liked him. I recollect him singing at the piano, turning up his eyes, and all the women hanging on his words and thinking him a perfect darling. He has spent every penny of my aunt's fortune he could lay his hands on."

"Wasn't there some kind of a row between him and Sam—legal row I mean—about the time I left?"

"It didn't come to that. Sam was her guardian in conjunction with a great uncle of mine, who is paralytic; you have heard me speak of him. He always distrusted Maberley and got his brother to secure some of the property—a house, I think—to his daughter, so that he couldn't make ducks and drakes of it, as he did of the rest. He quarrelled with both executors about their advising his wife to withhold her consent to raising money on something else, which of course she didn't do, and threatened going to law; but afterwards ate humble pie and propitiated Sam, who never cares to be at odds with anybody; though Mr. Fletcher would have nothing to say to him. He is an old lawyer, and very like my grandmother. I dare say Maberley came here to-day to ask Sam to intercede for him with his wife."

Paul might have pursued the subject still further, though his friend did not seem particularly interested in it, as he stood leaning against the desk, spearing it with a pen-knife and looking the picture of handsome indolence; but at this juncture there occurred a general exclamation on the part of the pupils.

"Mills! old Mills is coming! Let's shy some water over him!" which practical joke would incontinently have been carried into effect, as the intended victim mounted the stairs, but for the interference of Sabin seconded by Paul Gower.

Mills taught drawing in water-colors, at a shilling a lesson, to such young gentlemen as chose to pay him that very moderate price. He had no great skill with his penell; what he possessed being of an old-fashioned order, based on the style of a deceased brother whose performances still brought good prices to the picture-dealers. Upon the reputation of this artist, "the great John Mills," as his survivor delighted to call him, the poor drawing-master principally depended for pupils. In Mr. Bligh's office he had two (besides Paul Gower) who amused themselves at his expense more than they profited by his instruction.

His appearance was the signal for a raking fire of "chaff," having endured rather than encountered which, he shook hands with Richard Sabin, taking off a very old pair of black gloves to do so.

"Anything new at home, Mills?" Inquired the artist, who did not live at his father's house in Newman Street, whereas Mills spent the better part of his time there; being, indeed, the general friend, factotum, and follower of the Sabin family.

"N—nothing particular, sir. Y—yes there is, though. Mr. Franklin has come up from the country, with another gentleman."

"Harry Franklin, eh? Who's the other?—not his father?"

"I didn't quite catch the name, but it w—wasn't your uncle—a middle aged person, I-like a countryman. Your father was out, so I left them t-talking with the young ladies."

"Well, I'll go and see. By Jove!" and Sabin turned to Paul—"I know what Harry's come up about, and if I'm not mistaken we'll all go to America together."

"I hope we may. I shouldn't wonder, either; for his letters, of late, have been full of emigration. You know we correspond with one another."

"Won't you throw Mills over for the present, and come along with me? I was going up the river in a boat and meant to ask you. We'll take Harry, hear what he's got to say, and have a jolly afternoon of it."

Paul would have liked to accept the invitation, though less on account of the jolly afternoon, or Harry, than the chance of seeing Kate Sabin. He had, almost as a matter of course, repeated his last night's behavior and sudden departure from the garden at Kennington, and yearned for a reconciliation with his mistress, which would leave him a more complete slave to her than before. He also longed to tell her of the great news from America; how his father had written for him, and it was all but certain that he would accompany her brother Richard in his much-talked-of voyage to New York—when he carried out his intention. But though Mr. Bligh's office was, as we have seen, and as Mrs. Gower surmised, a very free-and-easy place, where the young gentlemen could get holidays almost when they liked, work was done in it, and Paul happened to be busy. Mills, too (whose face had assumed a feeble expression of surprise at the allusions of mutual emigration), was telegraphing at him with an air of the most conspicuous secrecy, as if he had something vastly important to communicate, in private. So Paul declined his friend's proposal, and Sabin, after interchanging a few remarks with the other pupils, sauntered away.

Then Mills unbosomed himself of what he had to relate; namely, the arrival of Mr. Jesse B. Wheeler at Kennington, in search of Paul, after the flight of the latter, and what had transpired thereupon. It was not much, though the poor drawing-master took some time in telling it. The American, inquiring for Paul, had been referred to Miss Sabin, Frank, and the narrator, when he briefly informed them of his recent visit to the house near the Hampstead Road, its object, and his desire to see the son of his friend, regretting that young man's departure and his own exigency of travel, which would, at least, postpone the accomplishment of his wish: on his return from the continent he hoped to be more fortunate. That was all—only as it appeared that Mr. Wheeler knew, or had once known something of Tom Sabin—the brother who had gone to the United States over so long ago—he was earnestly (and Mills might have added, coquettishly) entreated by Kate to oblige the family at Newman Street with a visit; and had promised so to do, conditional with his future convenience. Paul had heard as much and more, pertinent to his own affairs, at home already.

He was naturally disappointed, for his curiosity had been greatly excited, and though the alleged reason—Mr. Wheeler's promise to his father—fully accounted for his following him to Kennington, Paul could not help suspecting that he might have missed some undivulged communication. It was abominably provoking. Why had he been so unlucky, or so stupid, as to quit the garden?

But all his cross-questioning could elicit nothing further from Mills on the subject. That humble friend, indeed, presently supplied him with a reason for regretting his hasty departure, by informing him that Miss Sabin, on being joked about it, had publicly professed her entire indifference; in proof of which she had danced five times consecutively with Mr. Milfin, and exhibited even more than her usual liveliness and gayety throughout the evening.

CHAPTER VIII.

A SHABBY GENTEEL FAMILY.

Everybody knows that there are people whose characteristics are less individual than conspicuous: they have dispositions and proclivities so much in common with their kindred that to allude to them is to provoke an inevitable "Just like the Browns." Such a family resemblance was observable in the house of Sabin; various members of which have more or less to do with this history and cannot be adequately described independent of each other: wherefore propose forthwith to introduce them collectively to the reader.

Old John Sabin, its head and chief, was one of those easy-natured, improvident, kindly, unwise men, who, starting from any position in life, are pretty sure to pursue it on an inclined plane downwards; who never can keep money, though they can earn it; who commonly live from hand to mouth, bring up a large family anyhow, and, dying, leave their children penniless; yet are always remembered with affection and regret rarely accorded to wiser parents. He had begun prosperously as steward to a wealthy nobleman of his native county, but his incurable good-nature and a certain wrong-headed philanthropy, which impelled him to champion the interests of the tenants against those of their landlord, lost him this place and a fine salary just when his rapidly-increasing family made it most desirable for him to retain them. Then he tried other things, with every variety of want of success, until, utilizing a talent he had cultivated as an amateur, he turned painter and picture-restorer, getting a better living than might have been expected. But he was always poor, and always likely to be so; he loved company and brandy-and-water, and never could learn to take thought for the morrow: when he had a sovereign or a shilling anybody was welcome to borrow or share it. He would get delightfully merry at the taverns in the vicinity of Newman Street (where he was as well-known as his juniors; rakish young artists, who drank and smoked more than they sketched or studied, and regarded him with feelings akin to affectionate adoration. Or he would loiter over his easel for hours together, listening to the lads' talk and jokes, and laughing, like a boy amongst boys, until his jolly double chin wagged again. The heartiest, kindest, most genial of old boys, possessing an immense zest for the plausible side of life, and an especial liking for young people—who returned it, as they always do, with interest—his approbative and social qualities were so much in excess of his worldly wisdom that it might be doubted whether he had any. Almost he lacked common prudence. He was fatally popular, everybody liked but nobody respected him. I question if a more lovable man ever existed; or if a thoroughly hard and selfish one might not have proved a better husband and father.

His disposition was so cheerful, that reverses only depressed him momentarily, and so amiable that his very creditors could not be harsh with him. When he came home tipsy, Mrs. Sabin generally broke down in her attempts at scolding; he would mock her anger with burlesque penitence, or caricature it until he made her laugh at, if not with, him. There was no resisting him, she said. Once, chiefly at her solicitation, he signed the pledge of total abstinence from all kinds of intoxicating liquors for six months (by way of experiment), and even took the chair at a temperance-meeting with great effect; but nothing came of it beyond the loss of ten pounds borrowed from him by a rascally lecturer, who abused a good cause to his own selfish ends, and accelerated John Sabin's relapse into his former habits. He was constitutionally incorrigible.

It was no laughing matter, however, for the poor wife. Originally a kind, cordial soul, who had become querulous and taken to Calvinistic-Methodism, she had striven awhile and then succumbed to circumstances. She knew that her husband's abilities might have kept the family in comparative comfort and out of debt, whereas it lived but from day to day, in the shiftiest manner, and sometimes experienced a pecuniary crisis only to be got over by application in a quarter which I shall mention directly; she felt that her children had hardly turned out satisfactorily; but what could she do, lacking sufficient force of character to supply the want of it in John Sabin? So the boys and girls had grown up after their natural bias, unchecked by parental restraint and almost untrained, exhibiting in various degrees one of those strong family likenesses in disposition and character already alluded to.

This was especially the case with the sons; they were all more or less good-looking and—with one exception—careless, improvident, and self-indulgent. The daughters had developed less unfavorably. Women are naturally better than men, besides their opportunities for evil are comparatively limited. A girl bred up in an English family of average morality must be very perverse, or foolish, or artful, or all three, to get into any kind of serious mischief. Now the Sabin, though lax in discipline, always had an uncommonly good opinion of themselves; which conceit, for want of a better restraining principle, operated beneficially—not but what the eldest daughter had experienced a very narrow escape, as will transpire presently. Let me speak of both sons and daughters in their natural order of sequence.

[To be continued.]

A minister once told Wendell Phillips that, if his business in life was to save the negroes, he ought to go South where they were, and do it. "That is worth thinking of," replied Phillips. "And what is your business in life?" "To save men from hell," replied the minister. "Then go there and attend to your business," rejoined Phillips.

The Sanctuary of Superstition.

N. B.—Brief and pithy extracts for this column will be gratefully received. Please send marked copies.

THE PENALTY FOR MURDER.—The Holy Bible is not only a guide-book for salvation, and a history of God's dealings with man, but is also a code of laws. These laws are explicit and practical, and are the true basis for human jurisprudence. Among these statutes stands conspicuous the one relative to the crime of murder. It was given to Noah at his departure from the ark, when the world was about to be re-peopled anew. In connection with the command to be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth with inhabitants, a solemn interdiction was laid upon the taking of life, and to prevent it this law was enacted: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." This law binds every son of Noah, and is as authoritative as the Bible itself. The early settlers of this country observed it sacredly; but of late years it has fallen into neglect.

In the Tombs there are at this moment twenty-two men confined on the charge of murder, and it is said that there is not one of them who does not expect an acquittal. Our citizens are becoming alarmed; life is becoming unsafe. What is to be done? We must go back to the Old Book whose injunctions we have disobeyed, and must put every wilful murderer to death. Our humanitarian doctrines will not stand. The fiery tempers of the human heart are too strong for them. We do not exhort a return to the Bible principle; we must return to it, or New York will become uninhabitable.—N. Y. Union Advocate.

INSURE YOUR SOUL.—The matter of insurance has assumed a prime importance in the minds of all business men during the last few weeks. The standing of the companies in which policies are secured will be scrutinized as never before. Merchants feel the importance of really obtaining the insurance for which they pay their annual premiums. They will cheerfully devote larger sums to this object if they can feel a sense of repose as to the abilities of the underwriters who take their risks. The only criticism that has been made upon the course of the firms that have been unable, on account of the fire, to meet their engagements in full, is that they were not adequately insured. Over a million, in some instances, have been risked with only insurance upon one-third of it.

It is impossible to escape the moral of this perilous lesson. It is not impertinence, even in this hour of sore temporal distress, kindly and earnestly to inquire in reference to the provision which our readers have made for the certain and solemn realities just before them. What is their assurance in view of the positive contingency of death, but a short space in advance of them? Have they lately examined their policies? Is the whole risk positively covered? Is the Divine seal stamped upon the spiritual record?—Zion's Herald.

WHAT BECAME OF HIM?—At another time, an infidel collier came to laugh at him. But God's word, "He that being often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy," received a terrible illustration in this man. On Monday, when he went to his work, he said he had heard Weaver say that before next Saturday night some one there would be dead, and if not in Christ would be damned. He said he would take notice, and, if there was no one dead, he would go and tell Weaver that he was a liar. The man to whom he spoke said it might be himself; but he replied, "No danger: I shall live to be an old man." He died that day.—Good Words.

CAUSE AND EFFECT?—Another terrible instance of the danger of delay occurred at the same time. A working-man in Liverpool came to the meetings at Brunswick Hall, and a Christian man pressed him to decide for the Lord. He said, "I'll come again." On the Saturday following, his master, who was a believer, said, "Now I hope you'll decide to be on the Lord's side." "Not to-day," said he; "I'm going to Brunswick Hall to-morrow night, and I shall decide then." He received his money and went away. When he got home he opened the door, and with his hand yet on the latch he fell forward into his own house, dead.—Good Words.

REVIVALS.—And revivals are especially needed, that sinners may be converted and saved. This is a matter of amazing interest. They should be saved now. Their services are needed in Zion. And if not brought to Christ, they must perish forever.—Morning Star (Dec. 18, 1872).

BOWING TO JESUS.—Bring men face to face with the Savior, and impress them that history, the age and reason, as well as the Bible and the Church, demand an answer to the question, "What think ye of Christ?" and, unless they struggle conscience, they must bow at the throne of Jesus.—Gospel Echo.

"You sit as God, holding no form of creed," I overheard a lady say to a gentleman with whom she was conversing earnestly in the cars.

"No; I sit as man, believing what is, doing what is to do, ready to learn the truth, but not willing to shout Eureka! and shut my eyes to all that may follow. I cannot comprehend the merit there is in professing a blind faith, or asserting that 'what I believe to-day I shall always believe'—in other words, assert the infallibility of myself or my teachers, or both; for alas! I have proven these teachers and myself to be so fallible!"—Rural New Yorker.

Even the great reformer, Dr. Martin Luther, was so unable to comprehend the new discovery [Copernican] that he came forward as a bitter opponent of Copernicus, and expresses himself with regard to him as follows in his "Table-Talk": "The fool wishes to upset the whole art of Astronomy. But, as Holy Scripture shows, Joshua commanded the sun and not the earth to stand still."—Büchner.

Jedediah Burchard, once preaching a revival sermon, was interrupted by the entrance of Aaron Burr. "Here comes one," said the revivalist, "against whom I, even, will testify in the Day of Judgment." "Yes, sir," said Burr, "In fifty years of criminal practice I have always found the greatest rascal turn State's evidence."

A YOUNG ECONOMIST.—A couple of householders of moderate means were one day discussing the high price of coal, and calculating the cost of keeping up their two fires.

"Father!" said a little boy who sat near, "if it costs so much to keep up two fires, how much it must cost to keep up the fires of hell!"

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OGDON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1873. Future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED previously, Nine Hundred and Sixty-Seven Shares, $96,700
W. A. THURSTON, West Newton, Mass., One Share, 100
$96,800

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending February 8, 1873.

Katherine H. Brown.....	$ 30	S. C. Sly.....	50
Jug.	3 00	G. W. Kurtzeborn.....	3 00
Mark T. Adams.....	1 00	L. B. B. Case.....	2 75
H. Sander.....	3 00	C. R. Muller.....	8 00
L. R. Leelle.....	1 50	M. L. Wilder.....	10 00
Thos. Hughes.....	3 00	Chas. E. Grinnell.....	1 00
Andrew Moulds.....	3 00	I. R. Leelle.....	1 50
Geo. Hos.....	1 00	P. H. Bateson & Co.....	20 00
Geo. Ollinger.....	1 00	L. W. Stevenson.....	65
Miles Lathrop.....	3 00	J. T. Sunderland.....	15
S. D. Curtis.....	3 00	Chas. H. Pierce.....	10 00
C. T. Robbins.....	3 00	J. F. Fisher.....	10
Miss E. T. Robbins.....	3 00	Jno. P. Bramhall.....	10
L. J. Wagner.....	1 00	Henry Staggs.....	10 00
Mrs. H. W. Paine.....	1 00	Nelson Thwing.....	25
Prescott Poor.....	2 70	Abner Shaw.....	3 10
J. O. Bentley.....	3 00	Jno. Ingler.....	75
E. M. Brown.....	3 00	G. H. Stebbins.....	5 50
S. B. Palmer.....	3 00	P. H. Wood.....	3 00
Mrs. H. Walkeys.....	3 00	E. S. Danham.....	3 25
Joel D. Owens.....	3 00	Milo Hunter.....	3 00
E. M. Munday.....	3 00	A. G. Norman.....	3 00
S. A. Niver.....	3 00	Thos. S. Murray.....	3 00
H. M. Erskine.....	3 00	Mary Salina Reade.....	75
Chas. J. Abbot.....	2 00	J. H. Comstock.....	3 00
E. B. Waldo.....	3 00	Jno. A. Dobroluboff.....	8 00
Wm. A. Hawley.....	3 00	C. B. Moore.....	75
A. A. Brown.....	1 50	Miss S. H. Tolbot.....	1 50
Henry M. North.....	75	Robert Moore.....	3 00
Elmore Sharp.....	1 00	Detroit Review of
M. N. Brainard.....	1 00	Medicine.....
K. K. Hart.....	1 00	Geo. Lynn.....
E. F. Beale.....	1 00	W. F. Fiedick.....
Mary Moore.....	1 00	E. M. Perkins.....
Wm. Porter.....	1 00	Thos. R. Hazard.....
Adam Wolf.....	2 00	Wm. Holl.....
C. T. Baxton.....	1 00	Mrs. J. C. Dinmore.....
Wm. Burnett.....	1 00	Wm. H. Wood.....
C. Mason.....	1 00	Silas W. Coburn.....
Myron H. Adams.....	1 00	J. E. Corliss.....
Harriet Adams.....	1 00	Chas. Tausig.....
E. M. Moore.....	3 00	Paul DeGaffer.....
Sam'l Wilder.....	3 00	M. Pinkerton.....
Anson C. Allen.....	1 00	Geo. Vealhofer.....
James N. Angle.....	1 50	J. Thompson.....
O. C. Sprague.....	75	Jno. Deming.....
Frances E. Burr.....	75	Henry B. Fowler.....
C. A. Lovejoy.....	75	J. L. Cutler.....
Chester F. Hardon.....	6 00	Stephen Woodin.....
Scott Stivers.....	1 85	Henry Jones.....
Thos. B. Sanders.....	1 50	J. C. Paint.....
Chas. A. Norton.....	75	David Ulery.....
Chas. Cloyce.....	3 00	J. L. Pratt.....
Wm. T. Menefee.....	1 00	W. A. Mansfield.....
J. C. Reeve.....	50	Zina Eager.....
Smith Phillip.....	25	Nath Robinson.....
Abel Burnett.....	1 00	Ch. H. Ellis.....
Henry M. Murphy.....	1 50	F. T. Ellis.....
Curtis Taber.....	1 50	Wm. Barrian.....
C. C. Tolles.....	2 00	A. E. Macomber.....
P. B. Ferris.....	3 00	E. F. Dinmore.....
F. B. Perkins.....	50	J. B. Pratt.....
Jas. Mackenzie.....	1 00	A. A. Trowbridge.....

The Index.

FEBRUARY 15, 1878.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonise it with the Bible. It recognises no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilised world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 88, TOLEDO, OHIO." All charges, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

FRANCIS ELLENWOOD ARNOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
CONTRACTORS: BROOKS, FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH, HENDERSON, WILLIAM J. PORTER, RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, WILLIAM H. STANLEY, MRS. E. D. CHURCH, ROY. CHARLES VOTAW (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONMOUTH D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Please send all matter intended for any particular issue of THE INDEX at least a fortnight in advance of date. We shall be very greatly obliged by attention to this request.

"BETWEEN TWO HAY-STACKS."

After the first prospectus of THE INDEX had been issued in November, 1869, we were apprised of the existence of another paper of the same name, published in Milwaukee,—the advocate of a peculiarly ranting species of Evangelicism. This sheet, probably displeased with the new associations that began to gather about its name, some months ago changed it to "The Christian Statesman." But it has only jumped out of the frying-pan into the fire. This newly adopted name belonged already to the Philadelphia paper which is so zealously, and we must add ably, devoted to the cause of the proposed Christian Amendment to the United States Constitution. So far, however, is the Milwaukee paper from sympathizing with this project, that it devotes the chief article of its issue for January 8th to making a few pointed suggestions to the legislature of Wisconsin, now in session; especially "to abolish the law exempting the property of religious and certain other societies from taxation," and "to put an effectual stop to the evil practice of appropriating public money to institutions over which the State does not possess entire control" (with special reference to Catholic institutions). Would it not now be a good plan for our Milwaukee contemporary to change its name back again to the old one, and thus express its evident approbation of the "Demands of Liberalism"?

Seriously, we are very glad to see any journal urging in good earnest the taxation of Church property, and the abolition of all other relics of Church-and-State amalgamation. There are a great many Protestants whose Christianity is a great deal nearer to Free Religion than it is to Roman Catholicism, which are the only positions logically tenable on Church-and-State issues. If this were not the fact, we should have little hope of seeing the final accomplishment of the purification of our government from all ecclesiasticism. Let these issues be made plain, and the thorough-going liberals will be joined by a great host of allies. Protestantism will by and by divide itself between "Rome and Reason" politically, as it is already doing theologically. The Christianizers are headed directly towards the Pope, while the reluctant Evangelicals are headed directly towards the Liberal League. Let the question once come to its decision, and the scales will fall from millions of eyes. It will then suddenly become evident that America is too far gone in free thought to continue much longer her adhesion to a dying religion. Her innermost faith is of the future, not of the past.

CULTURE AND ORTHODOXY.

Does free religion promote a higher and finer mental growth than Orthodoxy? I sincerely believe it does. Liberty is the condition of progress. The partisan can never learn the truth. He only who is free, who puts away all prejudice, who vows to follow truth at all hazards to present convictions,—only he grows really wise with time and thought and study. A truly liberal education can be attained but by a truly liberal mind. Those of our young men and women who by any means or from any motive are induced to "join the Church," and to abide continuously by its doctrines, are really trapped into a sort of intellectual nunnery and led to take the veil which blinds their mental sight. Let us hope that they will all sometime and somehow escape! And, in the meantime, let us who are outside assist to hasten their deliverance by every fair argument and kind persuasion, bringing truth and love to the rescue, and gradually levelling the walls which now so closely and so sadly immure them.

In connection with the foregoing, I offer the following extract from a letter in reply to one from a mother asking counsel from the writer of this to her son, in the matter of pursuing a course of reading. The inducement for printing it here is the same as that which prompted it to be written in the first instance—the hope that it may suggest something profitable to consider.

"You ask me to suggest a course of reading for —. For several reasons, this is a difficult thing to do, though I should be very glad to do it, or to help him to select his own course. But I fear, would hardly be interested in what I should propose, albeit I would not propose anything partisan or narrow. Culture—self-culture—with him ought not to be the work of one or two years, but the work of a life-time; he ought to be willing it should be the work of a life-time. But, to be candid, I must say that any one who is determinedly Orthodox, Evangelical, cannot be cultured in any broad, thorough, large sense. This might seem to — narrow and partisan in me to say; but I say it simply because I believe it and know it to be true. The acceptance of the popular, prevalent Orthodox doctrines prejudices one necessarily against much of the very finest, choicest, and best literature of the world. The noblest, ablest thought of all ages is un-Orthodox, un-Evangelical, and leads the mind in a direction right away from what is considered by the Church sound doctrine. This explains why all, or nearly all, the best cultured people—the most thoughtful, the most studious, the most extensively read—are liberal or radical. I am willing you should tell — what I say; because I say it in true love to him, and with the deepest interest in his welfare. His own minister (Baptist though he is) told me himself, that he had never been able to reconcile Orthodox doctrines with the best literature of the world; with the freest, most thorough enlightenment he had been able to obtain from books and thoughtful study. Just so far as men and women are thoroughly intelligent, truly enlightened, they cease to be Orthodox. — cannot take hold of the best books in any department of literature, without coming at once into the midst of thickest heresies. He knows himself, and does not need to have me tell him, that all the classics are non-Christian—they know nothing of 'Christ and him crucified.' The finest books of philosophy are heretical, so far as doctrinal Christianity is concerned. Des Cartes, Spinoza, Leibnitz, Kant, Fichte, even Hegel—none of these are 'sound'; if he should follow out their logic, it would lead him away from Orthodoxy. So in history. Hum, Gibbon, Buckle, Prescott, Froude—they and many other of our very best historians are dangerous reading for any one who means to be true to the Church. Most of the finest poetry is also saturated with the spirit of free thought. He cannot find a finer poem, in many respects, a hundred years old, than Lessing's 'Nathan The Wise'; yet if he reads it and admires it, his Orthodoxy is in danger. So too, if he reads Shakespeare, Milton, Goethe, and our modern poets. No more can he read the great essayists without having his belief in Evangelicism confounded. No young man ought to consider himself cultured until he has read and re-read Carlyle and Emerson; but both of these are slayers of Orthodox convictions. As to scientific books,—they are openly, necessarily, inevitably opposed to all the prominent Evangelical notions, cutting them up root and branch. Nobody can be scientific and Orthodox at the same time.

In view of all these facts—and facts they are indisputably—how can I advise — as to a good course of reading, without putting into his hands the very knife with which he will cut the throat of his Orthodox faith? I love him, for your sake and for his own, and would be glad to serve him; but I cannot help him in this way without frankly telling him that I should be leading him away from all the great Church doctrines he now hugs to his heart. I tell him plainly, sincerely, kindly, that he cannot take up any wide, thorough course of study, without making up his mind that, in following the leadings of the truth as it shall gradually dawn upon him, he will if necessary (and it will be necessary) break with and give up the old Orthodox notions. The best minds of the world have shaken or are shaking them off; the best thought of the world, as expressed in every department of literature, is marching steadily in the opposite direction. Let — ponder on what I say; for, I repeat it again, I say it as his real and true friend."

A. W. S.

"NO RELIGIOUS PREFERENCES."

I often think that our religious radicals underestimate the work they are doing, and the amount of latent radicalism in the community at large. They test their own strength by the number who attend some radical meeting on Sunday; whereas the census should really include those who do not go to meeting at all. Nor should we estimate the progress of liberal thought by the number who belong to any political or religious or irreligious association, but by the number who simply say, when asked, that they have no religious preferences at all.

For instance, there has just appeared in Maine a pamphlet describing and classifying the members of the legislature of that State. The religious statistics are as follows:—

In the Senate: no religious preferences, 6; Universalist, 6; Congregationalist, 5; Free Baptist, 4; Baptist, 2; Liberal, 2; Unitarian, 1; Methodist, 1; Orthodox, 1; Episcopal, 1. Total, 29.

In the House: no religious preferences, 30; Congregationalist, 29; Universalist, 17; Free Baptist, 13; Methodist, 12; Liberal, 8; Unitarian, 7; Roman Catholic, 2; Episcopalian, 1; Orthodox, 1; Christian, 1; Spiritualist, 1. Total, 139.

Now when we consider under how strong a pressure every public man is put, to declare himself a member of some powerful sect, and how little such avowal costs; when we consider that the sects which most largely prevail in the State of Maine (as seen in this table) are of a comparatively mild type, and not very exacting,—it is certainly remarkable that, even under these circumstances, so many should disclaim all sectarian connection, and the largest following should be under the banner of "no religious preferences."

Of course it is not to be claimed that all those who thus reported themselves have left the Church as distinctly as if they had called themselves "Liberal." Some have possibly revolted from the Church altogether, others from the churches (in the plural form); while others only wish to be tolerant of all or popular with all. Nevertheless, the fact is clear, that they refused to be counted as belonging to any sect; and I confess that this is, to my mind, interesting and important.

Let us therefore carry the analysis a little farther, as follows; including the whole Legislature, both Senate and House:—

1.—"No religious preferences" (including "Liberals" and Spiritualists).....	67
2.—Progressive sects (Universalists and Unitarians).....	31
3.—Conservative Protestant sects (including the "Christian").....	38
4.—Roman Catholics.....	2
	138

It will be seen that the conservative Protestant sects have, as such, barely a working majority in the Maine Legislature. They not only check each other, but they are held in check by the rest, including the great body who have "no religious preferences." It is also to be remembered that many of those classed as Congregationalists, Baptists, &c., are really more liberal than many classed with the more progressive sects; just as Henry Ward Beecher is more truly liberal than Dr. Bellows or Dr. Miner. From all this it is evident, that religious freedom—at least, up to the present point—is likely to be tolerably safe in the State of Maine, under this Legislature, or indeed under any of its successors. For as these men were chosen without reference to any theological issue, they represent with some fairness what future Legislatures are likely to be.

There is another moral to be drawn; namely that it is best for a man to stand by his colors, and define himself as he is. The whole liberal body is the stronger, throughout America, for every one of those Maine men who had the courage to put himself down as a "Liberal," or a Spiritualist, or even as a man without religious preferences, in that Legislature. It would have been so easy for each one to class himself as a Baptist, because his wife had lately been baptized,—or a Congregationalist, because he still paid taxes on the family pew! But these statistics, as they stand, confirm the belief which I for one have long held, that the popular religious organization is coming to be as much a shell as the Southern Confederacy turned out to be; and that what it chiefly needs, everywhere, is a Sherman to ride straight through it.

T. W. H.

BEECHER ON ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.

I have received a letter from a Methodist clergyman, who thinks that in my discourse on "The Doctrine of Hell and Modern Orthodoxy" (printed in THE INDEX of November 30), I have done great injustice to Henry Ward Beecher, by representing him as heretical on the doctrine of everlasting punishment. What I said was this: After speaking of Mrs. Stowe as having openly proclaimed war upon the belief in everlasting punishment, I said that Mr. Beecher "stands no whit behind her in tacitly, if not openly, teaching the same heresy."

It is so difficult to pin Mr. Beecher to any theological statement that it would, perhaps, have been more discreet, if I had left the reference to him as it was originally written and spoken, which was that he "hardly falls behind." Instead of that he "stands no whit behind." But while looking over the manuscript for the press, some recent very vigorous utterances of Beecher against the doctrine of Election, in connection with eternal retribution, were so ringing in my ears that what I had written of him seemed tame, and I made the slight change of phraseology, because for the time the stronger language seemed more truly to indicate his position. But my correspondent refers me to a passage in one of Mr. Beecher's sermons, in which, as he thinks, Mr. Beecher clearly affirms his belief in the doctrine in question, and on the authority of the teachings of Jesus. The passage is in the sermon on Future Punishment, in the fifth volume of Mr. Beecher's published discourses. The first part of the sermon is devoted to showing the very changes that have in late years been taking place in Orthodox sentiment concerning this doctrine to which I referred in my discourse, and to a summary of various beliefs which are held about a future state without any attempt either to affirm or refute them. It is easy, however, to see that Mr. Beecher would allow the fullest freedom of thought on the subject, and that his sympathies incline to the milder views which he has delineated. He in fact says so. But then he comes to a statement of the doctrine as it is contained in the words of Jesus, and closes the statement with the following passages:—

"There is the plain simple statement of Jesus Christ. I cannot get around that, nor get over it. There it is. I have nothing to say. I cannot fathom the matter. A child can ask me questions that I cannot answer. I find my soul aching. As it were drops of blood flow for tears. But, after all, I do believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. And I do not believe he would deceive me, nor deceive you. And if you ask me for the reason for the faith that is in me, I simply say this:—'Jesus says so'—that is all."

This passage, after my attention was called to it, I remembered to have seen when first printed, though it had slipped from my mind. I am very ready however to bring it to the notice of all who read my discourse, and to ask them to let it modify my declaration concerning Beecher as much as they think it ought to do it. But, for myself, even if the passage had been in my mind, I think it would not have much affected my opinion of Mr. Beecher's position on this doctrine. For what is the purport of the passage, especially when read in connection with the whole sermon, but this,—that Mr. Beecher himself, appealing to arguments furnished by his own reason and heart, would not believe in eternal punishment. He only accepts it, because "Jesus says so," without attempting either to fathom the doctrine or to vindicate it. We do not here, then, have the authority of Beecher for the doctrine, but that of Jesus. It is plain that Beecher, were he free from the authority of Jesus, would deny the doctrine.

Nor does Mr. Beecher, even on the authority of Jesus, think it important to preach the doctrine of everlasting punishment as a very vital part of his faith. He is too much in the habit of composing sermons out of material furnished by his own observation, experience, and thought, to find much time for a doctrine which rests with him solely on the authority of the New Testament, and which his own reason and heart, acting freely, would not endorse. My correspondent admits that "he does not make much use of the doctrine," and Mr. Beecher says of himself, in the discourse under notice, that he preaches most from the doctrine of God's love, and does not know "what the scope of that love is, nor where it would logically lead." But he is sure that love must be supreme, and "must bring everything right in the end." He therefore preaches, he says, "without qualification, and almost without limitation, on that side;" and whenever he feels called upon to preach the other side, he confesses he is like a surgeon, undertaking a most painful duty, and that "it makes his heart sick to do it." So much, indeed, does Mr. Beecher emphasize the love of God and the disciplinary and remedial nature of all retributive pain, that impartial readers or hearers of his sermons would agree, I think, that the general tenor of his preaching is rather against the doctrine of eternal punishment than for it. Nor am I sure, even after reading this sermon on Future Punishment, that he might not explain the teaching of Jesus as many Unitarians do, by giving them a rhetorical rather than a dogmatical construction. It is noticeable that in his account of what Jesus preached on this subject, Mr. Beecher does not use the word "everlasting" to indicate the main point in his teaching. The stress is put on the terribleness of the future danger to be escaped from, not on its duration. But whatever Beecher might add in explanation of this point, it is, at least, certain that he does not regard the belief in the doctrine of eternal punishment as a very essential belief, and that he would by no means limit ecclesiastical fellowship by it. And this is sufficient for the argument of that part of my discourse where reference was made to him, the reference being simply for the purpose of showing the change that is going on in the midst of Orthodoxy in respect to this doctrine.

Another fact has lately come under my notice indicating the same thing. In a Massachusetts city with which I am well acquainted there are three Orthodox Congregational Societies. One of them has been regarded as specially upholding a very strict type of Orthodoxy. This Church has recently settled a new minister. The candidate, on his examination before the ordaining council, expressed his conviction that there would be another probation after this life. Yet the Council voted to assent to his ordination and the society accepted him. Mr. Beecher was not one of this council, nor was this precisely a question of everlasting retribution; but it was a kindred heresy, and no one can doubt on which side he would have voted, had he been present. For has he not, within a few months, most vigorously urged a contribution in his society in behalf of the minister whom a council declined to ordain in North Adams, because he could not believe in eternal punishment, but who has found a poor Church in the West that wants to hear him? On the whole, then, I conclude that Mr. Beecher himself would not think that any serious injustice had been done him, by representing him as tacitly if not openly throwing the weight of his teaching against the doctrine of an eternal hell.

W. J. P.

Experience seldom teaches any one but him who has had it. Wisdom is not bought by proxy.

Thackeray said that his parents were rich, but respectable.

Marvin says, "Do not fear to be singular and do not aim to be odd."

SALVATION FREE.

It must be that we have just awakened from a Rip Van Winkle sleep. We have been rubbing our eyes and trying to recall the past,—and have partly succeeded. We have a distinct remembrance that the Independent was once an Orthodox weekly, and that Orthodox Christians did not believe in universal salvation. We are sure of this; as positive as we are that our dog's name was 'Schneider. But yesterday a gust of wind blew a stray copy of the Independent into our face, and for the first time awakened us to the fact, that that paper, which was once the organ, exponent, and defender of Orthodoxy, is now preaching universalism, the salvation of all souls through Christ Jesus. The heresy we refer to may be found in the issue of December 28, in the Christmas editorial. No wonder the pope put this paper on the "Index Expurgatorius;" but where are our good old Protestant inquisitors? Of course the writer makes a thrust at "modern infidelity;" but he wouldn't hurt any one for all the world! He would beg pardon if his rapier should chance to draw blood. See how he does it:—

"The delism of the day is, much of it, very cowardly. Ashamed to stand on its own merits, it cloaks itself with a name that has gained renown. We admire the courage of Francis E. Abbot, of Toledo, who says, 'I do not acknowledge Jesus or any other man as my master; and therefore I renounce the name Christian.' It is not in odium that we reclaim the name of Christian from those who have no right to it. Many of them we respect. They may be loved and noble men. They may not see as we see [parenthetical induction!]. What brings conviction to us does not, perhaps (for we will not judge) cannot, bring conviction to them. We believe that salvation came through Christ, and it may be (for we would not dogmatize nor limit God) that he may save through the cross those who honestly seek after God, even though, for some reason, they could not see him in Christ; even as other pre-Christian worthies—Abraham and David, Socrates and Plato—in the same way found life through their faith in that God who is recognized in the very name of delism."

The italics are ours. If this is not very near old-fashioned Universalism, then we are blind to distinctions. If Socrates and Plato may be saved in the name of delism, and all may be saved who "honestly seek after God," though "they may not see as we see,"—then, pray, who is not going to be saved?

Would it not be well for the editor of the Independent to imitate what he so much admires in the editor of THE INDEX? If "courage" demands that all renounce the name Christian who do not acknowledge Jesus as master, as the Independent thinks, does not the same courage demand that any man who believes that "all may be saved who honestly seek after God, though they may not see as he sees," shall renounce the name "Orthodox"? No doubt some of the delism of the day is very cowardly, as this Orthodox editor says; but neither is there any doubt that some of the Orthodoxy of the day is very cowardly. It also cloaks a new faith in "a name that has gained renown." We heartily rejoice to see that the editor of the Independent is so much of a Universalist; but would he not exhibit a little more courage, if not honesty, if he would do what Mr. Abbot does—boldly renounce what he is presumed to believe but does not?

Or, may we be mistaken, after all? While we have slept, the old Independent perhaps has sold out to the Universalists, and Bowen has given place to Ballou! Certainly if this is modern Orthodoxy, we have drifted far from the days of Edwards, who wrote on the "Punishment of the wicked," and "Sinners in the hands of an angry God," and who preached that "God holds sinners in his hands over the mouth of hell as so many spiders;" and from another writer who assures us that "the damned are packed like brick in a kiln, so bound that they cannot move a limb nor even an eyelid, and God shall blow the fires of hell through them forever and ever." We do still find occasionally some man—like Spurgeon—who still preaches literal damnation in a literal hell; but except revival preachers we are happy to believe that such teachers are rare. The modern Orthodox hell seems to be shut up, and the tide of emigration has set in the other direction. Apparently the Independent thinks that heaven and hell are about what good old Father Taylor thought. "I tell you," said he, "they are so near together that myriads of souls to-day don't know which they are in." Such a hell is not a very bad place to go to; it is simply a place of "eternal uneasiness," as one kind-hearted preacher described its torments.

The fact of it is that, with most of the modern Orthodox, there is no hell to speak of, and "salvation's free," as their song says. We think a little more courage would lead many of them—editors and preachers and people—from free salvation to free religion. W. H. S.

LONDON LETTER.

ECCLIASTICAL LAW SUITS—WHAT THEY SETTLE OR UNSETTLE—DR. TEMPLE, THE BISHOP OF EXETER.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I do not know what amount of religious pugnacity may prevail in America, but you can hardly have more than we have now in Great Britain. By a pleasing fiction it is supposed that an ecclesiastical law suit, though very expensive, has the beneficial result of settling some vexed question and restoring peace. There never was a greater delusion. Every fresh decision leads to further animosity, and the Privy Council has barely time to pronounce a judgment before some new appeal is laid at its door.

The Gorham case was followed by an abortive action against Archdeacon Denison, who got out of his trouble by a fluke. The Essays and Reviews case was followed by a series of attacks on Bishop Colenso, which however never reached the desired end—the trial of his opinions. Then came a more successful attack upon myself, which instead of silencing rationalism had the effect of bringing out into greater distinctness the heretical utterances of certain clergy whom I have left still safe and snug in their benefices. One of them rose in his pulpit the Sunday after my condemnation, and the gist of his sermon was this: "I quite agree with Voysey, but I mean to stay where I am. Come and turn me out if you like." Soon after this event, which has done a world of good, there followed two judgments on Purohas and Bennett, the latter giving a decided triumph to the ritualists.

Now mark what follows. The ritualists are now going in for a prosecution of the Evangelists. Emboldened by the Bennett judgment, and reckoning on the aid of Sir Robert Phillimore in the Privy Council, the sacerdotal and sacramentarian party are about to indict the Rev. Geo. Porter, vicar of St. Leonard, Exeter, on a charge of heresy. Mr. Porter is no rabid Protestant, nor extreme Calvinist; but he has a wholesome horror of priestcraft with its confessional, and other abominations. He has also a healthy contempt for the jugglery and incantations by which the sacerdotalists hocus the people and beguile many silly women. He therefore preached a sermon on "The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper," denouncing the mystical character of the rite, and showing that it was only and purely commemorative. This of course he might have done on rational grounds; but in a moment of inspiration, he seized upon the idea of doing his work in the exact method laid down as his rule by the laws of the Church of England. Instead of mere common sense, he used the Bible as his weapon. He drew all his arguments from Scripture and antiquity, thus satisfying the claims of his position, and turning his adversaries' weapons against themselves.

Considering the issue now in prospect, Mr. Porter is to be congratulated upon his selection of method and upon the fact that he is, consequently, almost certain to be acquitted. I wonder when the bishops and privy councillors will acknowledge what they surely must have seen already; namely, that in such disputes, both parties are right. The Bible and the prayer-book are very counterparts of each other in the matter of heterogeneous and contradictory doctrines. The ritualist and the Evangelical alike can find ample support for their respective views. If in one place it is most clearly written that the "Lord's Supper" is simply a commemorative rite, in another place it is as clearly written down as a piece of magic. It is only a question of a little more or a little less weight on one side or the other. Then again, if the Bible be considerably on Mr. Porter's side, which no doubt it is, he can be knocked over by the prayer-book; and if his adversaries can be repelled by the Articles, they can have at him again with the Service and the Rubrics.

It is very encouraging to know that the laity in and around Exeter strongly support Mr. Porter, and that his congregation has considerably increased since the attacks made upon him by the ritualists. The Daily Western Times—a very able paper—has twice given his sermon in its columns verbatim.

In the midst of the row there appears a curious but indispensable figure—the fugitive Dr. Temple, Bishop of Exeter. This noble man, after withdrawing his harmless essay from the companionship of the other valuable Essays and Reviews, in consequence of the indignities to which it exposed him in convocation and elsewhere, goes like a penitent to the Upper House and asks the dear bishops to forgive him this time and he will never do it again!

This bishop, of course, is applied to for the legal permission to institute proceedings against Mr. Porter, and instantly consents. I do not wonder. The bishop cannot be blamed for the act itself; but I do wonder that he had not a word of good counsel to offer the belligerents; that he did not say, as he might have done with much episcopal grace: "Sirs, ye are brethren, why do ye wrong one to another?" No; all he said was to this effect, though not in these words: "You may go to law if you please, but I'll back Porter to win."

There is another pretty quarrel in the North, in the Presbytery of Dundee; but I must defer that subject till my next letter.

I am, sir, very sincerely yours.

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE,
DULWICH, S. E., Jan. 15, 1873.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

CONSISTENCY IN LITTLE THINGS is a rare jewel. So one is glad when it appears, and likes to speak of it. Cambridge divinity students want to "preach the gospel" as often as may be during the entire term of their study, and re-enforce their "petition" with letters from distinguished clergymen. Mr. Wm. J. Potter's response approves the "subject matter" of the petition, but states that he "cannot sign the paper, because I cannot, without some mental reservation, call myself a minister of the gospel." One need not go out of his way to proclaim what he can or cannot do; but when opportunities come up pat, like this one, it is a real service the outspoken word performs.

BOSTON HAS A "LIBERAL LEAGUE," the organization of which I suppose will be duly reported in THE INDEX. As one part of the business of these Leagues will undoubtedly be the circulation of pointed and telling "tracts" (I wish there was a better word), I venture to suggest to those whom it may concern, that C. K. Whipple has at least three different short discussions pertaining to the general subject of Church and State, which would do admirable service. He has a few thousand for gratuitous distribution. He tells me he will forward them to any League, if applied to, asking only a remuneration sufficient to cover the postage. But he should have more, that he may be able to continue their publication and supply a large demand.

THE SECOND RADICAL CLUB of this city is having a pleasant and profitable time this winter. There are two meetings each month, which are largely attended. It proposes for itself no work beyond that of essays and conversation. For one, I am quite content with this; for it is seed-sowing, or, better, thought-suggesting;—and, though our eyes behold not the harvest, my faith in human nature and in the force and power of ideas to mould and shape it assures me that the work so begun is not likely to go amiss. To hasten it beyond its natural, spontaneous growth is practically to abandon it: somewhat else may be accomplished of an outward significance, but surely not, I opine, the liberty of souls.

Think to build a party new,
Freedom's battle fight and win?
Win the battle—win and lose;
Mid the conflict's roar and din,
Freedom real sinks from view;

Ever is the substance spoiled,
Ever is the victor foiled:
Freedom each in peace doth choose.

THE TWENTY-EIGHTH CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY, which began with Theodore Parker's ministry in Boston, and which since his death has maintained a rather dubious and doubtful existence,—ever, if we may credit Zion's Herald, on the point of dissolution,—is proving at length that it has these many years been neither dead nor asleep. Persistent and patient, it begins now to see its way to a home of its own, and to look forward to a long and useful career. Its new building, to be called the Parker Memorial, is so far advanced that the first floor—which is designed ultimately to furnish rooms for the Parker Fraternity—will be in readiness for the meetings of the society in May. The hall for the society is to be on the second floor, and will seat from 800 to 1,000. In October there is to be a great fair to raise funds. Already the plans are being perfected, and it is expected that this enterprise will prove a great success. When all is accomplished, and the whole building is put in order, then the society will settle a pastor, let will not require him to prepare a weekly discourse. The same plan in operation now will still prevail to some extent, and different speakers will occasionally be engaged. This winter, the society has heard John Weiss (who speaks on the first Sunday in every month), Samuel Johnson, Samuel Longfellow, O. B. Frothingham, William C. Gannett, John W. Chadwick, Rowland Connor, Celia Burleigh, and others. A society that has the wit to choose food of such excellent quality can not be far from the kingdom,—if, indeed, there be any virtue in intellectual and spiritual diet!

TO GET MONEY TO WORK WITH! Ah, many and devious are the ways! Some good people of a certain town in Tennessee wished to repair their grave-yard; and, taking the gauge of their brethren and sisters, to discern what would be most likely to take, proposed a grand public dance! How often doth the end well justify the means! In the case of the Boston Y. M. C. A., the means proposed are both novel and pleasing. We are to have a "Bazaar of all Nations," and the proceeds are to pay the debts of the above named Association. At a meeting recently held, the project was discussed and explained. The exhibition will take place in May and continue twenty days. The merchandise to be sold is to be "immense." The following report of the meeting, from a morning paper, conveys something of the idea:—

"After prayer by Mr. Russell Sturgis, Jr., president of the Association, Mr. Franklin W. Smith proceeded to explain at some length the proposed plan. Around the walls of the room were hung designs of the various kinds of architecture which prevail in ten or twelve different nationalities of the world, and which it is proposed to reproduce in Music Hall, on as large and complete a scale as possible. A large canvas, showing how Music Hall, under the proposed plan, would be metamorphosed into a street, with houses of all nations at the sides and end, was displayed in full view of the audience. Mr. Smith, after explaining the various designs, which were executed by Messrs. H. Floyd Faulkner and George R. Clarke, designers, proceeded to show how broad arcades were to run underneath all these specimens of architecture, how appropriate articles of merchandise would be for sale at every point, and how Music Hall seemed almost to have been expressly designed for the 'Bazaar of all nations' which it is proposed there to hold."

Why doesn't some energetic radical "cudgel his brains" and show how we may "raise the wind"? Without much cudgeling some one might propose—might he not?—a very great national — for the illustration and propagation, say, of Darwin's development theory. Couldn't specimen copies of all things and creatures be brought from all the ends of the earth and placed before all eyes in their natural order? All gaps could be filled with the showman's eloquence; and—but I forbear from going beyond this simple hint, which to the wise will I trust be all-sufficient.

WE HAVE NOT HAD Mr. Weiss' Shakspearian lectures in Boston yet, and we are waiting anxiously. Rumor rates them very high. And, thanks to the bit of "persecution" he has received at the hands of the New York Y. M. C. A., their fame has spread, and he is likely to be in demand for the rest of the season.

AND THE LITTLE ROW Laird Collier got up at the Chicago Conference, when Mr. Weiss was reading his "Act of Faith"—I wonder if, indeed, we are drifting into trouble all around! But Collier's performance seems from this distance hardly gentlemanly. The report goes that, being sick and unable to read himself, he invited Weiss to take his place; and then broke in upon his reading, unwilling to sit and listen to such talk! I doubt if that was just the thing for a "Liberal Christian" to do. The damage to Weiss, however, is not reported to be great.

Literary Department.

NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS.—All books designed for review in these columns must be addressed to THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

GOTT IM LICHT DER NATURWISSENSCHAFTEN. STUDIEN UEBER GOTT, WELT, UNSTERBLICHKEIT. VON PHILIPP SPILLER. (God in the Light of the Natural Sciences. Studies concerning God, the Universe, and Immortality. By Philip Spiller.) Berlin, 1873. 8vo. pp. viii, 120.

The object of this book is stated by the author in the following language:—

"There sits the bereaved wife beside the grave of her husband! Close to him lie the earthly remains of her dear child. Her thoughts are petrified; she is scarcely conscious; all she experiences is feeling; only a single ray of hope animates her, only one consolation lights up the dullness of her eyes—meeting again in the other world! There is a God, a Being who rules the universe and who has planted Love in the heart of Nature. Nature strips off her winter clothing, and all creeping things awake from their torpor and rise up from Mother Earth into newness of life and newness of joy. And Man, the noblest of all terrestrial beings, can it be that with the death of the body he ceases to exist altogether? Impossible. Even the rude troglodytes of primitive ages put into the graves of the dead utensils of stone, weapons, and food, so that at the future awakening they would have by them those things which were most necessary. The soul, the spirit, this intangible something, which in life was often so powerful both in building and in destroying, sometimes blessing, sometimes annihilating whole nations,—can this when it forsakes the body cease to be? This is not thinkable. There is an incomprehensible Being above us who rules the world and who will also regulate our activity in the 'next life.'"

"God, World, Future Life! These are the highest conceptions which can occupy our mind. But there has never been among mankind any agreement, or any real clearness of thought, concerning them; on the contrary, they have given occasion to the bitterest conflicts, and even in our day still exercise a disturbing influence; and yet there can be but one truth concerning them. The following treatise is intended as a contribution towards finding this truth."

The conclusions to which the author comes at the close of his investigation, it is, perhaps, also best to state in his own words. They are as follows:—

"God is a material substance, infinite in space and eternal (i. e. uncreated and indestructible) in time; namely—the Cosmical Ether."

"This is indeed the soul of the world, since in virtue of its very nature it forms the material atoms, which float in space, into bodies, according to definite laws; imparts to them orderly motions; enters into such intimate reciprocal action with their atoms, that it not only organizes but also animates them, and thus makes them capable (although for each separate individuality only transitorily) of living participation in the cosmical process."

"Our God possesses, therefore, the attributes which are ascribed to him in the better religious creeds: he is a spirit in so far as he is not a body; he is omnipresent, for he occupies infinite space, penetrates every body, and surrounds every atom; he is omnipotent, for not a single atom can escape his active influence; he is the creator of heaven (i. e. of all celestial bodies) and of earth with all its creatures; he also created us human beings and breathed into us living souls, for he organized the materials to this end and entered into vital co-operation with them; he is in this sense also the preserver and nourisher of his creatures, which are essentially producers (plants) and consumers (animals); he governs the universe with permanent power according to unchangeable rational laws from eternity to eternity, because he is infinite and eternal; he is all-wise, for he works only according to strict rational laws; he is just, because he never departs from these laws, and punishes only those who act in disobedience to the rational laws which he has dictated; he never errs (and is therefore alone infallible), because he administers these laws without self-consciousness and without any purpose in view." (pp. 119, 120.)

"In the whole of Nature there is an ascending gradation, the result of gradual development. From unorganized matter there is an advance to that which is organized in the simplest form, where organization consists for the time being only in atomic or molecular attraction. From the formation of crystals, which are found already in the masses of the primitive rocks, there is an advance to chemical attraction; by this means arises the primitive organic substance, protoplasm; then come the moneres, then simple cells, then the simplest vegetable and animal forms consisting of cells, with gradually ascending vital, psychical, and logical powers, which in man reach their culmination. But there is everywhere only a difference of degree; no other even between animal and man; for, everywhere the same formative power is at work, and even the embryonic cell is vitalized and animated by the cosmical ether. The animal already manifests hatred and love, sorrow and joy, pain and pleasure, and gratitude also; it has experiences, compares, infers, and thus shows traces of thought; it has its languages of gesture and sound, builds dwellings for itself which are often more artistic than those of man, educates its young, loves and chastises them; it is capable of culture, especially through intercourse with man; it has not only domestic life but also forms associations, often with admirable arrangements. Enough! In respect to the soul, too, there is only a difference of degree between beast and man." (p. 104.)

"It is clear, that with the cessation of the vital play of the material atoms in our body, i. e., with the cessation of organic activity in the body, or with death, the particular or individual soul-life, immanent therein, ceases also: the resonance of the material atoms of the organic body to the vibrations of the cosmical ether has disappeared with their return to stable equilibrium, and the former vibrations of the atoms of the brain die away and vanish in the soul of the world. Thus the continued personal existence even of the spirit is not to be thought of; although there is a harmonious uniform continuance of all highly developed spirits who find themselves at one with the eternally true laws of the universe. It is the very giving up, then, of our selfish egotism which affords a hope for the future of a cosmical process tending ever more and more to perfection. The more we enter into connection with the changing phenomena of the external world, the more we endeavor to find out the law which governs them and to make it our intellectual property,—the higher our organization in body, soul, and spirit will become, the more perfect will be the harmony of our soul with the soul of the universe, and the sooner we shall attain to eternal life." (p. 116.)

However much one might be inclined to doubt it at first sight, this is all sober earnest; and the writer is not a mere literary cobweb-spinner, but the author of various works on physical science of acknowledged worth. Certainly this view of the universe must be very consoling to the bereaved wife and mother whom the writer has in view at the beginning of his undertaking.

BIBEL-LEXIKON. REALWORTERBUCH ZUM HANDBEGRUEN FÜR GEISTLICHE UND GEMEINDEGLIEDER. HERAUSGEGEBEN VON KIRCHENRATH PROF. DR. DANIEL SCHENKEL. Vierter Band. LABAN—PRUEFUNG. (Bible Lexicon. A Cyclopædia for the use of Clergymen and Laymen. Edited by Dr. Daniel Schenkel, Professor and Ecclesiastical Councillor. Fourth volume. L. to P. inclusive.) Leipzig, 1872. Large 8vo. pp. 637.

This is the only Bible Dictionary in existence on which the student can rely for anything like accurate information concerning the present state of knowledge and criticism in regard to the various subjects connected with the study of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. The names of such contributors as Hitzig, Lipsius, Noeldke, Reuss, Schrader, Holtzmann, Pritzsche, Hausmann, Schweizer, Roskoff, Keim, Mangold, Merx, Dlestel, Gass, are a sufficient guarantee as to the thoroughly scientific and impartial character of the work. It would be easy to name half a dozen articles in each of the volumes which have thus far appeared, any one of which is worth more than the price of the whole volume. Holtzmann's articles on the Gospels, of which there are three in the present volume, may be mentioned as especially valuable. His article on "John" is a masterpiece of condensation and clearness. The article on "Paul," by Professor Hausmann, covers thirty-five pages and is an admirable presentation of the various questions connected with the career and works of the great apostle to the Gentiles.

If only some English or American publishing house could be found liberal enough to issue a translation of the whole work, it would place both students and the general reading public under lasting obligations. T. V.

STUDIES IN POETRY AND PHILOSOPHY. By J. C. Shairp, author of "Culture and Religion." New York: Hurd & Houghton. Cambridge: Riverside Press. 1872.

The studies contained in this volume are four in number, and they relate to Wordsworth as the poet and prophet of Nature; to Coleridge as a thinker of ideal things; to Keble as a poet who tried to carry the love of Nature and of high ideals into ecclesiasticalism; and to "the moral motive power," which is the force underlying true religion and good life. Mr. Shairp writes with a love of truth, of moral good, and of humanity, and with a charity, good sense, and depth of liberal sympathy and insight, which must command for him the hearty interest of all earnest and excellent minds. He takes a fair middle course between theological dogmatism on the one side and materialistic dogmatism on the other, and presents in a very candid manner the claims of idealism as a philosophy of things which are beyond sight and touch. The fourfold plea which his four essays make may not convince the strict positivist, who insists upon stopping short where the senses stop, and who feels contempt for exercises of mind which look beyond proof; but they will certainly interest every sympathetic thinker, every one who has a feeling of human interest with his fellows, even if he cannot go with them in opinion. At least the materialist should carefully examine idealism in its best illustrations; for these men of great genius, from Plato to Coleridge, are positive facts of human history, and worthy of study and appreciation. It is as a study of idealism that Mr. Shairp's essays are of particular value. Those on Wordsworth, the poet of idealism, and on Coleridge, the philosopher of idealism, are the larger half of the book, and are of greatest interest. Keble is treated as a saintly example of idealism, and the closing essay shows the ground of conscience and its evolution into an apprehension of Infinite Law and Absolute Being.

If the studious reader will carefully and candidly look through the essay on Wordsworth, he will see the grounds on which it is claimed, and we think justly, that the whole mind of man means more than positive knowledge, and that it is a narrow limitation to insist that the senses only are to be trusted, and that poetry and prophecy are the folly of mere dreamers. We would suggest to any mere scientist who thinks that positive knowledge alone is worth while, that he compare Mr. Shairp's study of Wordsworth with Dr. Gladstone's account of that prince of scientists, Michael Faraday, in the little book ["Michael Faraday," by J. H. Gladstone, a small and cheap volume which every radical should read] on that subject, published by Harper Brothers, and also with Dr. Tyndall's essay on the use of the imagination in science, which may be seen in Tyndall's "Fragments of Science." In the first edition of Tyndall's essay the "imagination" was spoken of in a very striking passage, and in the second edition this power was called "the seeking intellect." In this high sense imagination is really the greatest power of the mind, for science as well as for religion, and the reader of Faraday's life will easily see that the greatness of Faraday was far more due to his sagacious imagination, his good guessing of Nature's secrets, his getting an idea correctly beforehand, than it was to his testing and proving of ideas. Without good imagination science is commonplace, keeps to the beaten track, or gets ahead only by happening on discoveries. The men who write "excelsior" on the banner of science have to be idealists, guessers, great users of imagination. They are positive idealists, starting from ideas of what may be, and then testing, if possible, and proving what is. But if tests are not found, and proof eludes them, they no less hold on to what seem sound ideas, and hope to sometime prove them true. And they hold on with zeal and confidence, admitting, of course, that it is opinion only which they cherish, and that they have not reached knowledge. Charles Darwin is the great positive idealist of modern times. The great idea which he has advanced cannot be positively tested and proved; it can only be rendered highly probable; and not long since the strict positivists of the French Academy refused to honor Darwin because he dealt so much in ideas which he did not prove to sight and touch—to positive knowledge. Such positivism would have told Columbus to sit down contented upon soil which his feet knew, instead of going to look for the world which he imagined might be found on the other side of the globe. By such positivism the search for truth, the holding of ideas before testing and proving them, is absurdly cut off. It is small science, a narrow and barren science, which thus limits man. Great and fruitful science has wings of imagination, of thought, of ideas, of wide outlook and forelooking, and of prophetic expectation and affirmation. In this sense Wordsworth was right when he said that "poetry is the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge; the impassioned expression which is in the countenance of all science," and that imagination in its highest use is but another name for "absolute power, clearest insight, reason in her most exalted mood." This imagination, Wordsworth claimed, is the parent of love, of what may be called feeling intellect, by which we see delight in objects. It is plain to see that Faraday had all this power, as well as the power which concerns itself with positive knowledge, and that the highest perfection of mind in him, and his greatest gift for science, lay in this very thing which commonplace positivism sneers at as mere dreaming. Poor dreaming very few may be capable of. But the good dreaming is no less one of the greatest positive facts of human nature, in Darwin and Faraday no less than in Wordsworth and Shakespeare. The right thing is to secure discipline of the seeking and feeling intellect, so as to guess well; it is very narrow and stupid to sneer at guessing at all. There is a high divination of genius, under great inspiration, which is the greatest attainment of man. Sir William Thomson has remarked, with reference to certain magnetic phenomena, that "Faraday, without mathematical divination, the result of the mathematical investigation; and, what has proved of infinite value to the mathematicians themselves, he has given them an artio-ulate language in which to express their results. Indeed the whole language of the magnetic field and 'lines of force' is Faraday's. It must be said for the mathematicians that they greedily accepted, and have ever since been most zealous in using, it to the best advantage." Here Faraday's power to form ideas which he had not proved was found so sure and fruitful of truth, that he really did more and better than the mere positivists, who proved each step as they took it.

Now the true use of the mind in religion is just this which was illustrated in Faraday—sagacious forming of ideas, which are beyond our proving, and yet are so highly probable that we may be strongly persuaded of them, and may hold them with deep and fervent conviction, spite of the fact that to positively test and prove them exceeds our powers. The claim that these ideas are any more than ideal convictions, that for instance they have been proved by miracle, is illegitimate and fraudulent, for the reason that the proving power of the alleged miracle is not itself proved and never can be. We may guess that a particular fact is a miracle, and is intended as a proof to us of something, but we cannot carry our idea to any positive test or find any real proof of it. Therefore we falsify facts if we claim that religious ideas constitute knowledge. We can truthfully claim only this—that they are legitimate as mere ideas; that disciplined minds can be trusted to form such unprovable ideas; and that it is the highest gift of genius to form these ideas. By repeated efforts to balance the mind for this exercise, to look again with new care where many have looked before, and to make ideal convictions an exact prolongation, as nearly as possible, of the truths and suggestions of positive knowledge, it seems certain that the thinker, either as poet or as philosopher, may have prophetic discernment, to no small extent, of truths which we cannot here prove, and which perhaps it may be meant that we should never prove, but should forever discern as ideas, stars in the inaccessible heaven of infinite existence. Hence we may concede the truth of Mr. Shairp's plea, one point of which he states in these words: "The truth seems to be that the outward world, which to commonplace minds is no more than a piece of dead mechanism, is in reality full of a vast all-pervading life, which is very mysterious. Not to be grasped by the formulas of science, this life is apprehended mainly by the imagination, and by those men most deeply in whom imagination is most ample and profound. Possessing this faculty, larger in measure, and more genuine in quality, than any man since Shakespeare, Wordsworth felt with proportionate intensity the life which fills all Nature." It is with much justice also that Mr. Shairp, in summing up, lays emphasis upon these two points in Wordsworth—"the wondrous depth of his feeling for the domestic affections, and more especially for the constancy of them," and his place and work as "a leader in that greatest movement of modern times—care for our humbler brethren; his part being, not to help them in their sufferings, but to make us reverence them for what they are, what they have in common with us, or in greater measure than ourselves."

Mr. Shairp's essay on Coleridge is an excellent account of the man, his mind, and his ideas, and of the part that he played in liberalizing and deepening current religious ideas. In the following sentences a summary statement of this is given. "All he wrote was in the interests of man's higher nature, true to his best aspirations. The one effort of all his works was to build up truth from the spiritual side. He brought all his transcendent powers of intellect to the help of the heart and soul and spirit of man against the tyranny of the understanding, that understanding which ever strives to limit truth within its generalizations from sense, and rejects whatever refuses to square with these. This side of philosophy, as it is the deepest, is also the most difficult to build up."

To conclude our view of the drift of Mr. Shairp's very liberal studies, we will cite a short passage from the last essay of the volume.

"Putting then all these converging lines of thought together, we see that they meet in the conviction that there is behind ourselves, and all the things we see and know, a Mind, a Reason, a Will, like to our own, only incomprehensibly greater, of which will and reason the moral law is the truest and most adequate exponent we have. Not that these lines, any or all of them, are to be taken as proofs demonstrating the existence of God. That is truth, I believe, incapable of scientific demonstration. The notion of God seems to be, as Coleridge has well expressed it, essential to the human mind, not derived from reasonings, but as a matter of fact actually called forth into distinct consciousness mainly by the conscience." E. C. T.

THE ROMANCE OF THE HAREM. By Mrs. Anna H. Leonowens, author of "The English Governess at the Siamese Court." Illustrated. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1873. [Told: Bailey & Eager.]

Mrs. Leonowens has told, in her two books now before the public, a story which it is to be wished that all Christians might be made to read. Her picture of the mixed barbarism and culture of the court of Siam is as full of instruction as it is of thrilling interest. What this was we may perhaps most readily judge by recalling a few words of the preface to her first book, published two years ago, when she said: "I was thankful to find, even in this citadel of Buddhism, men, and above all women, who were 'lovely in their lives,' who, amid infinite difficulties, in the bosom of a most corrupt society, and enslaved to a capricious and often cruel will, yet devoted themselves to an earnest search after truth. On the other hand, I have to confess with sorrow and shame, how far we, with all our boasted enlightenment, fall short in true nobility and piety of some of our 'benighted' sisters of the East. With many of them, Love, Truth, and Wisdom are not mere synonyms, but 'living gods,' for whom they long with lively ardor, and, when found, embrace with joy." A dark land, in short, yet not without pure illustrations of the best virtue possible to man; showing that it is not in race nor in religion, but in the equal capacities of our common nature, that men and women—Christian or infidel, Buddhist or Moslem—become as lights shining in a dark place. It is this lesson which is reflected from such narratives as these of Mrs. Leonowens, and which makes them of peculiar importance for Christian reading. In her first book was given her chief narrative of what she saw and learned while acting as an English teacher to the children of the King. In the volume now published, she weaves into a second narrative a number of most thrilling sketches and stories, all of which record facts that either came under her own eye or were known to her by trustworthy report. The intensity of interest which some of these stories excite is really painful; more harrowing recitals could hardly be found. Other parts of the narrative reflect as strongly the happier aspects of the drama of human life in that strange land, and some are as pure in their disclosure of the sanctities of heart and life which come of religion under its best form as any records of character ever written, or as striking in their illustration of supposed miracle as any part of the Christian legend. There is a story of a noble young girl, rescued from a terrible doom by a providence singularly supernatural, and apparently at the will of a wonderful saint, and as the price of the self-immolation of the girl's father at the altar of their god, the whole of which may be instructively compared with any of the Biblical stories of prophecy and miracle. The saint in this story was a solitary old man, who had spent forty years of his life-time forgetful of friends, affections, food, sleep, and almost of existence in his contemplations of the mystery of things beyond, and that still greater mystery called life. His friends had endeavored by every artifice, the allurements of beauty and every other imaginable gratification, to divert him from his resolution, and now he had gained a great fame as "the sainted priest of heaven." Prodigious stories were afloat about him. Born of noble parents, he had from his early youth practiced an asceticism so rigorous and severe that it had prepared him, it was thought, for his supernatural mission. It was not only alleged, but it was believed, that at the sound of his inspired voice the dead arose and walked, the sick were healed; that diseases vanished at the touch of his hand; sinners were converted by his simple admonition; wild beasts and serpents were obedient to his word; and that in his moments of ecstasy he floated in the air before the eyes of his disciples, passed through stone walls and barred gates, and, in fact, could do whatsoever he willed. This is the identical story everywhere told, from the earliest savage times, of the power gained by those who thus devote peculiar natures to the passions and ecstasies of religion; and what is true in one case may be true in another. In the present case, a vile old Grand Duke wanted to secure for his harem a beautiful girl; and at the same time the duke's son, who was of better nature, hoped to save her from his father's clutches, and make her his wife. To effect his purpose, the Grand Duke had compelled the girl's father to sell her to him; and to make the girl consent he had threatened the father with death, because, in her defence, he had struck the captain of the royal guard. In a horror of anguish, the son of the duke resorted to the saintly old priest, who had seen the maiden once while on a pilgrimage, when she daily brought him food and washed his feet. "She filled my heart," said the old man, "with a fragrance which is all-abiding. But," he added in an undertone, "death carries off a man who is gathering flowers, as a flood sweeps away a sleeping village. He in whom the desire for the ineffable has sprung up, whose thoughts are not bewildered by love,—he is borne on the stream of immortality; he will stand face to face with the Infinite." Then drawing towards him one of his mysterious, sacred books, after he had heard the young man's story, he placed the book on his head, and with his hands spread out to heaven, he gradually moved his body to and fro, until his gyrations became rapid and grotesque, uttering strange prayers and incantations. After a short time he began to prophesy, and said, in fitful spasms: "Thy father's days are numbered; the long night for him is at hand; fear not, this mountain flower will blossom in spring-time on thy bosom." Meanwhile, the girl's father had seen a vision in his cell, and read, in luminous characters on the soft cloud which floated before his eyes in the vision, the words: "Sell not thy daughter to the duke." The father refused, therefore, when the completion of the sale came on, and only by ordering the old man tried for his life did the duke secure the girl, a voluntary sacrifice to save her father. As the day and evening passed, the beautiful girl had been prepared by the female slaves, and was finally left alone in a lofty tower of the palace to await the monster who had her in his power. As the night goes on, her old father, distracted with grief, finds access to one of the shrines of the duke's palace, and there offers his own heart's blood to buy the divine wrath for the spoiler of his child's happiness. Some god verily accepted the victim's blood. When the vile old duke, drunk with English brandy, mounts to the chamber of the summer tower, he is no sooner in the presence of the crouching maiden than he stumbles, falls headlong heavily, and strikes his beastly countenance with fatal violence on a massive gold spittoon. The maiden springs for her life across his prostrate form, flies to hide herself by a water tank on the lower floor of the palace, is found and befriended by the duchess, and does in good time become the young duke's wife; and he resigns his rank and removes to the country to secure domestic happiness. He has become a convert to the Catholic faith, but she remains true to the gods who accepted her father's death and saved her from a fate worse than death. But over the images of her own gods she has placed those of her husband—Jesus and the Virgin. A picture from a photograph shows her sitting by her child's cradle, an image of womanly goodness; while behind her stand the emblems of two religions, and the golden pagoda in which rest the ashes of her father. Mrs. Leonowens says of her in conclusion: "Loving everything in her purity, worshipping everything in her humility, morning and evening she raises her eyes and her heart from those sombre old gods of hers to the tender ones of her husband; and this quiet pagan city has never before been lighted up with such a gleam of heaven upon earth, as when her evening prayer bursts into song:—

"To thee are all my acts, my days,
And all my love, and all my praise,
My food, my gifts, my sacrifice,
And all my helplessness, and cries.
Dávée! leave my spirit free,
And thy poor soul bequeath to me
Unhealed. Let me in thine essence share,
Let me dwell in thee forever,
And thou, O Dávée! dwell in me."

It was to this Dávée that her father offered his life, plunging a knife into his heart at Dávée's altar. The cottage where the young ex-duke lives with his mother and his wife, far from the state and splendor which he inherited, is surrounded by the quiet and peace and beauty of country life, among grand old trees. The young mother's chamber, where the household gods are, has a European cradle in it, but unused, while the baby-boy lies in a rude crib with a mystic Hindu triform suspended over it. Such is sacred association to the human heart.

There is another touching instance of the catholicity of the Buddhist faith. A pagan mother's daughter, who had become a Catholic, was dying, and she cried to her mother: "Mother, dear mother, pray to P'hra Jesu that he shut not the heavenly gates upon me." The strong love of the mother conquers her pagan scruples, and with her head on the bosom of her dying child she prays to a god in whom she has not believed: "O thou who art called P'hra Jesu, free my child from sin. O forgive her, sacred One! She has loved thee to the last. She believes in none but thee. Be thou her God, and shut not. O shut not thy heavenly gates upon her, even though they shut her out forever from my sorrowing heart and eyes." That is far holier than Christian love. Buddhism has in fact not near so much vulgar heathenism and diabolism in it as average Christianity. It vastly excels in breadth of sympathy. The dying girl in this story has a vision as she passes away, at which she cries out: "O mother, mother, I see P'hra Jesu and P'hra Buddha! P'hra Jesu is above and P'hra Buddha is below; and the two mothers, Marie and Mala (mother of the Buddha) are sitting side by side, and they are all smiling and calling me upward, upward."

In one of the women of the king's harem Mrs. Leonowens found a person of whom she says: "Her aim was to find out all things that are pure, noble, brave, and good, and to adopt them, whether Pagan or Christian in their origin; and to leave dogmas, creeds, and doctrines, to those who were inclined to them by temperament." This woman said of her image-worship: "Say not of me that I worship the golden image up there, but the Great One who sent me my teacher Buddha, that he might be the guide and the light of my life." This is better than the Christian idea; for the Christians worship their teacher as very God in himself. She broke down distinction between the two religions in the following proposal to her English friend: "Let us promise one another that whenever you pray to P'hra Jesu, you will call him Buddha, the Enlightened One; and I, when I pray to my Buddha, will call him Phra Jesu Karuna,—the tender and sacred Jesus,—for surely these are only different names for the one and the same God."

The young king of Siam has ordained the abolition of slavery and perfect freedom in religion, decreeing that each individual may investigate and conclude for himself; and earnestly advising inquiry and not to be governed by fears or by selfish hopes, and that no one shall at all harm another on account of religion.

E. C. T.

PHILOSOPHICAL PAPERS. VII.

BY F. E. ANNOT.

THE TWO BIOLOGICAL SCHOOLS.

FROM AN ARTICLE ON "PHILOSOPHICAL BIOLOGY," IN
THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW,
FOR OCTOBER, 1888.

A still more striking illustration of the same necessity, inherent in biology, of recognizing an order of phenomena distinct in kind from all phenomena of the inorganic world, and therefore inexplicable by purely mechanical or physico-chemical causes, occurs in a recent essay by one of the most eminent physiologists of France, M. Claude Bernard, published in the Revue des Deux Mondes for December 15, 1887, and entitled Le Problème de la Physiologie Générale. The essay is at once so interesting in itself and so germane to our subject, that we hope to be pardoned for making somewhat copious extracts from its pages in the following translation. M. Bernard, referring to the two antagonistic schools of physiologists (les physiologistes animistes ou vitalistes et les physiologistes chimistes physico-mécaniciens), declines to identify himself with either; but it will be noticed, that, in his desire to be impartial, he involves himself in contradiction by adopting each of the two opposing theories.

"The phenomena of life are as rigorously and as absolutely determined as those of the mineral kingdom. I admit, that, considered in their various forms of manifestation and in their essential nature, they possess, at the same time, a speciality of form which distinguishes them as phenomena of life, and a generality of law which assimilates them with all the other phenomena of the cosmos. In other words, I recognize in all vital phenomena special processes of manifestation; but, at the same time, I regard them also as all derived from the ordinary general laws of mechanics and chemical physics. There are, in fact, in living organisms anatomical apparatuses or organic tools which are peculiar to them, and cannot be imitated outside of them; but nevertheless the phenomena manifested by these organs or living tissues have nothing special either in their nature or in the laws which govern them. That is a proposition which the progress of the physico-chemical sciences demonstrates more and more clearly every day, by showing that the phenomena which take place in living bodies can equally take place externally to the organism in the mineral kingdom. . . . In the living being, I repeat, the chemical phenomena are realized by means of vital processes and of organic chemical re-agents which are created by histological evolution, and which are consequently special to the organism and inimitable by the chemist. In the mechanical or physical order, vital phenomena are equally indistinguishable from mechanical or physical phenomena in general, except by the instruments which manifest them. The muscles, the nerves, the organs of sense, are only mechanical implements peculiar to living beings. In reality, therefore, general physics, chemistry, and mechanics include all the manifestations of Nature, organic as well as inorganic. All the phenomena which appear in a living body obey laws external to it, so that it might be said that all the manifestations of life consist of phenomena derived, as to their nature, from the external cosmos, but possessing a special morphology in the sense that they are exhibited under characteristic form, and by means of special physiological instruments. In the physico-chemical relation, life is only a special mode of the general phenomena of Nature; it originates nothing, it borrows its forces from the exterior world, and does but vary their manifestations in countless ways. Might it not even be added, that intelligence itself, whose phenomena mark the highest expression of life, is revealed externally to living beings in the harmony of the laws of the universe? But nowhere else than in living beings is it translated by instruments which manifest it to us under the form of sensibility and will. Thus would be found realized the ancient thought, that the living organism is a microcosm which reflects in itself the macrocosm.

"From what precedes," continues M. Bernard, "it evidently follows that the physiologist, the chemist, and the physicist have only, in reality, to consider phenomena of the same nature, which must be analyzed and studied by the same method, and reduced to the same general laws. The physiologist, however, has to deal with peculiar processes which inhere in organized matter, and hence constitute the special object of his studies. . . . The physicist and the chemist explain phenomena by the properties of the inorganic elements. The physiologist must in like manner investigate in the living being the organic elements in which functions are localized, and determine the conditions of vital activity in those elements on which he can act. The organic elements of living bodies are the anatomical or histological elements into which our organs and tissues are decomposable. Science has shown that a living body, however complex, is always constituted by the union of a greater or less number of elementary microscopic organisms, whose various vital properties manifest the different functions of the entire organism. Hence it follows that each function must have its corresponding organic element, and the object of general physiology is accurately to analyze the complex functional mechanisms in order to reduce them to their special vital elements. It is thus that the phenomena of sensibility and of motion are explained by the properties of the nervous and muscular elements,—that the phenomena of respiration and secretion are deduced from the properties of the respiratory elements of the blood and from the properties of the glandular and epithelial elements. The organic elements of living beings, which generally present themselves under the different forms of fibres or microscopic cells, are the true concealed springs of the living machine. They are mutually associated and combined to form the tissues, the organs, and the apparatuses which constitute the wheel-work of the vital mechanisms. There is, moreover, in every living organism a true internal environment in which the anatomical elements discharge their special functions and pass through all the phases of their existence. The organized or living matter which constitutes the histological elements has no more spontaneity than inorganic or mineral matter; for both require, in order to manifest their properties, the influence of external stimuli. The spontaneity of living bodies is only apparent. . . . It is absolutely the same agents or the same influences which excite the properties both of organic and inorganic matter. . . . Vital mechanisms, like non-vital mechanisms, are passive. Both simply express or manifest the idea which has conceived and created them. . . . The animal organism is in reality only a living machine, which works according to the ordinary laws of mechanics and chemical physics, by means of particular processes which are special to the vital instruments constituted by organized matter."

Having thus determined the general relations of biology to mechanics and chemical physics, M. Bernard proceeds to explain the phenomena of organic evolution and renovation.

"The evolution and nutrition of a new being are veritable organic creations which take place under our eyes. . . . Living bodies are unstable compounds which are unceasingly disorganized under the cosmical influences that surround them; they live only on this condition; and organs composed of living matter are used up and destroyed precisely like organs composed of inert matter. In order that life, therefore, should continue, it is necessary that the organized matter which forms the histological elements should be constantly renewed in proportion as it is decomposed; so that we may regard the cause of life as really residing in the organizing force (la puissance d'organisation) which creates the living machine and repairs its incessant losses. The ancient animist and vitalist physiologists clearly perceived this double aspect of vital phenomena. For this reason they held that an interior principle of life, which was the creative or regenerative principle, found itself in conflict with the exterior physico-chemical forces which destroy the organism. Nevertheless, if the exterior physico-chemical influences are the causes of death, or the disorganization of living matter, that does not mean, as the vitalists have believed, that there is an incompatibility between the phenomena of life and the physico-chemical phenomena: there is, on the contrary, a perfect and necessary harmony; for the causes which destroy organized matter are those which make it live, that is, manifest its properties. Neither does it prove that there is a combat or conflict between two opposite principles,—one of life, which resists, and another of death, which attacks, and always ends by being victorious. In a word, there are not in living bodies two orders of forces separate and opposed by the nature of their phenomena, the one creating organized matter with its characteristic properties, the other destroying it through its vital manifestations; there are only histological elements which all act and develop (fonctionnent éolutivelement) according to the same law.

"We know that there are muscular, nervous, and glandular elements, which subserve the manifestations of sensibility, motion, and secretion. There are likewise ovaric and plasmatic elements, which have the property of creating new beings, and sustaining the vital mechanisms by nutrition; but these creative and nutritive elements, like the rest, are used up and perish in discharging their functions, which themselves supply the conditions of an incessant renovation. Thus in the play of a passive machine, the workmen get tired and equally expend their strength whether they toil in constructing and repairing the wheel-work of the machine, or whether they toil in applying it to practical uses. The phenomena of organogenesis or organic creation are, then, neither more nor less mysterious for the physiologists than all the others. They reside in specialized histological elements, and have their physico-chemical conditions of existence well determined. The element of organic creation of living beings is a microscopic cellule, the ovule or germ. This element is undoubtedly the most marvellous of all, for we see that it has for its function the production of an entire organism. Phenomena ever under our eyes cease to astonish; as Montaigne says, L'habitude en ôte l'étrangeté. Nevertheless, what is there more extraordinary than this organic creation in which we assist, and how can we connect it with properties inherent in the matter which constitutes the egg? When general physiology would give an account of the muscular force, for instance, it proves that a contractile substance comes to act directly in virtue of properties inherent in its physical or chemical constitution; but when the problem concerns an organic evolution which is in the future, we are far enough from comprehending this property of matter. The egg is a becoming; it represents a sort of organic formula that turns up the being from which it proceeds, and of which it has preserved, as it were, the developmental memory (le souvenir évolutif). The phenomena of organic creation of living beings seem to me quite of a nature to demonstrate an idea which I have already indicated; namely, that matter does not generate the phenomena which it manifests. It is only the substratum, and does absolutely nothing but give to phenomena their conditions of manifestation,—the sole intermediary by which the physiologist can act on the phenomena of life. Hence these phenomena must be subjected to a rigorous and absolute determinism, which constitutes the fundamental principle of all the experimental sciences. The egg or germ is a powerful centre of nutritive action, and, as such, supplies the conditions for the realization of a creative idea (une idée créatrice), which is transmitted by hereditary or organic tradition (tradition organique). . . . When we observe the evolution or the creation of a living being in the egg, we see clearly that its organization is the result of a pre-conceived law of organogenesis (une loi organogénétique préexistante d'après une idée préconçue), which is transmitted by organic tradition from one being to another. We might find in the experimental study of the phenomena of histogenesis and of organization the justification of the words of Goethe, who compares Nature to a great artist. . . . This is not all. This creative or organizing force (cette puissance créatrice ou organisatrice) not only exists at the dawn of life in the egg, the embryo, or the foetus, but continues its operations in the adult by presiding over the manifestations of vital phenomena; for it is this which supports by nutrition, and renews without cessation, the matter and the properties of the organic elements of the living machine. Nutrition, then, is nothing but the continuance and gradual exhaustion of this generative force (cette puissance génératrice). Hence under the name of organotrophic phenomena must be included all the phenomena of organization and organic nutrition or secretion in the embryo, the foetus, and the adult, since they are always governed by one and the same law. The surrounding physico-chemical conditions control the vital manifestations of the germ or ovule, like those of all the other organic elements. . . . Life is a first cause, which escapes us like all first causes, and experimental science has nothing to do with it; but all vital manifestations, from simple muscular contraction to the expression of intelligence, and the appearance of the organic creative idea, have in living beings well-determined physico-chemical conditions, which we can understand, and upon which we can act in order to control the phenomena over which the histological elements preside. . . . By modifying the internal nutritive media, and taking organized matter, as it were, in the nascent state, we may hope to change the direction of its development, and thus its final organic expression. In a word, there is no reason why we should not thus produce new organic species, just as we create new mineral species; that is, cause to appear organic forms which virtually exist in the laws of organogenesis, but which Nature has not yet realized."

On the one hand, M. Bernard sanctions the mechanist theory by denying all speciality in vital phenomena as to their nature and the laws that govern them, by deriving them exclusively from the general laws of mechanics and chemical physics, and by admitting in them no force not "borrowed" from the external world. The speciality of form and process which they manifest is not, of course, to be denied on any theory; and this M. Bernard admits. But, on the other hand, when he comes to consider the peculiarly vital phenomena of organogenesis and organotrophy, which he himself makes co-extensive with the phenomena of organization, nutrition, and secretion, whether manifested in the embryo, the fetus, or the adult, he abandons the mechanist for the vitalist theory, by recognizing a special law (la loi organogénique) and a special force (la puissance d'organisation, la puissance créatrice ou organisatrice ou génératrice, l'idée créatrice ou évolutive, l'idée créatrice organique) which are neither mechanical nor physico-chemical. The same truth which Mr. Spencer is "compelled" and has "no alternative but" to recognize, and which therefore necessitates his theory of "organic polarity," necessitates a kindred theory in the essay of M. Bernard. But it is no essential part of the vitalist theory, as intimated by the latter, that there should be assumed a conflict or antagonism between the cosmic and the vital forces. This assumption, expressed in the well-known definition of Bichat, "Life is the sum of the functions by which Death is resisted," is no essential part of the vitalist theory as held by its most enlightened advocates. The vitalist theory teaches that life is the resultant of cosmic and vital forces acting in unison under fit conditions, and not a highly complex manifestation of merely cosmic forces,—that there is that in biological phenomena which constitutes them a class by themselves, and forbids the attempt to classify them with purely mechanical or physico-chemical phenomena. What these forces are in themselves we do not know; but if it is philosophical to attribute unlike effects to unlike causes, we are justified in insisting that essential differences shall not be blurred or ignored for the sake of constructing a symmetrical system. Hence we advocate the vitalist theory, not out of regard for any dogmatic or theological tenets which may be supposed to be favored by it, but solely out of regard for positive science and sound philosophy; and we find no better statement of its essential principles than is contained in the words of Mr. Lewes: "All that we are entitled to say is this: there is a speciality about vital phenomena, arising from the peculiarity and complexity of the conditions which determine them; and this speciality must warn us against reasoning about them as if they were not special, were in all respects like inorganic phenomena; this speciality, in short, suggests the necessity of studying them in themselves, and not as if they belonged to the general phenomena of physics and chemistry, invaluable as the knowledge of these latter must always be as a means of exploration." "In every vital process physical and chemical laws are implied, and the knowledge of these becomes indispensable; but over and above these laws, there are the specific laws of life, which cannot be deduced from physics and chemistry."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errors.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

CORSETS VERSUS BRAINS.

The effort that is being made to secure the co-education of the sexes has called forth some statements from learned male physicians concerning the physical and mental condition of women which, if true, would necessarily defeat this reform. The position these men take is that the women of America are rapidly degenerating into feeble, nervous beings, entirely unfit to perform the functions that nature demands of their sex; and that the chief cause of this degeneracy is the mental strain that is suffered in high schools and colleges over Greek and Latin and Mathematical lessons. They claim that the nervous energy spent in acquiring these studies is a loss to physical functions that need this stimulus to fulfil the proper growth and development of the body. They believe, therefore, that it is impossible to bring the two sexes together under the same school régime, because of the irregular course of study with which girls must be favored.

Such is the theory of physicians, and such is the amen that comes from the "Head" of Harvard, and is echoed and re-echoed by every man that opposes this educational reform, whether honestly or otherwise I will not judge.

That we see a large class of women weak and enervated, going about with one foot in the grave, and the other close after, is a fact too true to be denied; but that these women are the female students of society, or ever were studious when girls, is not a fact. On the contrary, they are the feeblest and laziest-minded women, so far as books or ideas are concerned, that we meet. They are the women that have done the tight lacing, the padding, and painting, and frizzling—that have been the rounds of night-parties and dances, and indulged in late suppers, and been through all the excitement of society—that have disobeyed every physical, and heaven only knows how many moral, laws, because they have never learned what they are. These women are in the hands of physicians, many of them passed over when girls by their mamma's, who reported their infirmities to proceed from study in the high and normal school: a gentle way to get rid of the truth.

On the other hand we have a host of strong, healthy-minded, and healthy-bodied women, such as the Livermores, Stones, Stantons, and Anthony's—women that have done more mental labor than the other class all put together: yet they are ripening into a healthy middle age, with no appearance of needing physicians to heal any nervous diseases contracted by their herculean mental labors. The medical man knows nothing about this class of women. Undoubtedly, if he had occasion for examining their healthy constitutions as minutely as he now does the feeble ones, he would change his opinion, and report that hard study is as good for woman as for man. But that any scientific mind should attempt to pronounce upon woman's fitness or unfitness for a course of study, or should pretend to say how much she can endure, or when and how, whether she can follow the same school curriculum with man or not, seems the height of folly, and only to be laughed at by all sensible people. One can almost doubt the sincerity of any man who does this in the face of woman in her present pinched, laced, padded, hooped, weighted, painted, and tortured condition of body. How is it possible for a physician to estimate what a woman might do with her mind, so long as she is unable to eat with her body naturally, walk with it, breathe with it, or use it in any way without physical suffering? I can but believe these men are honest; but I am forced, in conferring this confidence, to accuse them of the blindest ignorance and stupidity concerning the dress and habits of women. The saying is that one woman can make fools of half a dozen men: so it must be true that all our physicians are terribly imposed upon by their female patients.

A few days ago, I stepped into a large corset manufactory that is carried on by a woman. I told her I was interested to know what women and children wear in this line, and asked to see her wares from the least unto the greatest. She began by showing me the tiniest article I ever saw in the shape of a corset, saying that was for babies. Then she brought forward another grade, and still another, and so on, till I think she must have shown me fifteen or twenty different sized corset moulds, in which she runs the female forms that get into her hands. She informed me that all the genteel waists I should meet on the fashionable streets of the city she made; that the mothers brought their daughters in infancy to her, and that she passed them through the whole course of moulds till they were ready for the real French corset, when she considered them finished and perfect.

Yesterday, I visited the first class in one of our city girls' grammar schools, consisting of forty-two pupils. I had five questions on a slip of paper, that I asked permission of the teacher to put to the girls:—

First—"How many of you wear corsets?"

Answer—"Twenty-one." I asked them to stretch their arms as high as they could over their heads. In every instance it was hard work, and in most cases impossible, to get them above a right angle at the shoulders.

Second question—"How many of you wear your skirts resting entirely upon your hips, with no shoulder straps or waists to support them?"

Answer—"Thirty."

Third question—"How many wear false hair?"

Answer—"Four."

Fourth question—"How many wear tight boots?"

Answer—"None" (which I doubted).

Fifth question—"How many do not wear flannels?"

Answer—"Eighteen."

I went across the hall to a boys' class corresponding in grade, consisting of forty-four pupils. I asked for the number of boys without flannels, and found only six.

Of course one hundred per cent. were without corsets, or weight upon hips, or tight boots, or false hair. Every boy could raise his arms in a straight line with his body, as far as he could reach, with perfect ease. Here we find the pupils in one class improperly dressed, incapable of breathing freely, weighted with clothes upon sensitive parts of the body, and when in the air chilled with the cold; and these are the girls. The whole of the boys are properly dressed, free, and comfortable. But both classes are required to do the same mental work. The girls must perform it with all this added burden, if performed at all; and in the end, without doubt, fifty per cent. of them will be broken in health, and pass into the physician's hands. Their mamma's will inform him that hard study is the cause, and he will record mental work as fatal to the constitution of woman, and co-education of the sexes to be downright murder to the female sex.

Now it is evident from this testimony, that women must begin a reform in dress, before they can hope to secure a higher education.

Girls are not fit to enter Harvard or Yale, till they have put their bodies into comfortable, healthy apparel. Men know this, though they will not admit it to be the cause of the feebleness of woman. They will persist in laying it to brain work, when it only belongs to corset-lacing and like female torture; and will keep Harvard shut to the end of time. But women can change all this. Let every woman in the land who has a daughter in school remove her corsets; put on thick flannels, warm stockings, and thick boots; lighten her clothes; take off all chignons, and let her have just as much out-of-door exercise as the boys, and of the same sort if she choose it. This done, in less than a year our school-rooms will be full of blooming-checked, sun-and-wind tanned, healthy girls, learning their lessons with perfect ease. The doctor's theories about special female brain tissue, and female mental incapacity, and female physical weakness, will all gently float away, with the rest of the nonsense about woman, and never be heard of again.

LOUISE S. HOTCHKISS.

BOSTON, Dec. 26, 1872.

RELIGIOUSLY CONSISTENT, AT LEAST.

During the last presidential contest, Governor Gratz Brown, whose name was second on the Liberal Republican ticket, when he was charged at New Haven with putting too much brandy into his lobster sauce in the hot month of July, defended himself by protesting that he had been a total-abstinence man for thirty years, "off and on." But in regard to his religious views and policy, we must give him the credit of being more consistent.

In his famous letter to the National Reform Association, of which Judge Strong of the United States Supreme Court is president, and which aims to insert into the Constitution a theological creed whose provisions shall be carried out by Congress, he endorses this religious movement with much zeal; and although, during the late campaign, the radicals among the Liberal Republicans tried hard to get rid of it by saying that A told B that C had told D that Governor Brown was opposed to the "amendment" in question, and signed that letter without knowing its contents on account of being sick at the time, he himself has never said so to the public. There stands his letter approving of the project and pledging his support and co-operation, and not a line or syllable of it has he ever revoked.

To show how dangerous it would have been to elect Gratz Brown to the Vice Presidency when he was thus pledged, I refer to his recent course as Governor of Missouri. Warren Chase, who was a member of the Electoral College of Missouri, and is an excellent man and the western editor or correspondent of the Banner of Light, with headquarters at St. Louis, in that paper of the 25th January gives a brief account of Missouri politics; from which it appears that the State of Missouri in her Constitution has taken an advanced position in regard to taxing all property as property, whether owned by the churches or not. This is the policy advocated by THE INDEX, the New York Independent, and a number of other papers, and commends itself to every good citizen as wise and just. But Gov. Brown has recently proposed to the legislature to change this provision of the Constitution of Missouri, and to exempt church property in that State from taxation! Had the Greeley ticket been elected, and were Gratz Brown now, by the death of his chief, president elect of the United States, can any one doubt that his power as president would be used during his administration to help on the cause of the religious amendment? His fealty to that cause, as evinced in his letter, is confirmed by his recent suggestion to the legislature, and is an earnest of what he would do as president of the United States. He has read the history of the Church to poor purpose who has not discerned that when a religious conviction seizes a man and he feels it a duty, at the peril of his soul's salvation, to do a certain thing,—whether to stand naked on the top of a pillar for years, as Simon Stylites did, or honor God by converting the government into an engine for suppressing heresy,—he will do it.

But does some one say, "Let us be charitable, and let bygones be bygones"? No, sir! Let us be just. The words, "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," are not what Rufus Choate pronounced the self-evident truths of the Declaration of Independence to be—"a mere glittering generality." So long as I am on top of the ground, I will keep a lynx-eye upon and expose any man over thirty years of age and under sixty, who is laboring to put these religious tests into the Constitution. The greenness of youth, or the imbecility of age, may palliate such conduct; but for a man of mature years and understanding to join the "holy alliance" against the rights of man is a sin, either of selfishness or ignorance, which the American people ought never to forgive. The advocates of this measure are indeed earnest, and so is

SENEX.

Superstition and miracle, it is true, vanish before the new natural philosophy; but not the greatest miracle, the self-consistent universe! Knowledge is never a clog to the freest thought; it can only give new wings to the imagination.—Schaaffhausen.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—6 cents; 12 copies, 60 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Third Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

THE INDEX,
Drawer 33, Toledo, Ohio.

Back Numbers of The Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete set of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address.

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 33, Toledo, Ohio.

NOW READY!

THE BOUND INDEX FOR 1872 (VOLUME III).

In addition to many other attractions, it contains the full course of free religious lectures delivered at Horticultural Hall, Boston, last winter, which were published in full nowhere else. A limited number only for sale. Price $2.00, and 75 cents postage. If postage is not prepaid by the purchaser, the volume will be sent by express at his expense. Address

THE INDEX,
Drawer 33,
Toledo, Ohio.

Cultured Free Thought.

The Index Association,

With its Principal Office at No. 143, St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO, and Branch Office at No. 34, Day Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX, A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society. It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. BALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, England.
Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, Weston super Mare, England.
Rev. M. D. CONWAY, London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exponent of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Professor MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America,—that such a journal should have been started and powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany, though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large."

Essays, lectures, and other papers of a thoughtful and liberal character; editorial articles; foreign and domestic correspondence; book reviews and notices; communications, selections, and other miscellaneous matter; in short, whatever can best promote the general cause to which THE INDEX is devoted will be found regularly in its columns.

Also, a highly interesting RATIONALISTIC STORY, entitled "PAUL GOWER," is now appearing serially in THE INDEX, and will run during the year.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial. All MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS must be addressed to

THE INDEX,
Drawer 33, Toledo, Ohio.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 13) will be sent postpaid on receipt of eighty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT; "The Vision of Heaven," by Prof. F. W. Newman. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 33, Toledo, Ohio.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete Bibles of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 75 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

THE RICHEST MEN IN AMERICA are no more happy than those who earn their own living, and who read the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, published at $3 a year by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

A FINE RADICAL ROMANCE!

TO BE PUBLISHED

SERIALLY

IN

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

WE ARE HAPPY TO ANNOUNCE that we have secured for publication in THE INDEX a most excellent novel, entitled

PAUL GOWER:

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

For the present the author desires to withhold his name. But he is well known in literary circles as a writer for the best English and American magazines. Of another story written by him Mr. JAMES PARTON says: "I consider it a master-piece of narrative." Mr. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, who was so kind as to read "PAUL GOWER" in manuscript with special reference to its publication in THE INDEX, permits us to publish the following:—

"I have looked over Mr. ———'s novel, and think it would be an attractive feature in THE INDEX. It is very strong, and I found it very interesting. The story is remarkably well told; the characters are firmly drawn; and the religious tone of it will suit the paper well. The style is nervous and simple; the incident is varied; the development is natural. The writer has put a vast deal of thought into it, and spent great labor on it with admirable effect. My judgment may be at fault, but I think it would adorn THE INDEX. It will divide well as a serial, which will be an advantage."

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAP.

- 1.—An Old Lady and Gentleman of the Old School.
- 2.—News from the United States.
- 3.—A Lover's Quarrel.
- 4.—Family Antecedents.
- 5.—Poor Relations.
- 6.—Mr. Bligh receives three Morning Calls.
- 7.—Is spent in Mr. Bligh's Office.
- 8.—A Shabby-Geotel Family.
- 9.—Mr. Daniel Pennethorne.
- 10.—Harry Franklin.
- 11.—"Never Overtaking and always Pursuing."
- 12.—A Catastrophe.
- 13.—Locked-out for the Night.
- 14.—In which divers Persons call on each other without invitation or introduction.
- 15.—Sickness and Convalescence.
- 16.—Eather Franklin.
- 17.—Contains Explanations and Confidences.
- 18.—Concludes with a Street Row at the Door of Mr. James Maberley.
- 19.—Involves a Meeting and a Departure.
- 20.—In which Richard Sabin talks like a Heathen.
- 21.—"That nasty, deceitful Clergyman who behaved so badly to poor, dear Ruth."
- 22.—"My Native Land, Good Night!"
- 23.—Epistolary and Maritime.
- 24.—Is mainly in Praise of New York City and Americans in General.
- 25.—Paul's Father.
- 26.—Transpires in or near Nassau Street.
- 27.—More New Faces.
- 28.—In Conversational and Valedictory.
- 29.—The Christening of a Comic Paper.
- 30.—A New York Boarding-House.
- 31.—Paul's Letters.
- 32.—In which Dick Sabin returns to New York City and is seen by somebody who has hereafter a Great Deal to do with him.
- 33.—Wherein Richard Sabin lays down a Square of Hell's Pavement.
- 34.—"The Porcupine."
- 35.—In which Paul Gower and Richard Sabin amuse themselves.
- 36.—A short Chapter introducing a very long one.
- 37.—A Young Man's Theological Experiences.
- 38.—Consequences.
- 39.—A Descent into Bohemia.
- 40.—More of the same Subject.
- 41.—In which we talk about the Fourth Estate of New York City.
- 42.—"At Phil's."
- 43.—The Reverend Jim Scobell.
- 44.—"The Cornucopia."
- 45.—"One More Unfortunate."
- 46.—In which the Story progresses for about Six Months.
- 47.—A Little Adventures.
- 48.—Injured Innocence.
- 49.—"Lead us not into Temptation."
- 50.—Just what might have been Expected.
- 51.—What People said about it; and an Item of News concerning the Fugitive.

CHAP.

- 52.—In which Paul sets out for a larger amount of Travel than he intended, and visits some Old Friends.
- 53.—A Canadian Idyll.
- 54.—Wherein we journey from the North to nearly the most Southern of the United States.
- 55.—More Southern Experiences; a Look at New Orleans; and a sudden change of Programme.
- 56.—A Return and a Disappointment.
- 57.—The Contents of which ought to surprise nobody.
- 58.—In which Paul hears more News of Old Friends of an Unsatisfactory Character.
- 59.—Wherein Paul Gower and the Rev. George Bligh smoke a cigar together.
- 60.—Accompanies Paul to London and describes his Doings in that Metropolis.
- 61.—Is a Continuation of Chapter 60.
- 62.—Contains an Accident and some Conversation.
- 63.—Treats of the Vicarage and Farm-house; and of the Machinations of a Wicked Woman.
- 64.—Shows that a Pliable Disposition may be wrought upon to Good as well as Evil Purposes.
- 65.—Which only those Readers who have some knowledge of Human Nature will think at all Truthful or Probable.
- 66.—Wherein we get rid of Mrs. Franklin for Good and All.
- 67.—In which the Engagement between Ruth Gower and the Rev. George Bligh comes to a perfectly natural conclusion.
- 68.—Contains various matters, Reflective, Rural, and Metropolitan, and concludes at Southampton.
- 69.—New York again. And what Paul did and heard there.
- 70.—A "Cut Direct" and other Experiences, too various for particularization.
- 71.—Is as Desultory as the one preceding it, and therefore introduced without Specification.
- 72.—More Boarding-House and Bohemian Details; the latter involving their own Moral.
- 73.—A Loving Heart, self-portrayed; and News from England.
- 74.—A Character: the re-appearance of a Scoundrel, and still more of Journalism.
- 75.—Another Return and a new Enterprise. Characterized on an Historical Occasion.
- 76.—In which a former Acquaintance takes Paul into his confidence concerning his Domestic Infelicity.
- 77.—Might have had the same Title as Chapter 76.
- 78.—More talk of Scoundrelism, and the Sequel of Richard Sabin's Catastrophe.
- 79.—A Companion-Picture to what we have seen in Charleston, but on a larger Scale.
- 80.—Clears the way for the Next and Last.
- 81.—In which John Gower's Misfortunes and the Story come to an End together.

Whoever desires to possess all the numbers of THE INDEX containing this novel should subscribe at once, beginning his subscription with the year. Send $3.00 for the FOURTH VOLUME OF THE INDEX.

Address

THE INDEX,
Drawer 33, Toledo, Ohio.

Digitized by Google

Ca

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

THE INDEX.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

Published by the Index Association at No. 148,
St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio, with Branch
Office at No. 36, Day Street, New York City.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.

T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.

W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.

W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

F. W. NEWMAN, England.

CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

M. D. CONWAY, England.

THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A new LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MORSE, late editor of the RADICAL, whose EVENING RADICAL will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 36, Day Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. F. DREWSE, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order.

Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 35, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A UNIQUE PREMIUM.

Photographs and Autographs

LEADING WRITERS

THE INDEX.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

W. J. POTTER.

W. H. SPENCER.

F. W. NEWMAN.

CHAS. VOYSEY.

A. W. STEVENS.

F. E. ABBOT.

☞ The PHOTOGRAPH of any ONE of the above-named persons will be mailed post-paid to any NEW subscriber who shall remit $3.00 for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

☞ To any one who shall send a list of names of from one to eight NEW subscribers and $3.00 for each, a corresponding number of Photographs shall be mailed post-paid, to be given to these subscribers; and the same number of Photographs shall also be mailed, post paid, as premium to the sender himself.

☞ To any one who shall send $9.00 for three years' subscription to THE INDEX in advance, a full set of the Photographs shall be mailed post-paid.

☞ None of the above Photographs will be sent, unless specially requested and unless a choice is made from the list.

☞ The Autograph of each of the above American writers will in all cases accompany the corresponding Photograph; but no Autograph can be sent with the Photograph of the English writers.

☞ These Photographs are well executed, are not on sale anywhere, and can be obtained in no other way. In offering them as premiums, the INDEX ASSOCIATION rely on the good will and active co-operation of all friends of THE INDEX.

☞ All orders for Photographs and remittances of money should be addressed to

THE INDEX,

DRAWER 35, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A SYNOPSIS

PAUL GOWER,

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a Story of English and American Life; the localization being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York Journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not in-curious.

It is, also, in the very warp and weft of it, as heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show how there, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potent with the unquitting and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfillment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being introduced, dialectically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is emphatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS., contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "SENT AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. L. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION PRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUGGESTION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "TOLERATION OF HUMANITY;" together with the report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. A. Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace & Alexander Loom, and others. Price, 25 cents packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER.

Send

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 22, 1873.

WHOLE No. 165.

ORGANIZE!

LIBERALS OF AMERICA!

The hour for action has arrived. The cause of freedom calls upon us to combine our strength, our zeal, our efforts. These are

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformable to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Let us boldly and with high purpose meet the duty of the hour. I submit to you the following

FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in:—

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

Liberals! I pledge to you my undivided sympathies and most vigorous co-operation, both in THE INDEX and out of it, in this work of local and national organization. Let us begin at once to lay the foundations of a great national party of freedom, which shall demand the entire secularization of our municipal, state, and national government. Send me promptly the list of officers of every Liberal League that may be formed, and a standing list of all such Leagues shall be kept in THE INDEX. Rouse, then, to the great work of freeing America from the usurpations of the Church! Make this conflict from ocean to ocean sacred to human liberty! Prove that you are worthy descendants of those whose wisdom and patriotism gave us a Constitution untainted with superstition! Shake off your slumbers, and break the chains to which you have too long tamely submitted!

Toledo, O., Jan. 1, 1873.

FRANCIS B. ABBOT.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1873.

THE RISE OF UNITARIANISM IN NEW ENGLAND: A STORY OF EVOLUTION.

BY WILLIAM C. GANNETT.

THIRD LECTURE IN THE COURSE OF SIX "SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES," GIVEN IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, JANUARY 10, 1873.

[Concluded.]

THE CRISIS NEAR—1805-1815.

And now in our story we approach the time when the hard words began to be hurled at the pushing Liberals.

HARVARD COLLEGE.

Young Channing had just come to Boston and had hardly made his second round of parish calls when certain Orthodox men leaped to their feet with indignation. Not at Channing yet, but because Harvard College had appointed Henry Ware to the vacant professorship of Divinity. Harvard College—founded by the fathers "for Christ and the Church"! Henry Ware—one of the silent brotherhood indeed, but known to be Arminian, suspected of being Arian! And in a chair established by the terms of the old bequest for a man who was to be "sound or Orthodox"! It was too true. The Liberals had already firm possession of the College; and this was one of those cases that always must seem unjust, and be unjust, to the neighbors who inherit the old faith in its pristine purity,—or rather, least unchanged from pristine purity. Such cases must arise until people believe in "religious evolution," and in their requests allow for Nature's fact of growth. The Liberals had possession of the College, but they had obtained it by no intrigue. The College had descended from the first trust along the line of Massachusetts culture. By that title, at the beginning of the century, the Liberals held it fast. Only a few years after Ware's election, they called Kirkland from the Church in Summer Street to be its President—Kirkland, one of the most outspoken of the Boston brethren; and he soon organized a Liberal Divinity School.

THE LIBERAL MAGAZINES AND BOOKS.

The magazines afford best tracking ground for those who would follow from this time the movement of thought. There was a Club then in Boston in which much of the younger Liberal intellect was concentrated,—the Anthology Club. The names in our story are growing now familiar. William Emerson (father of the son), Buckminster, Thacher, Tuckerman, and Kirkland—Gardiner, too, of Trinity Church—were among its minister-members, with certain lawyers and physicians before their fame, whose names have long been reverent memories to us,—and among them two whose faces time-worn still bless Boston streets. Choice spirits were they all,—so choice that the ladies of Boston village did not invite company on the Anthology evening, because the Club meeting had their rarest gentlemen. This Club had a literary magazine, and this magazine was the first of that five-linked chain of Liberal magazines of which Old and New is last. Its theological attitude was definite in its anti-Calvinism, but non-committal about the Trinity. Now and then a sharp article against the Orthodox appeared; as when Thacher wrote about the Andover School just established with a creed skillfully drawn up to smooth the differences between the old and the new Calvinism,—a creed which "it is solemnly enjoined shall forever remain entirely and identically the same, without the least alteration, addition, or diminution," and be repeated anew by the professors every five years. He reported the charge of evasion which the Evangelicals were now pressing against the Liberals. "This we believe," he said, "to be the first instance on record of a creed being originally formed with a designed ambiguity of meaning, with the express intention of permitting men of different opinions to sign it."

But in 1812 a bolder Review succeeded it,—the General Repository, edited by Andrews Norton, then a young man who was born to be a "defender of the faith." He took non temere, non timide for his motto and boldly wrote for his first article a "Defence of Liberal Christianity." A small but able band of scholars helped him, Edward Everett among them; and together the rational, the historical, and the Scriptural arguments against the Trinity were set plainly forth. Like all radical magazines however, the Anthology and Repository were "caviare to the general," and each New Year's day the editors had to hug themselves before the public over the quality that they said made good the lacking quantity of favor. Channing and some friends wanted a different tone from Norton's, and the Christian Disciple was next born. "Speaking the truth in love" was its motto; and Noah Worcester—the author of Bible News, but soon to win his title of "Apostle of Peace"—was its editor. But the Disciple was too tame for those stirring times (for now the "controversy" had begun), and it languished until it changed its editor and its tone and stood for some ideas as well as a holy spirit.

In other ways also the heresy was taking shape and size,—taking everything except a name. Books were written—notably that "Bible News of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost"—which startled all New England and ruffled circles where reasons against the Trinity had never broken in before. Emerson and Buckminster printed a hymn-book which had Pope's universal prayer in it; and, worse than this, an improved version of the New Testament was re-printed here, garnished with Unitarian notes by its English editors. The Orthodox saw in its welcome the worst of omens, and Dr. Mason, a Presbyterian divine of New York, described it as "the amended Bible which the Iscariot bands of professed Christianity are laboring to thrust into the hands of the simple,—straining into the cup of salvation the venom of Socinian blasphemy." Through the annual convention sermons, also, the heresy flowed and ebbed. One year the "few fundamentals" would be pointed out to the assembled ministers; by the next, the sea of charity had shrunk away and all the old rocks stood bare again.

THE ORTHODOX MUSTER.

Meanwhile, in these dozen years of rapid liberal growth, the Orthodox were far from idle. Eyes were opened, troops were marching, the muster before the onset had begun. Dr. Morse of Charlestown—be of the Geography—was the first Orthodox champion to take the field and strive to rally the Puritan feeling round "the faith once delivered to the saints." He set up a magazine too—The Panoplist—that proved a doughty man-at-arms, confronting each liberal encroachment, watching on the walls of Zion, and challenging the suspected heretics to declare themselves. The Andover School in 1808 made another strong barrier; and the next year Park Street Church was built, professedly to give asylum to high Orthodoxy in the midst of the enemy. Two or three country ministers lost their pulpits in Connecticut and New Hampshire, where Orthodoxy's hand was stronger than in Massachusetts. Then certain Evangelicals near Boston began to decline exchanges with their liberal brethren, and caused much hurt feeling thereby. Two or three church-breaks occurred; and then came a proposition which filled the Boston men with indignation. Connecticut had crushed out the germ of heresy by her consociations, and the Presbyterians by their Synods and Assembly. And now a plan was strenuously urged by Dr. Morse and his friends, to set up similar ecclesiastical tribunals in Massachusetts; but for that our Congregationalists were not ready. Massachusetts owes much to that escape.

THE SILENT BROTHERHOOD.

The crisis was close at hand. No name but "Liberal or Rational Christianity" was acknowledged by the Boston ministers; but it was known through the city and the State that they thought things they did not preach and had no objection to each other's parlor-heresies. "It is the prevailing idea all over the United States, that the clergy of Boston are little better than deists," writes Buckminster, one of their number, in 1809. Country parsons and strangers visiting Boston would attend the churches, or listen at the "Association-meetings" or the "Thursday lecture" or the College Commencement, with ears wary for the ambushed heresy; and sometimes would compare notes afterwards, or tell at country firesides that they had heard a service with no word of Christ's divinity or his atonement in it. But it was seldom or never possible to say they had heard denial of these doctrines.

Their refusal of the Unitarian name was one thing—this silence was another. For refusing that name there was a special and good reason. It was already appropriated by their English brethren and commonly identified with their Socinian, i. e., humanitarian view of Christ,—a view which few in New England had at that time reached. The great majority were of the Arian type: Christ to them was a being between God and man—higher than all archangels. They felt it would be a great injustice and untruth if they should be confounded with the followers of Priestley. So when the Orthodox called Dr. Ware at his election a Unitarian, his friends could truly say it was a calumny; and five years later Thacher could call that name "a flower of rhetoric."

But that since 1800, at least, there was a conscious silence about their thought, after that thought was pretty definite, there can be no doubt. The quick side-taking when the issue was forced showed the real ripeness of opinion. Channing and Thacher expressly admitted the silence and defended it; other Liberals admitted and excused it; still others admitted and rebuked it. It was the universal impression of the Orthodox, the common talk among them. The charge of "concealment" was afterwards denied; but when the Orthodox for ten years had been restlessly questioning, the silence practically was concealment. The motives for it were and may be variously construed. It was attributed to self-denial, Christian charity, prudence, policy, temporizing, cowardice, hypocrisy. Individuals—e. g., Channing and Thacher—were most certainly free from all stain of cowardice or hypocrisy. All perhaps were not. But Channing's principle of avoiding controversy because the points denied seemed to them of little moment, while religious controversy was most direful in its consequences,—this was doubtless the deepest motive with them all. The older men especially would feel that motive strongly. They saw that clear statement on certain points would make a bitter schism in the Church, and could not bear the thought. So that a most curious phenomenon was seen in the religious world: these rationalizers, and not the Orthodox with their plenary inspiration, were the men seen clinging to the letter and calling loudly they were the Bible-men! These freer-thinkers were standing as the advocates of vague thinking, while the Orthodox were the defenders of the right to think distinctly in religion!

The silence in those later years was not only an error, but an error (I think) of that kind which impugns the moral standard of the men who make it,—though it did not necessarily involve hypocrisy; i. e., dishonesty according to the standard which they sincerely held. A very real distinction. To that extent the Orthodox were right in their charge of concealment. Our fathers—the Unitarians before Unitarianism—chose the double, the esoteric and exoteric, way. The error exposed them to the ignominy of a forced disclosure. It should be remembered as a warning by their spiritual descendants in all sects, by all men and parties who are thinking forward,—a warning that the Liberal of the day should be as distinct in thought as he can be, and as open in word as the most bigoted bigot. Clearer statement possible is the only true statement in religion,—a duty, and the source of all new vision. Our world is not yet so used to free inquiry that we have fully learned the ethics of the process.

THE DISCLOSURE—1815.

An indignant friend and an indignant foe joined hands in bringing on the crisis. The friend lived across the water—Belsham, a London Unitarian of the extreme Priestley school, and vexed in his soul that the American brethren were so slow of tongue. In writing the life of Lindsey—James Freeman's friend—he accordingly put in a long chapter about them, citing Freeman's old letters and adding fresh ones just received from Boston,—all courteously betraying the non-committal policy. Dr. Morse rubbed his hands. That was what he wanted. Out came that chapter in a pamphlet; and straightway his Panoplist hailed it as the most important publication of the day. It was indeed. It was a fire-brand, and the Review was wind to it. The churches started up and watched to see what would happen. The Review had made three points. (1) The New England heretics shared Belsham's low views of Christ and mutilated the New Testament as he did. (2) The ministers who led the way in this apostasy were systematic hypocrites. (3) All Christian fellowship must therefore be denied them.

The Liberals could not keep silence now. But who should be their spokesman?

Channing then was thirty-five years old. Look at the beautiful face in Alston's portrait of him then, while the light of his great thought was dawning on him, before the eyes gazed so widely and the lips were set. He had been a quiet minister, making those calls, preaching his twice a day, not often going to the Anthology Club, but getting known as one who made men feel religious. Sad and indignant, Channing answered the attack. He admitted the Unitarianism, using that word in its broad sense, unconfined to Belsham's view of Christ. Opinions differed he said among them as to Christ. "To think with Belsham was no crime." But, as a fact, few did. For himself he had always scrupulously avoided every expression that might seem to acknowledge the Trinity; and, when asked in conversation, had explicitly avowed dissent. He admitted, justified, glorified, the pulpit-silence about the Unitarianism. The charge of hypocrisy was a slander. "We preach precisely as if no such doctrine as the Trinity had ever been known." No doctrine was more abstract or perplexing, so apt to gender strife. "We all of us think it best to preach what we esteem to be the truth, and to say very little about (speculative) error." About Calvinism, had they not been also silent? Yet they were well-known anti-Calvinists, and no preaching was more easy or more popular than attacks upon its dogmas,—and they deemed its errors far more injurious than any about Christ's person. "And yet the name Calvinist has never, I presume, been uttered by us in the pulpit." Not hypocrisy, but self-denial rather. And then, with all his heart and soul and mind and strength, he deprecated the threatened break in the Church.

A second champion now stepped forward in behalf of Orthodoxy—Samuel Worcester, brother of the one who wrote the Bible News and now was editing the Disciple for the Liberals. To and fro the letters went till each had three in print. This was the first set debate in the Unitarian controversy, and as such turned less on the proof and disproof of the doctrines (that came later), than on the importance of the doctrines doubted as a ground for denying Christian fellowship. Must the sacred old New England Church now break in two? Were the Liberals "un-Christian" because un-Trinitarian? "A solemn, infinitely important question," Channing calls it. Channing insisted that the differences were like the differences between the two schools of Calvinism; they were not fundamental. Worcester insisted that they were: that was all; but that was final. Channing said the Bible was vague about the nature of Christ and the way of the Atonement, and that therefore the Liberals were vague "because we are faithful;" only one belief was needful for the Christian name,—that "Jesus is the Christ." The Bible vague about Christ's essential divinity and the propitiatory sacrifice! cried Worcester. The Liberals indifferent about these things! Why, "set these aside and what but Natural Religion is left?"

THE NEW NAME NECESSARY.

And was not the Church-break necessary? Were not the Orthodox right? Of course not right in confounding "Church" fellowship with Christian fellowship, and like popes denying the name "Christian" to those who conscientiously appealed to a common Bible; but right in gathering up what they thought the plain Bible meanings into plainer words—the "human creeds" so-called. Right were they to say to the Liberals: "It cannot be wrong to think clearly in religion; and since our clear thinking shows us as the basis of salvation what you deny as even fact; since in your eyes we hold monstrosities of belief and in our eyes you hold monstrosities of unbelief,—then we are really two and not one, and you must go by yourselves and be a Church apart from us." It is a general question. We are much afraid of such disfellowshippings. New forms appear at last in every evolution-process—distinct new forms. Otherwise no growth. New sects must be; new names are sometimes necessary in religion. Ideas by growing on do grow apart. Why not recognize the fact? Recognize also that it comes about by growth; and then you know that the inner intimacy, the deeper unity, is not and never can be broken from the lowest form to the highest transformation. That is the glory of the evolution-thought applied to religion. Being interpreted, it says: Inner fellowship cannot be disowned; and "sects," the outer disfellowship, ought not to be.

At last, then, the heresy was out! Its veil was torn off; a name was forced upon it; and the schism had begun. It was the year 1815. The long, slow process that had quietly gone on since 1750—two full generations—had reached its crisis. Sides were quickly taken, though not without protests against the new name and the necessity of schism; and the two Churches, no longer two parties of one Church, drew off from one another.

THE UNITARIAN CONTROVERSY.

From this time, my story grows familiar; and as I only care to trace the fact of a "flow of faith," of an unbroken rise of thought up to the point where we are to-day, it will move more rapidly.

Some among you must remember the stormy twenty years that followed the acceptance of the Unitarian name—the years from 1815 to 1835; at which time the new sect had fairly won its position in the Christian Church. They were the years of its controversy with the Orthodox and of inner organization.

Channing still kept the leader's place; and once, twice, thrice, his plain, strong words served to draw the fresh attacks. But he left the defence to other hands. His own main work was to be constructive,—to unfold the doctrine of the divinity of human nature. Nothing that he wrote of a controversial nature remains unpublished, no single sermon, says his biographer; which shows how very little of a controversialist he really was in spite of his fame of leadership. He soon recognized that the break must be, whatever were the consequences; and in 1819, his Baltimore sermon defining Unitarianism made a sensation greater probably than any other sermon ever preached in America before or since. Men now saw what it was,—that its stand was taken squarely on the Bible, and its weapons would be very largely Bible-texts. Revelation, miracles, apostolic authority, the Christ, were all there. God's unity against his Trinity, human ability against Calvinism, were established on that basis. But the revelation was interpreted with a strangely daring reason which insisted that itself also was from God; and that the Christ, whatever his rank or whatever his death accomplished, was not God,—was not God-man. They saw too that no shred of Calvinism was left; that Unitarians could not see how a little lovable child could be "totally depraved," how moral responsibility could consist with "born depravity" of any sort, or "election" with God's impartial goodness, or "vicarious atonement" with God's justice, or "irresistible grace" with man's free will. These negations were what Unitarianism chiefly meant to its advocates. Its affirmations were whatever was left in revelation and religion when these were taken away. It was a Bible-faith, but yet a protest of reason against unreason, of the moral sense against inhumanity in religion,—a protest of the mind and heart of the nineteenth century against the mind and heart of the past. Words henceforth were hardly strong enough to express the differences which four years before had seemed "not fundamental."

When they heard the echoes of this sermon, two professors at Andover buckled on their armor, and the two at Harvard stood to meet them: Stuart against Norton on the dogma of the Trinity; Woods against Ware on the doctrines of Calvinism. The two debates are the classics of the controversy. Dry reading now they make. But what they wrote was little and was mild compared with what was written by others long before the twenty years were over. Boston, New York, Baltimore, and Princeton—city-ministers, country-parsons, and laymen; editors and pamphleteers, even children—took part in print. Both sides were violent, for each had a sacred cause in charge: one, salvation; the other, liberty; and both, the gospel,—and each felt misrepresented and abused.

Meanwhile, church-breakings went on in a hundred villages; and as the law decided that the parishioners, and not the mere church "members," made the Church, the meeting-house and funds and ancient name usually remained with the heretics, because they were in majority; while the lot of exile fell to the faithful Orthodox. No wonder the feeling grew bitter and more bitter, as neighborhoods and even families were thus divided against themselves.

ORGANIZATION.

The new sect organized itself. The American Unitarian Association was formed. The new papers sprang up. Tracts fluttered. The Disciple became the Examiner, and was very demonstrative and bold at first in its examinations and other magazines appeared. The Divinity School was re-organized and the brick hall in the damp meadow was built for it. Various benevolent societies were planned, and Unitarianism entered on that active life of philanthropy which has made its name so honorable. A large part of the intellect and culture and wealth at influence of the State had adopted its opinion. The distinguished laymen much more than the ministers made the early triumph. For in Boston it seemed to be a triumph. The position it gave was no hardship here to be in the country it sometimes was a hardship; on side of New England the early Unitarians were in small ways martyrs.

THE CHECK.

But about 1825 a check began to be felt, and Orthodox revival set in in Boston. It was not what as in early Protestantism. The Catholic became zealous in their Jesuits,—became partially reformed, at Trent; and Protestant proved less satisfactory, less inspiring, than been hoped. So in New England. Lyman Beecher came to Boston, and his presence meant fire. The shattered ranks closed up. He brought the "Spirit of the Pilgrims" in his heart and put it in a magazine thus christened. New tactics also in regard to the dogmas were adopted. So modified was the Orthodoxy now put forward, that the old evasion seemed almost to have shifted owners. It became as hard to tell where the Orthodox mind really was as fifteen years before it had been to discover a Liberal's thought. Twice the Unitarians had to prove to it that Calvinism, according to Calvin and his apostles, and the creeds and the fathers, did mean, in spite of all denials, the horrors which all now were willing to repudiate. The charge was admissible, but it did not seem fair to appeal to old phrases and ignore it.

UNITARIANISM COLD.

What helped the Orthodox revival again was the seeming coldness and meagreness of Unitarianism. Its zeal had been warm for some negations. But the positive thought, the positive influence—by that it must stand. It made public-spirited citizens, dutiful lives. But it did not touch hearts, excite enthusiasm. Even its sister Universalism was better off by one grand inspiration. Its preaching abounded in common-sense and dulness. Said Channing himself a few years later: "Unitarianism was a protest of the understanding against absurd dogmas, rather than the work of deep religious principle. It does not work deeply, it does not strike living springs in the soul." "Not that it had no positive ideas; it had. And to some they seemed positive and grand enough to inspire most earnest piety. In their light, a human being was in every way a being more beautiful than had been thought,—born from a nobler past and to a nobler destiny, with nobler germs within him and a kinder Providence around him. They made a rational religious system possible which cultured minds could accept and gentle hearts be grateful for. And yet with all this added dignity and beauty, to very many persons the Unitarian affirmations seemed—and to very many they ever since have seemed—meagre and cold and barren. Man was better, God was more friendly; and yet their theory of the universe almost seemed to hold the two apart, not bring them close—real Father to real child. The God-reality, the God-nearness, the God-touch (albeit awful) which the abandoned doctrines had and which all faiths must have to have might with men,—they lacked. A mediator seemed indeed more useful than ever. And they had one—a being sent by God; perhaps human, perhaps more than that; and attested as his special messenger by miracles and resurrection. His mission was to reveal correct religious ideas and add motives to morality, by teaching as facts the Unity and Fatherhood of God, and Immortality for man. He was to be our assurer of that which reason and the light of Nature made almost but not quite sure, our example, our intercessor, and our future judge. His death might or might not have had some unique and mystical connection with the forgiveness of our sins. But he had never redeemed us by the infinite self-sacrifices. For these ideas, so shorn of unreason, so shorn of power, the Unitarians had given up the God who stood on earth and bore our nature. For these the great love-spectacle set between the heavens and the earth had vanished.

What was the matter with Unitarianism? It was cramped by a belief—its remaining belief in revelation. While that clung, the old glory had departed and the new glory could not freely enter.

UNITARIANISM—REASON IN REVELATION.

What we called the second stage in the history of its growth is closed. The first found Calvinism giving way to Arminianism. The Westminster creed decayed, while the growth was the corresponding emphasis on man's reason and conscience as interpreters of universal right. This second has showed us the Calvinism wholly vanishing, and the doctrines of a Trinity and a Vicarious Atonement vanishing with it, while Reason has learned to trust herself richly as interpreter of Revelation. Not Reason in Religion yet, but Reason in Revelation—that was Unitarianism's real value; what it stands for. The early Unitarians were a "Free Religious Association" within Bible-limits. "Free inquiry" to this extent was as truly their principle as our own. To this extent: and who could declare the measure thereof? The great worth of the Bible to them was really its vagueness,—the room they thereby got for thinking far under cover. They themselves recognized this as their principle and were very proud of it, though they did not see whither it would lead them. The Orthodox were right. Dr. Worcester, Stuart, and the others were true prophets when they said that Unitarianism would go on necessarily to pure Rationalism, to nothing but Natural Religion. The popular gibe was true,—"It is a half-way house to infidelity." Yes; infidelity to the Revelation, which is fidelity to human nature and to reason. It would come to that at last. That was its destiny, its nobleness, its mission.

III.

THIRD STAGE—UNITARIANISM INTO NATURAL RELIGION. FOUR CAUSES.

Therefore, if one should seek the causes of the third stage of growth,—that which led onwards now from Unitarianism to "Natural Religion," still in its growth to-day,—he would find no secret; for this early Unitarian rationalism would first and foremost meet his eye with the burden of the future in it. If he asked a second cause, he still would find it on the Unitarian ground,—the splendid emphasis of Channing on the worth of human nature. This was the sublime idea which has made him a star in the American firmament. It is his own word: "My one sublime idea, which has given me unity of mind—the greatness, the divinity of the soul." Hence all his love of liberty. Hence all his plans for social regeneration. Hence the meanest man to him was an immortal and brought thoughts of grandeur. Listen to his characteristic sentences. "All minds are of one family," he said, thinking of Christ and God. "Yes, Christ, though so far above us, is still one of us; is only an illustration of the capacity which we all possess," he writes. "The minister is a fellow-worker with Christ and angels," was a favorite thought with him. "Each man should feel the greatness of his own spirit,—that it is so great as to justify all the mighty operations of Christianity, were there no other spirit which needed redemption." (There is transcendental humility for us!) "The noblest use of travelling is to discern more of the godlike in the human." "The truths I have insisted on are written not from tradition but from deep conviction; may I not say from inspiration? I mean nothing miraculous. Does not God speak in us all?" (Is it Channing, or Emerson, or Parker, who says it; Federal Street Church or Brook Farm?) And he scrupled not to say of Reason in Revelation: "The truth is, and it ought not to be denied, that our ultimate reliance is and must be on our own reason." "I am surer that my rational nature is from God than that any book is an expression of his will." These were the characteristic, not the exceptional, emphases in all the latter part of Channing's life, while his interest in the mere sect of Unitarianism was waning and his influence was sinking deep and spreading far. And who can doubt the "flow of faith," or wonder from what unknown skies Transcendentalism lit in Boston brains? It climbed there from the soil.

But other influences mingled with Channing's. And still once more we must render due to Unitarians. Channing never gave up miracles and perhaps never said Christ was a mere man. He did not like the "mere" way of putting any greatness. But while "all minds were of one family" to him, other thinkers, and they not low in Unitarian rank, had said that word. It is hard to tell how many of our fathers were Arians or of Arian type; how many were Humanitarians. Stuart said to Channing, as early as '19, "The younger men are nearly all outstripping you." Even Prof. Ware, in the private lectures at the Divinity School, was soon teaching or rather saying, that to himself Christ seemed a man. The protesting note-books of the students show it. There were doubtless several like him; and more every year. Probably few over forty years old at the time of the disclosure in 1815 died other than Arians. Probably few under forty then who did not grow doubtful, or certain the other way.

One other influence there was, and this alone was alien. It was the foreign literature which now began to be read—deep words of Kant, and Goethe, and Jacobi; broad-viewed words of Cousin and Constant; intoxicating words of Coleridge, and Carlyle, and Fourier. These came like wind and sunshine to the transcendental growths that were already sprouting in New England soil. They were most important to that growth, but by furnishing ready-made forms of thought and phraseology. Even of life, they seemed to be still more important than (I suspect) they were. And they made it easy to dub it German infidelity and French atheism.

TWO SCHOOLS OF UNITARIANISM.

Now these four influences (three being from Unitarianism itself—its early principle of free inquiry, Channing's "dignity of human nature," and the growing recognition that Christ was a brother-man) joined to make the Unitarian mind diverge within itself. Two schools of thought grew evident: one based as of old on Locke's philosophy of sense and externality; the other more on Kant's philosophy of primal intuitions. Two schools of Bible criticism also showed themselves, attached respectively to these contrasted philosophies. One accepted the fact of external revelation easily; accepted the mediating messenger and his miracles most sincerely; and said to reason, "Thus far and no farther." The other scanned first the Old Testament and then the New, with growing scepticism. The miracles faded from the pages or seemed to blur them. Inconsistencies and immoralities multiplied along the chapters. Moses could not have written the Pentateuch. The Prophets did not mean the babe of Bethlehem. The miracles of Jesus, were they or were they not a fact? That was what the ministers were pondering and the Boston maidens were discussing, about 1839. It seemed as if Strauss's book had blown out the whole gospel light in puffing the miracles away as myth.

TRANSCENDENTALISM.

Perhaps the first sure sign of the change thus wrought was, that Mr. Emerson changed his parish. He left Hanover Street and took the world. A few years later he came back within the circle and reported to the Divinity boys at Harvard what wonders he had found within. His theme was the Soul. His contrast was the Church and its religion based on externality and another's word. Listen to the inward oracle and you shall hear the stars sing close beside you! Be dutiful, and the Duty in the universe is full of you! "In how many churches, tell me, is man made sensible that he is an infinite soul; that the earth and heavens are passing into his mind; that he is drinking forever the soul of God?" It sounded like an echo of Channing's thought, attuned to a finer and a farther rhythm, as if it had in some way really mingled with the music of the spheres. Presently, Boston hushed itself to listen to his lectures. Then the Dial began to tell the hour of eternity, and the "Over-Soul" drew near. Near at least it drew to the charmed circles who sat and talked with rapt looks in certain parlors, and in that wondrous family near by on which the public gazed with curious smiles to see what poets and Plato's kindred knew about farming.

UNITARIANISM CONSERVES ITSELF.

Of course there was re-action. Of course there was a controversy, though rather on the question about miracles than over these sky-born thoughts. The soul could not be exactly controverted,—over-soul or soul within; and yet it could not very plainly baffle in its own defence. Not that it was unwilling to speak. It marks the really great advance that free thought had made within the generation, that there was in this third stage no "silent brotherhood." The word came forth as soon as the thought went in—sometimes before; and men wondered what the would-be sky-born might portend. This gave the men of miracles and logic laughter, or would have given laughter had they not been utterly sincere in their own reverence; and therefore the whole tendency gave them fear. Henry Ware, the younger and the saint, rebuked Mr. Emerson's address; and Norton, the veteran of the former advance, roused himself against the new one, calling it "the latest form of infidelity." Some moved on, the younger men especially; accepting impulses from the new thought where they could not greet it heartily. But as a denomination, the Unitarians said, mostly, No. Channing was much disappointed with them; and this should be remembered when people speak of "Channing Unitarianism." His life just covered the early phase of the new growth, and in the last two or three years of his life he often wrote: "I am little of a Unitarian," none at all as a sectarian. "The Unitarian body seems to be forsaking its first love,—its liberality, its respect for the rights of individual judgment, its separation of the essential from the unessential in Christianity. I have felt for years that it must undergo important developments. It began as a protest against the rejection of reason. It pledged itself to progress as its life and end; but it has gradually grown stationary, and now we have a Unitarian Orthodoxy." "Perhaps," he added, "this is not to be wondered at or deplored; for all reforming bodies seem doomed to stop in order to keep the ground which they have gained. They become conservative, and out of them must spring new reformers to be persecuted generally by the old."

THEODORE PARKER.

It was a kind of prophecy. When the growth had extended a little farther, and Theodore Parker in his country study began to print his Bible criticisms and give the American extract of the German thought, and to deny the miracles, and call Christ distinctly our brother-man, our lofty self, and at South Boston pointed out what was transient and what permanent in Christianity,—then the Boston ministers recoiled. Parker found his basis of religion in simple intuition, and called his religion the Absolute. They said Christianity,—Natural Religion, miracles, Christ's authority. Could these latter be denied and Christian fellowship maintained? They doubted—they thought not; these were part of the essentials, the "fundamentals," to use the old word. By almost all, the fellowship was practically denied. Those who did not deny it, to-day are "named and known by that hour's feat." But Revelation being essential to the feast, and miracles necessary to make the Revelation most, was the fellowship rightly or wrongly refused by them? This is again the question. Again I should answer, Rightly. They were doing as the Orthodox had done to them while they protested; it was a limitation of their old principle tested; it was a limitation of their old principle of free inquiry, to be sure. But they had always sincerely meant that limitation. They had never stood for Reason outside of Revelation. That was a really new issue. Rightly, therefore; for now as in that elder case men had a right to clear-cut their thought and a duty to be loyal to the thought's demand. The growth again required a new name in religion, and probably was hastened by that free recognition of the need.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

Parker popularized Transcendentalism, and applied the logical reason to its vision. That was his work—the Paul-work after the Christ-work. It was the first attempt in this country to systematize Natural Religion. I need not sketch his influence on young ministers and on the public, churching as well as unchurching, or the growth of thought since his time; because no one doubts his connection with ourselves, or the fact (I hope) that there has been further growth. Yet his essential emphases are ours to-day. The differences are due to the great light that more science and more historic criticism and the comparative study of religions have been pouring in upon us since his eyes were closed. Science now is turning theologian,—rather turning prophet of religion, as she was in younger days when Genesis was written and the myths composed. She boldly enters into her own and proffers aid. Not sole, not chief, is she; but first of all assistants. She purges the Bible, and the stars shine there all the clearer. She confesses ignorance before the mighty mysteries, but points to Unity and Evolution everywhere. She questions "intuition," and yet is already reconciling intuition with experience in that hint of "derivation" which gathers in the fact of each. She questions "spirit," "person;" and yet by all this new emphasis on evolution is showing how mind grows in matter through the ages, and how the two, if not two, are a One which is both.

Unitarianism feels the influence of science, and is becoming live and liberal again. Spiritualism is partly a child of science. The radicals are only those who try to be most loyal to her. Liberal Orthodoxy is perhaps of all her child of promise. (When will the thinkers cease to remind us of that "silent brotherhood" of early Unitarians?) Science to-day is entering the primary schools. What will have become of the Bible-dogmas as Bible-dogmas, two generations hence?

THE RESULTS AND THE PROMISE.

At last then I have reached the end of my long story of the three stages of growth in our New England Unitarianism. Throughout, it is a movement of Reason into Religion; and the general results of its entrance have been these:—

The old doctrines of Christianity—those born in classic and petrified in mediæval thought—are all discarded; but the truth that lived in each is living still and growing on our recognition. The Bible ceases to be of any external authority in religion, but becomes a most noble witness to the fact that human nature is itself religious. Christ is regarded as mere man, but the glory of "mere manhood" is seen to be as yet but dimly guessed.

And thus the so-called "Christian revelation" resolves itself into a "Natural Religion," that is exalted by all the truth and life and inspirations that have borne the other name. By this last character our present vision differs from the early deism which was its dim, rough prophecy; and from the ancient thought of classic heathenism, that noble vision kindred to our own. To us, the Revelation's higher contents, that gospel of the love of persons, that Christ's life and influence, the risen moral sanctities of Christianity,—to us they all belong; and the very beliefs themselves in Christs and Revelations are seen to be creations of man's religious spontaneity, and each dogma a gesture towards some truth. The "supernatural" in them has vanished, vanished to become nobler ideas of Nature and the human.

It is a story of evolution; of transfiguration. And still there is transition to forms better. "Consider the lily, how it grows."

Therefore we cannot help thinking that another blossom is preparing in the stem Religiousness, which will by and by be known by a new name; and that again that which has been good will be destroyed by being fulfilled in something better. What is the better? A higher Unitarianism, a better Orthodoxy. Why go from one to the other to find truth, when truth owns both and disowns either as herself? What better? Only old glory again expanded, deepened, spiritualized, by doing away with veils and limitations.

A nearer God. A more essential unity of each in all and all in each. "Our Father within" becomes the prayer-thought to interpret "Our Father in the heavens;" and so the Presence in our prayer abides with us in life, the natural and inevitable Friend.

A larger Providence,—whose purpose no one Lord, or Church, or heaven, or hell interprets.

Larger facts of incarnation and inspiration,—facts that hold you and me, and hold the Christs in natural outcome and so as prophecy of other Christs to come; and offer larger Bibles with many fresh lips and old to tell its parables, beatitudes, and psalms.

Truer statements of those mighty laws, of which the other Christian dogmas encircling Christ and Adam are poor early versions, quaint and earnest; that law misnamed "original sin," by which mind and disposition are inherited and the race wins its instincts through the generations; and that grand law of "vicarious atonement" which rules in every home and village, and moulds the nations' histories and makes the race one brotherhood,—the law by which each man is ever bearing others' burdens and sharing out his own, expiating others' sins and radiating retribution.

What will the better be? By the recognition of these large, firm laws, a heavier moral responsibility, and so a readier partly, and so a larger freedom and a quickened progress and brighter hopes and an ever ripening joy!

This is to be not a Christian; that is, to be more than a Christian,—if pure Natural Religion drops, as it probably will, all christening whatsoever. Think not that a new faith ever comes to destroy the old, save by fulfilling it; and remember,—those who fear and those who, not fearing, yet look forward to some loneliness,—that "if that which be done away is glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious." And then one deeper thought; to keep us humble, trustful and very humble, whatever we may think:—

"Our little systems have their day,
They have their day and cease to be;
They are but broken lights of Thee,
And Thou, O God, art more than they.

Let knowledge grow from more to more,
But more of Reverence in us dwell,
That mind and soul, according well,
May make one music as before,
But waster!"

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1873, by P. E. Annot, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OR

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER VIII.—(Continued.)

John, the first-born and the exception recently alluded to, had rescued himself from the family tendencies by his own superior energy and tenacity of purpose. He, in part, escaped the ruinous paternal indulgence, which scarcely set in till after his juvenility; and, contriving to get himself decently educated, apprenticed himself to the law, which he studied with so much perseverance and ability as to both deserve and secure the success which, at the date of the commencement of this story, rendered him the pride and glory of the Sabinas. To be sure, it was not achieved immediately, and early friends of the family remembered his dropping in upon them on Saturday evenings to borrow half-sovereigns, or even smaller sums, with more frequency than was agreeable. But these were by-gones: at the period of our novel, he was a solicitor in good practice, married and eminently respectable; the standing rebuke of his brothers' shiftness, and their frequent resource during impecuniosity. He had a house in Bedford Square, an office in Gray's Inn, and clerks and pupils, with whom Kate and a younger sister flirted prodigiously whenever they got an opportunity. When her brother came to Newman Street, it was always a special occasion, in honor of which the household assumed an aspect of extemporized order absolutely comical, when contrasted with its normal condition. John Sabin senior had an immense respect for his prosperous son and namesake; he liked to quote his opinions, and talked about him to friends and acquaintances with a familiarity which disappeared in his presence: indeed the old man stood somewhat in awe of his junior, with whom his habits could scarcely find favor—besides he commonly wanted to borrow five pounds whenever they met. A worthy and not unkindly person, the lawyer would willingly have tried to uplift the fallen fortunes of the family, had he not, very reasonably, despaired of success. That into which he had married was rich, and proportionately looked up to by the Sabinas, who privately disparaged the Thomtons as "stuck-up" people but courted their notice. Paul Gower had once incurred Kate's serious displeasure by denominating them the "swell-friends of the family." Indeed, he suspected her of setting her cap at young Fred Thornton, John's brother-in-law, who kept his brougham and tiger, had chambers in the Albany, and was a man of fashion. (There was a horrid legend extant that she, in conjunction with a female friend, had once visited him at the chambers in question; but it appertained to the period before Paul's introduction to the Sabinas, and he resolutely ignored it.) Ultimately this gentleman, in conjunction with another person (to be introduced in the next paragraph), wrought the downfall of his relative and involved him in bankruptcy, when John's self-esteem sunk with his fortunes, and he underwent a curious decline towards brandy-and-water and paternal indulgences. But this is, of course, anticipatory; at present he is rigidly respectable.

The second son, Arthur, was the black sheep of the family. Having sown a most plentiful crop of wild oats on land, he, perhaps by way of trying the facilities afforded by another element, ran away to sea, whence he returned, after an absence of half-a-dozen years, to become a nuisance to everybody. For a time he lived at Newman Street, and with him, in an equivocal, surreptitious relation, which was certainly not wedlock, the ex-wife or widow of a maritime comrade; a lean, hard-working woman who only seemed to lack matrimony to render her respectable. She supplied the place of mother to a chubby boy of six, Arthur's child by a legitimate wife, who had died during her husband's absence at sea. Expelled from the household in consequence of a grand row and mutiny instituted by Kate—who even left home for a week and took refuge with a married sister at Somers Town, in protest against Mrs. Wornum—the pair shifted their lodgings, but were still tolerated as visitors and recognized in a left-handed manner by all the family, of which the child was a great pet and favorite. How Arthur Sabin got a living it would be difficult to say; having flown over many dubious professions, he appeared to have settled only in that of sponge and general hanger-on to his father and brothers—with the ultimate result, to John, already intimated.

Lucy, the married sister and third-born, had all but eloped with a copper-plate engraver, who became her husband, not before it was high time. Since then, Mr. Ball had beaten her once or twice, and she had once quitted him temporarily; but, all things considered, they lived together pretty amicably. She was a chatty, agreeable person, with a fair share of the family good looks, who often gave Kate good advice against flirtation, which her sister received with more impatience than profit; also, she was mother to a pretty girl of eight, for whom Paul Gower used to draw caricatures.

Of the expatriation of Tom Sabin we have heard already, from his father; but the old painter did not think it necessary to inform Mr. Bligh that his son's departure from England was rendered imperative by his having signed another man's name to a bill; nor that Tom had been recognized as the bar-tender of a New York liquor saloon; nor yet that he had subsequently changed his name and turned actor. Beyond these particulars, obtained from a travelling acquaintance, and the fact that Tom had once remitted a photograph representing himself with an American wife and children, very little was known of this member of the family.

The next surviving Sabin (there had been intervening ones, who died in their infancy, on which I may congratulate the reader) were Richard and Kate; in describing whom I shall use some latitude, for reasons already mentioned.

Richard, commonly called Dick Sabin, was three years older than his sister, being eight and twenty; and a decidedly handsome fellow, six feet high, and broad-shouldered and large-limbed in proportion: he would have made a guardsman or "swell," after the late John Leech's pattern, though he generally went very plainly, indeed, carelessly dressed; always however looking like a gentleman, he was so cool, self-possessed, and unaffected. He had curly, tawny hair, large gray eyes, which seemed darker than they were, in contrast with his eyelashes and eye-brows, a strong, solid, aquiline nose, and great, white teeth in a largish mouth, over the corners of which descended a long moustache, ending in ample whiskers. His manner was so reserved that people commonly thought him rather conceited at first and fancied that he gave himself airs of superiority over them; but with his friends and intimates he was prodigiously popular. His disposition rendered this inevitable, for his character was only another version of his father's, with modern developments.

As easy-natured and improvident as the old man, like him Dick possessed in perfection all those agreeable qualities which may exist in the absence of moral worth or sterling integrity. He was essentially what has come to be generally recognized as a Bohemian, taking that title to mean an artist or professional person with whom the serious responsibilities of life are quite secondary to immediate self-indulgence. An unmatchable loafer (we have no English equivalent for the word, and it is virtually naturalized), he could do everything of a social character to admiration, and that in a cool, nonchalant manner which bettered the performance. He was so companionable that his very presence satisfied; you could sit with him without feeling the necessity for much conversation—though, when he chose, he could hold his own with the liveliest. He rarely offered advice or criticism, or cared to say a disagreeable thing to anybody, unless provoked to it, or betrayed by his sense of humor; though he not unfrequently made himself amends for his reticence behind the backs of those whose habits or opinions conflicted with his own. Arragating the largest liberty in both, he rather justified his friends' faults than tolerated them, and resented interference in either case, on principle. He had been known to relieve a beggar "because he drank, and because it must be such an infernal thing to want gin when you were used to it." He never seemed to be in a hurry, and lavished money, when he had it, as freely as his leisure. His whole life had been an attempt to dispense with the difficult virtues (which happen to be all the important ones), substituting in their stead such as are easy to practice, and popular.

I do not suppose that he did this deliberately; probably there was in him the amount of latent self-deception common to most of us; but he certainly knew better. He was shrewd enough to have recognized a higher standard of conduct, and had sufficient ability to have lived up to it; but he wanted the resolution: his better qualities were neutralized by his carelessness and prodigality. So whenever he descended to discuss the question (which was but seldom), he pretended to ignore the necessity for anything beyond general good intentions and a performance dictated by his own inclinations or convenience. He would talk very humorously on the subject; less frequently however convincing his creditors than those who were naturally disposed towards his way of thinking among his "friends of Bohemia."

With that remarkable "back-slim suburb to the cities of literature and art," Dick Sabin was curiously familiar. He knew it and its ways, and they suited him; and he had an unusually large acquaintance with its promiscuous population, whether literary, artistic, or nondescript, male or female, good, bad, and indifferent; from the "clever fellows of rising reputation and ladies of none," down to the very camp-followers and hangers-on—ruffish, drunken, disreputable, sharking, sponging scamps, who seemed to live on tobacco, dressed themselves like caricatures by Gavarni, told objectionable stories, danced the Chaloupe or the Caneen, and sang blackguard songs from the extinct London night-house or Quartier Latin. He was anything but exclusive as to his acquaintances, though his friends were of his own choosing: with both he wasted so much of his time that it would be difficult to say how he had contrived to qualify himself for a profession demanding so much energy, industry, and self-devotion; but there are born artists and Richard Sabin was one of them. Working only by fits and starts, or when spurred by necessity, and always putting off his tasks until the last minute, he yet drew with remarkable skill and dexterity illustrations to books, newspapers, and periodicals, anything that came to hand, but preferably subjects of a comic nature—his labors of the easel being exceptional to his staple employments. Of course he earned less than men with half his talents, and occupied but a dubious position among his craft, who find punctuality quite as valuable in art as in other matters: they talked of what he might do, if he liked, and shook their heads when he was mentioned. But nearly everybody thought him a delightful fellow. It is a question if he would have drawn anything but caricatures of his friends and acquaintances, if he had possessed money enough to loaf through life at his own pleasure.

Had Paul Gower (who admired his friend of all men) been asked to depict the object of his affections at the period of which I write, he would certainly have produced a much more flattering portrait of Kate Sabin than the one I am about to attempt; though, some years afterwards, he might have admitted the likeness, with perhaps a twinge of sadness at the recollection of his youthful ideal. We all think tenderly of our first-love, however badly she may have used us, in fulfilling her inevitable destiny of jilting us for somebody else.

I have spoken of Kate's face and figure already; it remains only to describe her disposition and character. She had not been very much spoiled by the consciousness of her beauty and popularity, though her behaviour afforded frequent reason for doubting it. She was really good-natured and kind-hearted; not ungenerous, except when her vanity came into play, and no more affected than a pretty, uninformed young woman, accustomed to a good deal of promiscuous admiration and living in a shifty home and dubious sphere of society, must be. I say uninformed, notwithstanding her indisputable cleverness, which she owed rather to her natural intelligence and quickness of parts than to an education limited to twelve months at a Kennington boarding-school (in the garden of which, by the way, we first made her acquaintance). This culture, scanty as it was, improved by her feminine tact, would have enabled her to pass muster in better society than any she had known, or was likely to know, barring the improbability of a marriage above her station. She could sing and dance, and behave as becomingly in a drawing-room as if she had never entered a kitchen, nor cooked a dinner, nor made pies and puddings, nor dabbled in the suds during a family wash; with all of which labors her industrious fingers were as familiar as with the keys of her pianoforte—though she liked the latter better. Indeed the hap-and-scramble system, or want of one, prevalent in the Newman Street household compelled the girls (Kate and a younger sister) to undertake most of the work ordinarily devolving on servants; hence what accomplishments they possessed, beyond those acquired at school, had been picked up intuitively. They betrayed this by overdoing their pretensions and being extremely sensitive to criticism. A spice of wilfulness, inherent in Kate's Yorkshire blood, sometimes led her to the verge of rudeness, but she was not vulgar—or very rarely so. Her father had once been almost a gentleman, and the tradition of this in the family—it was little more—showed through its queerest makeshifts and reverses. None of its members, except John, saw it as it really was, and he had come to regard its normal Micawberisms as a sort of fatality. All the rest spoke of each other with immense consideration (except when they quarrelled); while Kate and her sister would have done battle any day with anybody who had dared to question the family respectability.

A natural coquette, whose flirtations were only limited by her opportunities, vain, fickle, and approbative, Kate Sabin was yet capable of real feeling and faulty from want of thought, rather than want of heart: had she understood herself, and possessed the self-respect that comes of that knowledge, she might have been as good as she was handsome. To any man, not much above her own position in life, and of reasonable matrimonial expectations, who had fallen in love with and married her, incontinently repudiating all her relations, she would probably have sobered down into an excellent wife—only the opportunity hadn't occurred, for most of her admirers were provokingly ineligible. Perhaps she flirted all the more eagerly on that account. If Fred Thornton had proposed, Paul's chance would certainly have counted for very little; while all the family would indubitably have backed the former. Improvident people are not less worldly than others, though they commonly affect a cheap disparagement of social position, on the well-known fox-and-grapes principle; indeed, their chronic impecuniosity renders them peculiarly sensitive to the influence of money. And Kate wanted to be married, like other young women.

She had no more sentiment than was almost inevitable to age, sex, and nationality; loved admiration above all things, and was not at all particular as to its quality, as Paul could not help knowing. She preferred music to reading, and both played and sang brilliantly, her voice being an unusually pure and sweet contralto, which her lover thought the most exquisite in the world. When she came home from boarding-school and performed in the Newman Street front-parlor, quite a little crowd collected outside, on the pavement, to listen. She had two or three show-pieces, chief among which was "Weber's Last Waltz," but excelled in such simple songs as "Wapping Old Stairs," "Long, long ago," "Kathleen Mavourneen," and some of Moore's Irish Melodies—songs which one seldom hears now-a-days, the more the pity. Long afterwards, when years and the Atlantic lay between them, Paul remembered Kate's warbling these ditties and sighed to think that her voice was changed, wondering how it would affect him then. As to her dancing (in which, like all healthy, natural young women, she delighted), he disapproved of it, and suffered torments when she waltzed. Paul couldn't dance very well himself, and had a harrowing consciousness of the fact.

I shall explain his relations to her in a future chapter, and leave Kate's remaining characteristics to develop themselves in the course of this story; we may also dismiss the two undescribed members of the family in a couple of sentences. Frank Sabin we have seen already; he was a good-looking scapegrace and daredevil, the plague of the household; while his twin-sister Elizabeth—ordinarily nicknamed Tib, or Tibby—emulated her brother in mischief and Kate in coquetry. These two sometimes worried Paul without mercy, but were ordinarily his very good friends.

Such was the Sabin family. If old Mrs. Gower had known as much about it as is contained in this chapter, she might have objected to Paul's visits to Newman Street even more strenuously than she did already.

PUTTING IT TO VOTE.—To any man who, besides intellectual tastes, has an interest in the great drifts and currents of modern society, one of the eminent satisfactions presented by life in London is that which the great city furnishes in its innumerable associations of marked people—especially in its Clubs. Club life of all descriptions is greatly developing there of late, both in extent and in importance. Among the Clubs which have recently come into being in London is one based on the very unique and admirable idea of enabling extremes to meet. Starting with the thought that, in the truly civilized state, even the widest differences of opinion constitute no valid reason why people should nickname or throttle one another, it proceeds to the conclusion that an occasional friendly union, in the same room, for free and polite conversation, of persons who represent the most opposite views in politics, theology, and philosophy, would be an advantage to all concerned. Of course, it is indispensable to the success of such a Club that all its members should be alike in one particular—namely, in social culture; that is, that each should be truly civilized, able to listen fairly to ideas that he does not accept, and able candidly to state his own. Chaucer drew the portrait of the ideal member of such a Club when he said of his Oxford scholar,—

"And gladly wolde he lerne, and gladly teache."

Our readers can judge of the character of this Club, and of the royal discussions which they must have, when we tell them that it regularly brings together such men as Dr. Newman, Archbishop Manning, Dr. Pusey, Mr. Gladstone, Maurice, Huxley, Mill, Lewes, Bishop Wilberforce, and Mr. Holyoke—namely, Catholics, High Churchmen, Broad Churchmen, Dissenters, Come-Outers, Infidels, Positivists, Materialists, Spiritualists, and Atheists. With reference to this Club an amusing story has been going the rounds of conversation in London during the past few months. The question for discussion on one occasion was this: "Is there a God?" Mr. Gladstone was very anxious to be present and take a part in the debate; but, being detained in the House of Commons, he did not reach the Club-room until the company was breaking up. Meeting at the door his friend, Mr. Glyn, the Liberal "whip" of the House, who naturally takes a professional view of even theological discussions, Mr. Gladstone asked him "how the debate had turned out." "Oh, very well," replied the whip; "God had a pretty fair majority!"—Independent.

A teacher in a public school was lately showing a lady some small cards she had to give her little scholars of five or six years old, as Rewards of Merit. Within their ornamented borders were passages like these: "By grace are ye saved through faith;" "Marvel not that I said unto you, ye must be born again;" "Christ is in you the hope of glory;" "The Mediator of the new covenant;" "The word was made flesh and dwelt among us;" and so forth. On the lady's asking if she supposed the little things would understand the mottoes, the teacher replied, "Oh no, not now; but they will have them stored up in their minds till they do."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at ODEON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1874. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED previously, Nine Hundred and Sixty-Seven Shares, $96,700.
W. A. TUCKERMAN, West Newton, Mass., One Share, 100
$96,800

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending February 15, 1874.
Frank S. Billings	$ 2 00	Robt. Law	1 83
Joshua H. Underway	1 00	A. M. Clark	3 00
Wm. Corning	1 00	Clarence Vail	1 50
Mrs. A. Bronson	1 00	V. B. Martin	1 75
Miss M. A. Beebe	1 00	Fitch Purdy	1 50
J. W. Arnold	1 00	Jno. W. Grimth	3 00
Rev. E. E. Clough	75	J. W. Knapp	3 00
Mrs. D. L. Smith	3 75	G. K. Withington	30 00
Nathl. Myers	3 00	H. C. Beckman	2 00
Mrs. M. B. Dinamore	3 00	John Glyn	75
Orrin Guernsey	3 00	A. Hannan	3 00
Mrs. J. W. Quimby	3 00	Hunter & Co	2 00
Mrs. W. P. Southworth	3 00	Malina Skinner	3 00
Wm. S. Leach	7 00	J. C. Price	10 50
Geo. Gallup	3 00	N. W. Beckwith	75
W. B. Hearn	3 00	J. S. Hill	3 00
Cyrus Powers	1 00	Preston Day	75
W. W. Allen	1 00	J. H. Harlow	3 00
A. O. Doty	1 00	S. H. Beal	3 00
Rev. Dr. Landsburg	3 00	J. S. Palmer	2 25
H. O. Warner	3 00	Wm. A. Abbott	3 00
H. D. Kingsbury	15 07	E. D. Starvank	3 00
Robt. Avery	3 00	Mrs. C. A. Tucker	10 00
M. C. Rigg	3 00	Benj. R. Tucker	10 00
C. M. Tyler	1 50	Jas. W. White	30 00
R. H. Curran	1 50	Geo. Hoadley	20 00
Mrs. S. F. Blackall	1 50	Nelson Newland	10
Laura Ramsdell	1 50	J. L. Swayze	5 00
Harriet Belding	75	Henry White	10 00
D. Farnley	1 00	M. Hadley	10 00
J. Milton How	1 00	E. F. Ring	1 00
Fred Federlen	1 50	C. S. Willey	10
Rabbi Samson Falk	1 00	B. W. Wendt	25
Frederick Verel	1 50	Geo. W. Robinson	10 00
Wm. Meisberger	1 00	Wm. Wilby	10 00
F. Eldine	1 00	Charles Voyay	25 48
Geo. N. Newhall	3 00	S. W. Norris	25
A. H. Newton	2 00	Elizabeth Colt	25
Beriah Green	2 00	Frank Cheney	3 00
H. Gilliland	75	Mrs. C. E. Serrill	1 00
John Casson	3 00	A. Hubbard	1 50
Joseph Marsh	3 00	J. W. Miller	2 50
Wm. T. Stowe	75	Francis Lampel	7 00
Ellisha Burdick	3 00	J. B. Ford	3 00
Geo. H. Stone	3 00	Mrs. N. L. M. Tucker	75
Hopson & Sherman	3 30	H. W. Beach	2 00
H. Conner	3 00	Marion Martin	75
M. H. Conaway	3 00	J. D. Wortman	1 00
Wm. Ackerman	3 00	Miss E. T. Parker	10 00
L. S. Bacon	1 00	Alex. Cochran	2 50
James M. Choves	3 00	T. A. Kinney	25
Jno. Stubb	25	L. Bristol	30
Wm. H. Hays	3 00	J. S. Ramage	25
D. F. Sweetland	50	R. G. Coray	50

The Index.

FEBRUARY 22, 1873.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right, and believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWERS, TOLEDO, OHIO." All charges, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfillment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
OTATYUS BROOKS PROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. R. D. CHERRY, REV. CHARLES YOTNEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Please send all matter intended for any particular issue of THE INDEX at least a fortnight in advance of date. We shall be very greatly obliged by attention to this request.

John Milton, though a Puritan (and the greatest of his day), was an Independent of the sternest type, and believed that "the administrative and legislative power should be lodged in the individual church and that there should be no superior court." Hence he denounced the rising school of Presbyterianism, with its consolidated ecclesiastical government, declaring that—

"New Presbyterian is but Old Priest writ large."

In the last issue of THE INDEX (February 15) an advertisement was inserted by mistake, during our temporary absence, which contained an announcement of advertising rates for THE INDEX. The announcement was premature, and is hereby recalled. In the press of business attendant upon the enlargement of the paper, permanent advertising rates have not yet been fixed by the Directors of the Index Association. When this is done, a proper announcement will be made.

It was announced last October that Judge Thurman would address the people of Zanesville, Ohio, on the political issues of the time. But on the day appointed it was found that Music Hall, the largest and only available hall in the place, was already occupied by the advocates of the Christian Amendment to the United States Constitution; and notwithstanding urgent requests and offers of money, the Senator was unable to persuade the "reformers" to waive their right to the hall.

Mr. W. R. Greg, author of the well-known Creed of Christendom, is described rather felicitously by the literary critic of the Academy as "a sceptic who cherishes some articles of faith which he knows to be uncertain;" and his latest book, just published in London with the title Enigmas of Life, is mentioned as "showing in a convenient compass how much—or how little—can be done in the way of constructive speculation without a foundation of fixed scientific principles." There is a beautiful delicacy and tenderness in Mr. Greg's writings, combined with entire courage and a transparent devotion to principle. He is one of the noblest knights of the new chivalry, who leave home and all its attractions to wander off in search of the Holy Grail of truth. Yet one feels very keenly the lack of a scientific rule in this search, all the more because so much moral and mental heroism is displayed in the attempt to dispense with it. Let us look steadfastly and with hope to the future of human intelligence, sure that science shall yet consummate itself by giving a fixed foundation of human knowledge to the sublimest sentiments of the human heart.

WILL FREE RELIGION HAVE SUNDAY SCHOOLS?

In one of the many letters that stream continually into this office from north, south, east, and west,—from old and young, from man and woman,—I find the following passage which serves very well as a text for what I wish now to say. The writer incidentally remarks: "I am anxious to see some plan for conducting a liberal Sunday School. I think it absolutely necessary that we (Liberals) have some systematic method of instructing our children, and that we see to it immediately that they be brought together each Sunday, at least, and taught those sound principles of morality which are the only useful part of all religions. We are neglecting our duty to our children by not having some general understanding amongst us that they shall and must be taught according to some well-considered and unsectarian plan."

This suggests the pertinent and imminent inquiry, Will free religion have Sunday-schools? In other words, Shall we who are liberals of the free religious order have any consenting method of imparting our liberalism to our children? We accept free religion, I suppose, because we heartily believe that it furnishes to us the best method and the best attitude whereby and wherein to become successful learners of the truth. Shall we desire that our children shall receive from us, or be helped by us to gain for themselves, this best method and attitude? This only is the simple question. Mark, it is not whether we shall desire or strive to impart to the young any set or specific form of doctrines. No thorough liberal has any such doctrines. He has no doctrine or belief to which he clings with determined tenacity; none around which he has built the least sign of any fence. All his faiths are utterly out of doors,—out in the open weather of God, subject to all the rain and drouth, the sun and frost, the storm and calm that wise Nature sends; subject to every change of mental climate, to all the material and spiritual influences that flow from the four quarters of the globe. Therefore nothing in the shape of dogmas have radicals to impart to their children; no fixed and settled doctrines have they to teach the young. Only a mental method, a mental attitude; only a wise, broad, fair, candid, catholic spirit,—only this is the legacy that true radicals have to bequeath to those who come after them.

But Heaven grant that they have so much as this to bestow! And, having this, shall earth or heaven hinder them from bestowing it? Have we radicals no estate which we wish our children to inherit? Would we desire them to go forth from our roof, as from the old land of bondage where we and our fathers once dwelt, to wander painfully or wildly through many wildernesses in order to come to any fair outlook on the promised land of truth? The chances are, if we put into their hands no divining rod from our experience, furnish them with no brave ideal for leader, that they will find seas impassable and rocks obdurate; that they will be swooped down upon and captured by predatory bands of Orthodoxy,—or, weary and frightened with inquiry and search, will long for and return to the old flesh-pots of superstition. Though we are out of doors with our faith, have we yet no temple, no worship? Behold the dome of the Infinite over our heads, bright with the stars and planets, the suns and systems, of eternal truth streaming upon us light and heat, glory, beauty, and inspiration! Behold the finite broadening all around us, within whose scope is life and duty and present opportunity to pursue our ideal and fulfil our aim, whose limits yet we have never found and know not but they slope off with all our hopes and possibilities deathless into the Infinite! The Universe is our temple; and the True, the Beautiful, the Good, are the adorable Godhead we worship!

Is not this a religion we have to teach our children? And shall we suffer it in our hands to be fruitful only of negations? Thrilling affirmations arise from it, could we only see and feel them! In our keeping shall we allow such a religion to grow cold and to become unclothed of beauty and grace? No historic or traditional religion is so full of warmth and glow as free religion, none blushes with half so many lasting charms and attractions. Shall we permit it to go forth that we as radicals have only doubts to suggest, only insoluble problems to propose? The fact is, that only those who have adopted the scientific method in religion have anything like knowledge for the basis of their belief, or are given to feel that the path they tread is every day bristling with fresh and firm convictions. But are we willing to allow it to be generally understood that what knowledge and conviction we have gained lead only to atheism in religion and materialism in philosophy? Let those admit this who will or who must. Honesty shuts the mouth of criticism. In free religion each is free to come or to go to whatsoever conclusions are to him inevitable, without losing the fellowship and the respect of his co-thinkers and seekers. But for one I am not slow to say, that until the must shall come to me the will is not likely to be present to believe in atheism or materialism. Nor do I believe that the sure sweep and tendency of modern free religious thinking is in this direction. Our children, I am convinced, are not reserved for this result of our thought. The high faith possesses me, that our daring explorers into the polar regions of scepticism will eventually find a passage into an open sea and clean around the utmost verge of denial, so as to be able to connect life with immortality and to find the warm heart of Love as well as the strong hand of Law present everywhere.

Yes: we have something positive to teach our children, something noble and beautiful to invite them to. We will teach them to love Truth, to worship Beauty, to be and do Good. And so long as we and they are social beings, we shall need to impart to them this instruction by social methods. To do it wholly by home instruction will not be possible. Free Religion, in order to meet all the wants of man, must have its free Worship, its free spiritual Cultus, its free Sunday Meeting for the young as well as the old. This it must furnish, or in the end be weighed in the balance and found wanting. With all its gettings may it get understanding—understanding of the true nature and wants of man; for the religion which is to stand, is to be built upon man, by man, and for man.

It was not my purpose now to suggest any "plan" for the organization or conduct of radical Sunday-schools, but only to consider the question whether there could be or should be such. I believe both that there can be and that there ought to be. There is the need of them in the social-religious nature of our children; and there is the possibility of them in the fact that free religion furnishes ample contents for such instruction.

A. W. S.

INSIDE OR OUTSIDE.

A friend of mine once went upon the staff of a certain influential newspaper; and I said to another correspondent of the same paper that I was glad, for the new-comer, being a strong man, would modify the paper and make it more valuable. "No!" said the other; "a newspaper is stronger than a man; and you will see that this paper will modify him more than he will change it." And so it proved.

If a newspaper thus insensibly modifies those who belong to it, so does a sect or a church. So long as a man remains inside, he can no more ignore the influence around him, than a man can ignore a malaria; his perceptive organs may not recognize it, but every drop of his blood feels it all the time. The longer I live, the less faith I have in reforming any superstition from the inside. An organized superstition is always stronger than a man, till the man stands out from it. Remain in the Roman Catholic Church for instance, and talk reform as boldly as you will,—the Church is stronger than you are and will mould you more than you can change it. Leave it, and you are strong, until you surrender yourself into the hand of some feeble church, less Holy, less Catholic, but scarcely less exacting. Even the most progressive Christian sect is like a French revolutionary party, which is apt to end by re-establishing the throne, if it can, and sitting on it.

I can remember when the Unitarian and Universalist bodies in America were aggressive and reformatory organizations, at least in their avowed attitude, if not in their real principles. If they were declared to be outside of the great Evangelical body, they joyfully accepted the attitude, and said "Certainly! so much the better." Now their whole attitude is beseeching and apologetic. The Universalist editors complain that they are not included in the Christian Associations, when they too believe in the atonement and the divinity of Christ. Dr. Bellows boasts that in a circle of Evangelical people, the other day, he was the only man who stoutly believed in the miraculous birth of Jesus! The highest laurels of a Unitarian or Universalist minister are now attained when he is allowed to exchange with some Methodist or Congregational "brother," or sit among the recognized clergy at some Evangelical festival.

But if it is thus desirable to be almost Evangelical,—to come so near it that the Congregationalist or the Advance can hardly see the distinction,—why is it not better to be quite Evangelical, and done with it? Why spend money and brains and energy in keeping up so slight a distinction? Is it worth having Associations and Conventions and all sorts of elaborate machinery, merely that Dr. Bellows may keep up a little separate popedom of his own, where he can believe in the miraculous conception and be happy? Why should he not go into the Evangelical Alliance with all the other Protestant popelets, and have a good time of it?

I knew a wit who used to declare that nothing was so good as turtle-soup, except mock-turtle. But I confess my sympathies are more with the Huntingtons and Osgoods and Hepworths, who after years of mock-turtle—still putting a good face upon the matter all this time and vowing, like the Marchioness over her lemon-peel and water, that "if you make believe very hard, it's quite nice!"—finally make a strike for the real article, and live upon the flesh pots of Egypt ever after.

There is something debilitating in the very air of a sect; and the sects in which this is most apparent are naturally those which are smallest, newest and least self-asserting. But the widest name among them all—that of "Christian"—is itself debilitating, after one has outgrown the possibility of seeing in Jesus anything but a man. This is, in these days, the turning-point of every one's religious attitude, and must be settled long before we get to those profounder problems of Prayer and Creation and Immortality which the sciences of the day would force upon us. Before we can think, to any purpose, on those or any other matters, we must settle the preliminary question whether we have a right to think for ourselves at all. If we call ourselves "Christians," we have no such right, because we must always ask first, "What did Christ think?" The most radical Christian sects can go but little farther than the most conservative; and will soon lose the original vigor of their protest. It is not because they are organizations that they are debilitating, but because they are organizations founded on the memory of a mortal man, instead of on the Eternal Truth. While such are the organizations, we are better off outside.

T. W. H.

THE INDEX AND THE F. R. A.

If the relation between THE INDEX and the Free Religious Association has not been hitherto understood, the fault can not be imputed either to the editor of the former or the secretary of the latter. But it is likely to be understood better since the attitude recently taken by the paper. The call for organized action against palpable abuses is the natural and necessary result of the editor's first public declaration, that Christianity is a gigantic system of oppression, the overthrow of which is as important to the welfare of a republican society as was the abolition of chattel slavery. He announced early his determination to work for that end, and he is doing it with all the forces at his command. THE INDEX is his organ, as the Liberator was the organ of Mr. Garrison. It is a battle cry and a sword. It summons earnest men to a great conflict with an armed foe; earnest men respond to the call as they did to that of the strong anti-slavery champion. Money came in from the tolling and the poor. Those who feel themselves to be victims of oppression, and those who pity the sufferings that such victims endure, rally to the crusader's standard. THE INDEX is sustained because it means work.

The Free Religious Association has thus far kept itself within the intellectual, one may even say the speculative, sphere. It has projected no operations looking towards practical reform in the religious usages and institutions of the community. It has formed no league, it has inaugurated no agitation. Its aim has been to present the case of free versus sectarian religion in open discussions before public meetings. It has had no organs for the one reason, among others, that it had no use for organs in the usual acceptance of the term. The spirit of organization did not belong to it. It was afraid of doing too much lest it should become a sect, and commit itself to ways its very existence pledged it against. It was persuaded that there was by far too much doing, and was anxious that men should keep hands off rather than lay hands on. Give all opinions a fair chance! was its motto, so far as it had one. Room for the intellect; fair play for the mind! was its cry. It made war on nothing but the principle that prevented faiths from meeting on equal terms, comparing notes, cancelling claims, forming alliances, strengthening sympathies, arranging combinations. It made war on no religion, called no faith foe.

Such a position was difficult to explain and difficult to keep. The general public was not interested in it. The elements of popularity were all wanting. There was nothing in its call to stir the blood, kindle enthusiasm, or awaken interest. Its treasury easily held all the money that came in; it is not straining the truth to say that it might have held more without brimming over. The Association made its appeal to thoughtful, earnest, and somewhat cultivated minds, who could enjoy wide views and were interested in ideas and loved to be active at the speculative centres of reform; and such minds are apt to be contemplative rather than practical in external ways. If it had been in possession of larger material resources, it might have accomplished a good deal more in legitimate and characteristic directions; it would have held more conventions, printed more pamphlets, published or at all events assisted in the publication of books, lent aid to instrumentalities that were pushing its own projects in different parts of the country. For the want of funds it has been seriously crippled, to an extent that has made the justification of itself impossible. If it had been rich, it would have been much more difficult to hold its position than it has been, for then it would have been tempted to undertakings that might have compromised its essential principle. From that danger poverty has delivered it.

Whether it will be wiser hereafter for the Free Religious Association to abandon its original purpose and take the field actively as a spiritual emancipation society, striking in with the editor of THE INDEX as a religious-reform organization, it is not worth while here to consider. This is for the managers of the Association to decide. While the position remains as it has been and is, much of the criticism on the Association, passed by people who complain of its inefficiency, backwardness, and dulness of moral perception, is misplaced. The managers carry out the intentions of the organization as their means allow. If their means were increased, they would do much more. That they cannot accomplish all they desire is to be regretted, for such work as they do is good, honest work, valuable in the department of knowledge and thought directly, and valuable indirectly in the department of usage and institution. THE INDEX and the Free Religious Association work for the same ends though on different lines; they approach the same centre though from opposite points. Each needs its particular friends and co-adjutors; and yet in a general sense the friends of either are the friends of both. It is a fair question whether each does not require the other to perform thoroughly the great task of effecting a deep-seated religious reformation.

O. B. F.

CASES AND METHODS OF HEALING.

A very interesting collection of essays is that entitled, "Médecine et Médecins, par E. Littré, de l'Institut et de l'Académie de Médecine." M. Littré is a medical amateur well known to physicians as the compiler of a valuable medical dictionary. Two or three of the first essays have a remote bearing on theology, by their discussion of those cures effected by means claimed to be supernatural. In treating these warmly disputed themes, M. Littré happily unites the severe method and searching analysis of a scientific positivist with the tender poetic reverence for the religious sensibilities of past ages. He gives valuable hints of the relation between science, based on experiment, and the instinctive feelings of humanity which have often secured a beneficial result without understanding the means which produced it. We are interested in his pathological study of the time-revered demon of Socrates, and of the modern mysteries of spirit-rappings and table-turnings.

But the most interesting of these analyses is that of the cures effected by touching the bones of St. Louis, which he entitles, Un Fragment de Médecine Rétrospective. These phenomena occurred in the year 1282, and M. Littré analyzes the evidence of their existence and shows it to be as complete as any that we could reasonably expect for occurrences so remote. There is even the best of all proofs of the sincerity of the narrators; namely, that they relate circumstances not at all favorable to the miraculous theory of these cures, but perfectly in harmony with a rational explanation of them. One author quotes the old account of several cases of a similar character; and, analyzing the symptoms, shows them to be perfectly in accordance with the known laws of medicine, as instances of the rupture of certain pathological attachments which prevented the free use of the limbs, which rupture was caused by a strong mental impression. All the subsequent symptoms of continued debility and imperfect action coincide with this view of the case.

But now comes an interesting question. Since this act of faith was necessary to the cure—for the mere wish of the patient was plainly not sufficient—what means has science at its command to replace these methods which it does not accept as rational? Can we educate our generation to such faith in the curative forces of Nature, that such effects can be produced without any superstitious belief? We all know that many such cures of bed-ridden patients have been made by sudden fright or the necessity for unusual exertion. But until the scientific physician can find means under his control to influence the will and through it the muscles as powerfully as superstitious faith does, will not the public, both enlightened as well as ignorant, resort to all those irregular and absurd methods of cure which in their abuse work out great evil in the community?

That the prospect is not hopeless, a case which occurred within a year in a hospital will serve to show. A young woman had kept her bed, without apparently sufficient physical cause, for some time, and when urged to exert herself would reply, "Don't you think I would get up if I could, when I have myself to support, and my dear old mother dependent on me?" Here seemed moral motive enough; yet it was not sufficient to move the muscles. By the help of ladies interested in her case, she was placed under the care of a well educated woman physician, in a woman's hospital. Mild tonics and friction were administered, and after a little time she was gently but firmly commanded to rise and walk. She protested in vain; the order was imperative. She rose and walked across the room. Her walks were gradually increased, until she went out into the street and finally walked half a mile. Returning in summer to her country home, her power of will seemed again to fail her; and she applied anew at the hospital to be put under the same control which had proved so beneficial to her.

With a more thorough knowledge of the higher functions of life, which must result from free, intelligent study of all the forces of Nature, will there not come to us a faith in the constant laws of Nature which are only the methods of Divine Power, which will be as potent to heal and bless as faith in miraculous and abnormal powers has ever been? E. D. C.

LONDON LETTER.

THE DEAD EMPEROR—REAL CAUSE OF HIS DEATH—THE NEMESIS OF A FAITHLESS LIFE AND OF MURDERED HEARTS OVERTAKES HIM AT LAST.

LONDON, Jan. 16, 1873.

There is a story told by the Persian poet Nizami—of the twelfth century—of two physicians who dwelt in the same house, and who from being friends became enemies. As the feud grew deadly, one of these physicians prepared a draught which, though nectar to taste and sight, was a fatal poison. This he sent to his antagonist, who, thinking it a sign of returning affection, drank it. Meanwhile, the other, wishing really to win back his rival, sent him a rare and beautiful flower. The physician who had received the draught and drank it, feeling that he was poisoned, used an antidote and recovered. "He burnt like the moth but found his wings again." Of this recovery, however, the intended murderer knew nothing when he received the flower. This he smelt; but, learning that it was sent by his antagonist, concluded that its fragrance was fatal. Conscience-stricken, he swooned and died of affrighted imagination under the breath of an innocent flower. The poet adds: "Of all the many-colored flowers that grow in the garden of the world, only one hath such potency—the red drop from a wronged heart."

There is reason to believe that Napoleon III.—after escaping the bullets so often aimed at him—has at last died of simple terror. By this time, you have no doubt read in America the conflicting statements and arguments which the eminent medical men who had charge of the case, and other distinguished physicians, have laid before the public. It has been the conclusion of these high authorities, that the operations performed by Sir Henry Thompson were skilful beyond precedent, and that a successful issue might naturally have been expected. The death, merely as the result of either the calculus or the operation, could not, it is confidently affirmed, have occurred naturally as it did or when it did take place. But there have been other facts freely asserted in well-informed private circles, which have not been published. If these facts be true—as I believe them to be—those "political considerations" which so continually invested this man with falsities during his life have also shrouded him in death. It is affirmed that, after the operation alluded to, the Emperor was so much better that on the very morning of his death, and only two hours before that event, he arose from his bed without assistance, and without aid returned to it. The surgeons, finding him so much better when they arrived, thought it a fit time to propose another operation. So soon as this proposal was made to him, Napoleon became livid with terror; his pulse sank, his heart declined, and he died.

The portrait which Kinglake has drawn of Louis Napoleon in the Crimea—turning pallid and fairly green with fear—is that which his adherents have always dreaded most. That portrait was furbished up again, before the public eye, after the cowering surrender at Sedan. That of the two most distinguished descendants of Napoleon I., one during the Franco-German war (Prince Napoleon) should have sought a retreat in Italy, and the other, after climbing to a throne over massacred human beings, should have died of terror at the thought of two minutes of agony, is a conclusion that Bonapartism will never allow to be formed in the public mind if it can be prevented. But, fortunately for the truth, physicians are as jealous for their reputation as imperialists. Hence we find that the Lancet, in an article which is certainly in part inspired by Sir Henry Thompson, says: "To a patient with a weak heart and poisoned blood, few things are more dangerously depressing than the endurance of severe physical pain and the expectation of a succession of aggravations of it by surgical operations." The italics are mine. It is to be remembered that we have the testimony of Professor Lee, of Paris, that in July, 1870, the danger was recognized, but "political considerations" prevented its being mentioned to the emperor; and that we have the testimony of Sir Henry Thompson that in October last the patient refused to permit a painful examination which, had it been then made, might probably have saved his life.

Now this is the condition to which a coup d'état and twenty years of cruel despotism had reduced a naturally courageous man. None can doubt that the invader of Strasbourg and of Boulogne was a brave man. None can doubt that the revolutionist of the Carbonari, who fought for Italian freedom, was a man of courage. Whence then this faintness? But one flower hath such deadly potency, says Nizami—"the red drop from a wronged heart." Many "red drops" from murdered hearts were the flowers of death scattered around this man. Kinglake relates the story that, on the night before the famous 2d of December, one of the conspirators against the Republic shrank from action; but General Fleury "got into a room alone with the man who wanted to hang back, and then, locking the door and drawing a pistol, stood and threatened his agitated friend with instant death if he still refused to go on." It is believed that this shrinking conspirator was Louis Napoleon himself. Conscience had already begun its work; but, the noble fear of doing wrong conquered, there was left only that ignoble fear which could never again act without reference to a possible pistol held at his head, or at that of his dynasty.

I once heard Mazzini say, that the chief power of Louis Napoleon to hold France down through such a length of time lay in the long experience he had gone through as one of the very class with which he had mainly to deal as a despot. He had been, like them, a republican and an insurrectionist; he knew their watchwords, their aims, their secrets, their hiding places; above all he knew their weaknesses, and just how he might tempt this one and that one to sell his soul and betray his friends and their cause. This graduation from the slums of New York to the Tuilleries represented certainly immense resources; and it is known that in the subversion of the Republic he was the plotter, the skilful schemer, of every detail. But, if the true life of this man is ever written, it will, I suspect, be shown that among the victims that fell on that day of massacre there was slain also, in his own better nature, a man who might have been a romantic, if not a heroic, figure in Europe. Some of your readers may have got hold of that wild romance entitled "Rumor," written by the Jewess who lived in the family of Disraeli, until her death—Elizabeth Shepherd. In it Louis Napoleon figures under the name of "Porphyris;" and it is a subtly-drawn picture with, I believe, much truth in it. We see him there in his dismal London lodging with an engraving before him representing the Paris of his vision—Paris grown into paradise. One feels that he is looking upon a transcendentalist, on whom some Black Crook fairy has thrown a spell that he must move on all fours. There is a very interesting book in German also, Riehl's Wanderungen, in which the early days of Louis Napoleon are really described. There we find that he was, while studying at Augsburg and Hofwyl, a fair specimen of a German student fond of poetry, claiming to be an idealist and especially devoted to Schiller's works. (That same Schiller who wrote, "Follow the dreams of thy youth!") But the Black Crook waves her wand,—it bears the name "Napoleon" on it,—and all the visions for man, all the dreams, become mere tinsel framing the face of one man—himself. Europe gave itself to be his pedestal for near a score of years; so much all honorable hearts must with shame confess sitting beside France in her sackcloth and ashes. But let it be also set down by all recording angels, that, under sentence of Europe, Emperor and Empire are seated up in the wall of a little Catholic church of Chiselhurst village.

M. D. C.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

OCCASIONALLY, for five or six years, a little sheet called The Communist has been coming to my address. It is printed in St. Louis. The publisher seems to have had no easy time in keeping it alive; and one reading it might exclaim: "What a hopeless task!" But, says the editor: "No; the principle of Communism is right and therefore must prevail." Not to admire the simple faith of such people would be impossible. For one, I care little how insane their project may appear: that they are such willing captives of an idea, and so cheerfully sacrifice time and means, and pocket the world's opprobrium, is to my mind their title to great respect; and if I find myself turning away from their often times disagreeable, nasal-toned harping on their to them all-absorbing theme, not infrequently I check myself and say, "What; can you not suffer a little for the sake of sincerity, if nothing more?" It is more pleasing perhaps to read this little sheet than it would be to listen to the man himself. His appeal for a "Community" is all earnestness, and he seems not to feel a ray of doubt falling on his project from repeated discouragements. The standing impossibility I see in the way of success is the getting hold of real saints: for sinners will quarrel. Communism would seem to require a wonderful self-forgetting. And the history of such attempts as I have read make the fact of failure almost a certainty. But aside from the possibility or impossibility of the scheme, there is a prior objection. Who desires, or ought to desire, the practical extinction of his own individuality? To "own all things in common," is much like a whole family eating soup out of one bowl. To be sure the several members might satisfy hunger, and keep themselves fat and happy. But isolation, privacy, private ownership of self and outfit, is essential to a self-respecting individuality. The tenacity with which most people cling to their own tooth-brush suggests a principle which has indefinite applications.

TURNING OVER another little sheet which lies on my table—The Word—I find a no less earnest advocacy of social reform from a directly opposite view. Not Communism but individualism. Mr. E. H. Heywood conducts this journal at Princeton, Mass. The Word favors the abolition of speculative income, of woman's slavery, and war government; regards all claims to property, not founded on a labor title, as morally void, and asserts the free use of land to be the inalienable privilege of every human being: one having the right to own or sell only his service impressed upon it. Not by restrictive methods, but through freedom and reciprocity, The Word seeks the extinction of interest, rent, dividends, and profit, except as they represent work done; the abolition of railway, telegraphic, banking, trades-union, and other corporations charging more than actual cost for values furnished, and the repudiation of all so-called debts, the principal whereof has been paid in the form of interest. In this number of The Word there is a translation of Henri de St. Simon's Parable, in which, "on the supposition that France were to-day to lose three thousand men most competent in learning, science, art, commerce, and the mechanical trades, it is said she would then be a body without a soul. On the contrary, should all the nobility, officers of the crown, cabinet ministers, marshals, cardinals, archbishops, judges of courts, and the ten thousand of French subjects who live the most sumptuously on their revenues," die, the loss would "occasion a grief that would be sentimental only," for there would be no real evil to be apprehended, as it would be no real evil to fill the places vacated. I have not space in which to follow all the intimations of the sweeping revolution in social life which this little sheet contains. I find, however, that it has quite a constituency of young and old, all of whom have a most royal yet good-natured contempt for our civilized Christendom, which Josiah Warren is pleased to call "civilized cannibalism." It fills in the corners with sentences like this: "Theology is the art of talking about what nobody knows."—Brougham.

TO ENTER THOROUGHLY into anti-theological atmosphere, one has but to take up the Investigator. But the copy I have before me contains a piece of news that is rather startling, and I know not now but Thomas Paine and the old Investigator will suddenly rise into general respectability. Is it possible that the "De'il" is after these out-and-out infidels in genuine Orthodox fashion? At any rate, here comes a bequest of land by a man in California valued at one hundred thousand dollars. "Paine Hall" is to be completed, and infidel publications and lectures are to abound. Well, I don't feel sorry, for one. But I say, may "infidelity" as courageously bear prosperity as it has done adversity! If the evil old One has really an eye upon Mendum, Seaver, and company, let him be cheated!

Just as I had settled into the belief that Woodhull and Claflin were pretty effectually muzzled and off the stage for years to come, their proscribed weekly comes to my address and proves to be as bold and defiant as ever. I have not followed up the facts in regard to the seizure of this periodical by the government, but I certainly have been suspicious of its action. As near as I can make out, it will be a very free construction of the law if the charge of "obscenity" made against Woodhull and Claflin is sustained. Mrs. Woodhull writes: "The well-known law of obscenity is that a thing must be obscene upon its face; that is, it must be an obscene picture, or there must be words in and of themselves obscene. Against this well-established construction of law the representative of the United States Government offered the new construction—that anything, be it book, paper, or what not, that in the opinion of the government tended to demoralization, was obscene, and it was the duty of the government officials to suppress them." If this be true, the decision to be rendered has an important bearing upon what we call the "liberty of the press" generally. If government is to decide what is "demoralizing," rather than what is "obscene," the case wears a new aspect. The desire to "Christianize Indians" may spread to include some who are not Indians. No timid shrinking from Mrs. Woodhull's "free love" should blind any one to the real merits of the case. It is not long since government decided that a publication called The Monthly Voice, published somewhere in New Jersey, was not of sufficient importance to be transmitted free, and the poor editor had to increase his poverty by paying postage. Had government a right to do this thing? I think not. It was, however few there were to lament the loss of The Monthly Voice, in point of law a high-handed outrage. So let the subject have full and impartial consideration.

THE PROSECUTION OF WOODHULL, CLAPLIN, & Co. appears to be creating a re-action in their favor. Here in Boston a strong feeling is arising in protest against the shutting of Mrs. Woodhull out of Music Hall. As it was said of Parker, so her friends are taking up the cry, "She shall be heard in Boston." And I doubt not that at no distant day they will carry their point. For one I trust they will. Let her be heard! If her doctrines are pernicious, will not the public discover it as well as our worthy mayor? Isn't that our hope, our trust, our sheet-anchor? Music Hall locked up for one night preaches a doctrine worse than all the Woodhulls could proclaim in a century. Why is the hall refused? "Because a woman wants to go there and say something bad." Immediately the imagination of a whole country is at work, and a bad picture, the worst possible, is painted and passes current as the text of the "new gospel." Well; is the effect the less disastrous? I think the lady better be left to speak for herself, and if she have no foot-hold on the moral conscience of the people, she will most certainly fall through and disappear. In a republic there is nothing so fatal as fear. America expects every man and woman to think freely and decide well. If she doesn't, more's the pity.

MR. ANNOT has had a very cordial reception in Boston the last week; speaking twice for the Parker Society, at several League meetings, at the Second Radical Club, and giving his lecture in the Horticultural Hall course. His discourse on "Individualism" created a real enthusiasm. Very good reports were printed in the morning papers. If THE INDEX were large enough, I should like from time to time to send many such slips for its columns.

OUR PUBLIC LIBRARY—the reading room—was open Sunday afternoon and evening. The question is settled. Puritan Boston has outgrown the traditional Sunday.

A well-known Connecticut clergyman had a deacon who insisted upon leading the singing at the prayer-meetings. He was a great blunderer, and he sang all the sad and melancholy tunes he could think of. The hymn was given out—

"I love to steal a while away."
The deacon began, "I love to steal," to Mear, where he broke down. He started with Dundee—"I love to steal." The third time he commenced and broke down; when the pastor arose and gravely said: "I am sorry for our brother's propensity. Will some brother pray?"

The time is approaching when it will be generally perceived that, so far from science being opposed to religion, true religion is, without science, impossible.—Sir J. Lubbock.

New ideas do not gain ground at once, and there is a tendency in our mind to resist new convictions as long as we can.—Max Müller.

Literary Department.

NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS.—All books designed for review in these columns must be addressed to THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

GESCHICHTE DES DEUTSCHEN VOLKSSCHULWESENS VON KARL STRACK. (History of the Elementary Schools in Germany, by Karl Strack.) Gutersloh, 1872. 8vo. pp. v. 488.

The history of the common school system of Germany is of great importance to all persons who desire to become thoroughly acquainted with the historical connection of public schools with the Christian Church, and with the process of emancipation from that connection. To those who have not the time to read and inwardly digest the classical book of Dr. Heppel on this subject, in five volumes, the above volume will render most excellent service. It is not only condensation of the labors of Heppel and others, but contains also the fruits of independent investigation. Some idea of the character of the work may be formed from the general heads under which the material is arranged. There is a preliminary chapter on German Schools before the Reformation; then follow six chapters on what the author designates as the first period: "The Age of the Reformation," then six chapters on the second period: "The Dominion of Orthodoxy," and finally seventeen chapters on the period of "The Decline of Religious and Ecclesiastical Influence," which extends from 1740 to the present time.

The character of the schools in Germany was in the beginning purely and exclusively ecclesiastical. The main interest which the Reformers, who were all zealous for the instruction of the people, had in the lower or so-called German or People's Schools, was the outgrowth of their desire to propagate and preserve what they regarded as pure religious doctrine. An extract from the School Ordinance of Nordhausen, issued in the year 1583, will give an insight into the whole system, as originally constituted. It reads as follows: "As the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, all our scholars are to suffer themselves to be so educated that they may know God aright, fear him and love him; that they may be heartily and in true faith devoted to the true religion, which is founded upon the Scriptures; that they may know the main points of our Christian doctrine, from Luther's catechism and books in harmony with it; that they may diligently call upon God, never neglect or despise the daily prayer before and after the lessons, nor ever during the same disturb others by laughing, talking, or in any other manner, each one repenting his prayers aloud, with devotion, and in a standing position. They are to avoid, as is becoming, all blasphemy, cursing, swearing, imprecation of evil, contempt of divine service, Epicurean speaking, and all ridiculous misuse of the Bible or passages therefrom. They shall always walk two by two modestly into church, taking the places assigned them by the teachers, and go out in like manner. When they are in church, they shall diligently and devoutly sing and listen to the sermon, shall mark the contents thereof, writing down the principal points; at the name of God or Christ take off their caps and bow; not talk, sleep, run, laugh, nor come too late, nor go out before the close." In many cases it was expressly directed that the Catechism should be "beaten into" the children (eingebäuet).

All other studies, even in the higher schools, were subservient to the study of religion, and they were all pursued from the religious point of view. Melancthon, for example, recommended the study of history on the following grounds: "1. Because God in his immeasurable goodness had revealed himself and willed that these revelations should be written down; 2. In order that the books of the prophets might be better understood; 3. For the purpose of correctly estimating the most important ecclesiastical controversies; and 4. Because by this means one was enabled to compare the history of the Church of God with the history of non-Christian peoples." It was his opinion that "in the history of the heathen manifestations of the divine wrath were everywhere to be seen, while in the history of the Christian Church there were, besides the out-breakings of wrath, exhibitions of divine grace." Even the mathematics were treated from a religious point of view. "Arithmetic," said a teacher in the Magdalenum at Breslau, "is useful in prayer; for when we pray, we pray to the true God. Now it is arithmetic which makes us acquainted with the words 'three' and 'one.' Again, we speak of the first, second, and third person in the trinity—also words which arithmetic teaches us to understand. Mathematics teaches us to count the years, and that from the creation of the world. If this can be done, the world must have been created; and thus the assertion of the pagan Aristotle that the world is eternal is refuted." Notwithstanding all this the same authority was of opinion that it was even possible to sin against arithmetic, for the reason that David had sinned in numbering the people.

In all the sums it was the universal custom to take the examples from the Bible. In a book by Lucas Lessius may be found, for instance, the following example in Division: "If it would have taken 200 pennyworth of bread to feed the 5000, how much bread would each one have received?" So in Multiplication: "If at the marriage in Cana each of the stone water-pots held 2 measures, how much did they all contain? How much if each held 3 or 4 measures? If we estimate each measure at 30 cans, how many cans of wine did the Lord furnish to the wedding guests?" Under the Rule of Three the same example comes up again, and the cost of the wine is calculated. Suetonius, prebendary at Breslau, used so many examples from the Bible in his large work on arithmetic, that the index of the passages cited filled 48 pages. An idea of the character of the school-books used in the seventeenth century may be gathered from their titles. A fair example of a large class of them is the following, by Joh. Cyriacus Höfer: "The Heavenly Way, or How a child can learn in 24 Lessons to escape Hell and attain to eternal bliss: containing 735 Questions and Answers, in which all the Articles of the Christian Doctrine are comprehended."

It ought to be said in regard to the Rev. Mr. Strack, that he himself is a School Commissioner and that he has no sympathy whatever with the attempt now making in Germany to separate the schools entirely from the jurisdiction of the Church. This fact, however, has not prevented him from giving a faithful and, on the whole, impartial delineation of the process by which the school has outgrown the tutelage of the clergy.

T. V.

PROTESTANTEN-BIBEL NEUEN TESTAMENTES. HERAUSGEGEBEN VON DR. PAUL WILH. SCHMIDT UND DR. FRANZ VON HOLTENDORFF. ERSTE HÄFTE. (Protestant's Bible of the New Testament. Edited by Dr. Paul Wilhelm Schmidt and Dr. Franz von Holtendorff. First Half.) Leipzig, 1872. 8vo pp. xxxi, 488.

The publication of this work is an exceedingly important undertaking. It is an attempt to place the results of the critical study of the books of the New Testament before the general reading public. The work comprises the text of Luther revised, with brief exegetical foot-notes, a general introduction to the whole, and special introductions to each of the separate books. The names of the contributors of the different articles and comments are as follows: General Introduction and the epistles to the Thessalonians, by Dr. Schmidt; the Gospels according to Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and the epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, and to Philemon, by Prof. Holtzman of Heidelberg; the Gospel according to John and the epistles of John by Oberpfarrer Späth, of Oldenburg; the Acts of the Apostles by Prof. Ziegler, of Berlin; the epistle to the Romans, together with a general introduction to the Pauline epistles, by Prof. Lipsius, of Jena; the epistles to the Corinthians by the Rev. Dr. Lang, of Zürich; the epistle to the Galatians by Prof. Holsten, of Bern; the epistles to the Philippians, and that of James, by Prof. Bruch, of Strassburg; the letters to Timothy and Titus by Prof. Pfeiderer, of Jena; the epistles of Peter and Jude, and that to the Hebrews, by Prof. Hilgenfeld of Jena; the Apocalypse, by Dr. Krenkel of Dresden. Some of these gentlemen are known as of the first rank among Biblical critics, and they are all of them members of the liberal "Protestant Union" of Germany. A more extended notice of the work itself shall be reserved until the concluding portion is received. Meanwhile it may be safely recommended to all who are seeking light concerning the composition and character of the New Testament writings.

T. V.

MYTHS AND MYTHMAKERS: Old Tales and Superstitions Interpreted by Comparative Mythology. By John Fiske, M. A., LL. B. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1873. [Toledo: Bailey & Eager.]

This volume consists of seven essays written separately and hardly intended to make a book, with organic connection and logical order. The essays taken as they were produced, and here reprinted, are both interesting and instructive; and if we can have nothing better on so important a subject, we may take this volume as very good indeed. But it cannot be doubted that Mr. Fiske, if he had started anew after making these studies, and had produced in consecutive order seven new essays on Myths and Myth-makers, would have done both himself and his subject far greater justice than in the volume before us, which he very justly calls a "somewhat rambling and unsystematic series of papers," which "touch briefly upon a great many of the most important points in the study of mythology." For popular reading, and to open the subject, this answers a very good purpose, and we can only wish the volume a very wide circulation; and can promise that it will entertain its readers, and will furnish them with a great deal of useful knowledge of the matter of mythology. Nevertheless, to have done full justice to the subject, and to his own knowledge of it, Mr. Fiske should have taken a new start where this volume stops, and unfolded in regular order the steps of myth-making. His last chapter, written two years later than the others, is now the one that should be read first, because in it is given, though hardly with distinctness and definiteness enough, the key to the subject. It is a chapter suggested by Mr. E. B. Tylor's "truly great and thoroughly entertaining" work on "Primitive Culture," and it brings out Mr. Tylor's explanation of the "spiritualistic" foundation of mythology and of primitive religion, yet does not sufficiently elucidate this, nor adequately point out its importance. For instance, Mr. Fiske, on the second page of this chapter, speaks of "detecting the hidden meaning of many a legend in which the powers of Nature are represented in the guise of living and thinking persons," as if "the secret of the myth-making tendency itself" were the thinking of the powers of Nature as personal beings. He goes on, in the same strain, to allude to "that primitive style of thinking to which it seemed quite natural that the sun should be an unerring archer," etc.; as though the sun's rays suggested arrows, and that an archer, and so the sun was thought of as a personal being. And in a note Mr. Fiske strongly declares that "the facts concerning primitive culture" show that "the dawn was originally regarded as a person." And on the eighth page of the chapter, Mr. Fiske again undertakes to make a start by saying: "Let us first note the ease with which the barbaric or uncultivated mind reaches all manner of apparently fanciful conclusions through reckless reasonings from analogy." But thus far the secret is not yet told; myth-making is not yet explained. It is only when savage experience of dreams and visions and trances is spoken of that we reach the real starting-point of mythology. Mr. Fiske sees this, but he does not make it plain enough, and he ought to have put it at the beginning of his book instead of at the end.

Mr. Tylor explains in an admirable manner the natural savage thought of ghost-souls, suggested universally by dreams. This ghost-soul was the first idea of a soul or spirit, and it is a universal idea of all races, as universal as sleeping and dreaming. The savage dreamer sees this other self of himself and his friends, and believes in it because he sees it. He sees also in dreams, the ghost-images of animals and of inanimate objects, and thus gives to everything a ghost-soul. This ghost-soul—of the sun, for example, or the lightning—be naturally makes like a human or animal ghost-soul; and in that way he comes to see in the objects of Nature living and personal ghost-souls. The blue heaven, for instance, he gives a ghost-soul to; and from calling the heaven the Father-heaven, he comes to thinking of the Father-heaven's ghost-soul as the Father in heaven. The theological term "Holy Ghost," and the theological idea of God as "personal," are survivals of this savage way of thinking. Mr. Fiske justly remarks that on the idea of the other self, or ghost-soul, seen in dreams, "is based the great mass of crude inference which constitutes the primitive man's philosophy of Nature;" and that "thus arises the belief in an ever-present world of souls or ghosts." Mr. Fiske also repeats Mr. Tylor's assertion that, in this sense of faith in spirits and another world (a world of spirits), no tribe of mankind has ever been found destitute of a religion. As Mr. Fiske puts it: "The existence of some tribe or tribes of savages wholly destitute of religious belief has often been hastily asserted and as often called in question. But there is no question that, while many savages are unable to frame a conception so general as that of godhood, on the other hand no tribe has ever been found so low in the scale of intelligence as not to have framed the conception of ghosts or spiritual personalities, capable of being angered, propitiated, or conjured with."

At the very end of his book Mr. Fiske has this passage, with reference to Mr. Tylor's study of mythology: "I think we have already reached a very satisfactory explanation of the genesis of mythology. Since the essential characteristic of a myth is, that it is an attempt to explain some natural phenomenon by endowing with human feelings and capacities the senseless factors in the phenomenon; and since it has here been shown how uncultured man, by the best use he can make of his rude common sense, must inevitably come, and has invariably come, to regard all objects as endowed with souls, and all Nature as peopled with supra-human entities shaped after the general pattern of the human soul,—I am inclined to suspect that we have got very near to the root of the whole matter." This is true; only it puts the cart before the horse. There is no such thing in the case as an attempt to endow senseless objects with human feelings. It comes to supposing that in senseless objects is a soul which is like a human or animal soul; but there is no such thing as an attempt to "endow" these objects with souls. The savage mind begins with an idea of human souls, as ghosts of the visible man, material after a fashion, but capable of almost any adaptation to form and place and circumstances. He then infers, as naturally as possible, that every object he sees has such a soul. Mr. Fiske speaks as if the savage tried to imagine a soul in a natural object, and thus gave it what he after all knew or might know it did not possess. That is not the case at all. The savage is as good a Positivist as Comte, or Mill, or Mr. Fiske. He rests his philosophy on induction from positive facts; and believes, not because he imagines, but because he thinks he knows. The phenomena of dreams are as real as possible to him, and the idea of human and animal ghost-souls, which he gets by what he positively sees in his dreams, is applied by him to explain natural objects without any help whatever from the endowing power of the imagination. It is a regular part of all savage life to cultivate dreaming, and trances, and visions. Necessity constantly imposes upon savages the long experience of fatigue and fasting which promotes dreaming dreams, and seeing visions, and having trances. Finding out the method, the use of it is voluntarily resorted to, and powerful drugs are culled in to aid the operation. Thus all the phenomena of our "spiritualism" are as familiar to savages always and everywhere as book-learning is to us. And on these phenomena they build a vast inductive philosophy of the universe, and a system of faith and practice. But the ground of the whole is the simple and natural doctrine of souls or ghosts; first of human beings and animals, and then of all other objects, up to the grandest objects or appearances of Nature; ending with the ghost-soul of the Father-heaven bending over us, which thus becomes a good Spirit-Father, or Father in heaven.

In thus bringing out, somewhat more distinctly than Mr. Fiske does, the exact way in which myths have started as stories of the souls of things, we do not detract at all from the value of Mr. Fiske's interesting essays. We but make the starting-point plainer; all the rest is amply satisfactory. A great number of facts are crowded into Mr. Fiske's pages, and explanations of their significance are clearly given. By careful study of these facts and suggestions, it will be made apparent to what an extent the vast growth of mythology was perfectly natural and served a great purpose in the education of the race; and how a great deal that we now believe is a survival from savage mythology, or a suggestion of truth which man reached in the first instance by the aid of mythology. The idea that originally the race had a revelation, and high knowledge based upon it, is forever swept away by these studies of the history of human ideas,—their rise under a system of mythology, their slow development, and their present marks of this development and origin. That man began very low, and has gained all that he now has by the natural use of his faculties, is one of the firmest conclusions of modern research. And comparison of all the myths of various races and peoples proves that the great subject of these stories has been the objects and appearances connected with sun and sky,—the heaven and its objects and changes. Sun-myths are the gospels of mythology; and numberless stories are traced back to some one of these sun-myths, as the reader of Mr. Fiske's volume will find clearly shown.

E. C. T.

PHILOSOPHICAL PAPERS.

VIII.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

THEISM AND EVOLUTION.

FROM AN ARTICLE ON "PHILOSOPHICAL BIOLOGY," IN THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, FOR OCTOBER, 1888.

The attempt of Mr. Spencer to put a mechanical interpretation upon all phenomena renders his assumption of universal comprehensiveness singularly inappropriate. The radical oneness of his philosophy becomes more and more apparent in proportion as it is unfolded. Aiming to formulate all phenomena as merely incidents in the redistributions of matter and motion, and thus to reduce them all to the operation of a single law deducible from the persistence of force, it betrays the narrowness of its fundamental idea more and more plainly in proportion to the increasing speciality of the phenomena it would explain. The persistence of force and the convertibility of its various forms are one thing; the actual identity of these forms is quite another thing. Philosophy requires the recognition of differences as well as of resemblances. The success or failure of Mr. Spencer's whole system turns on the answer which must be given to a very simple question,—whether mechanics, physics, chemistry, biology, psychology, sociology, ethics, rest on classes of facts respectively so unlike as to give rise to unlike classes of conceptions, or whether the class of facts on which mechanics rests can be regarded as furnishing all the conceptions necessary to the explication of all the other sciences. By going outside of mechanics to devise a theory of "organic polarity" Mr. Spencer has himself answered this question adversely to the claims of his own system. Clearly, each science has its own peculiar conceptions, derived from observation of peculiar facts; and the only scientific course is to avoid confusion of one class with another. The different sciences relate to phenomena which are intrinsically so dissimilar as not to admit of formulation in terms of any one science; to seek thus to formulate them is sheer waste of ingenuity and labor. In its attempt, therefore, to achieve the impossible lies the fatal weakness, the fundamental and irremediable mistake, of the entire "Synthetic Philosophy." That this estimate is justified by the spirit of positive science, and justifies in turn our inability to echo the unintelligent, because indiscriminating, praise which has been lavished on this philosophy by enthusiastic admirers, will appear by the following excellent canon, stated by a well-known disciple of Auguste Comte, and ably illustrated by him in the case of Liebig's chemical theory of food: "Never attempt to solve the problems of one science by the order of conceptions peculiar to another." We should have found less to criticize in Mr. Spencer's two volumes, if he had not attempted to solve the problems of biology by the order of conceptions peculiar to mechanics.

In Mr. Spencer's judgment of the general relative value of the two hypotheses of special creation and natural development we entirely acquiesce. But we think him quite mistaken in supposing that there is anything in the development theory at all irreconcilable with enlightened theism. In some form or other, gradual evolution in unbroken continuity is more and more widely assented to, as a probably true theory of the history of life on the earth. The philosophy, however, which is to rationalize and unify the phenomena of universal organic evolution must go deeper than Mr. Spencer has gone. Even waiving all objections to his "law of evolution," it remains true that the utmost he has done is to establish a general formula. But mere generalization of facts is the function of science, not of philosophy. If philosophy is possible at all, it must explain generalization by unity of cause. The questions, therefore, which must be answered by a genuine philosophy of evolution are, whether real causation can be known at all, and, if so, what are the real causes of evolution as a continuous process. Of these questions Mr. Spencer has given no adequate discussion; nor do we propose here to discuss them. But so much as this may be said. The more completely the process of organic evolution can be traced in detail, its obscurities dispelled, and its perfect unity brought to view; the more widely its relations to the general course of inorganic phenomena can be detected in their subtle ramifications; the more plainly the universe is shown to be permeated by unvarying, harmonious, and all-inclusive law,—so much the more does the entire system of Nature become admirably intelligible, and so much the greater becomes the probability of its origination in intelligence. If we grant to Mr. Spencer the demonstration of his thesis, that the "law of evolution" regulates all phenomena, he must grant in return that this is the best conceivable proof of Infinite Intelligence; for the cosmos becomes at once the embodiment of an omnipresent idea. If, as science advances, it continually discovers new adaptations and uniformities in Nature, then, although it may not be able to render a reason for everything, so many things are perpetually coming to light for which it can render a reason, that it becomes a fair induction to conclude that everywhere a reason exists. The stronger the evidence, therefore, that law is universal, and that universal law is intelligible, so much the stronger is the presumption that intelligence is Nature's root. When teleology is made to mean the direct and confident assignment of this or that motive for this or that natural adaptation, it may well be ridiculed as the bastard offspring of ignorance and conceit; but if it means only the supposition of omnipresent reason as the probable secret of omnipresent order, ignorance and conceit alone will ridicule it. The rationalist, far from imposing on Nature his own ways, is quite content to study reverently the ways of Nature; and, instead of "figuring to himself the production of the world and its inhabitants by a 'Great Artificer,'" as Mr. Spencer unintentionally caricatures theism, neither permits his imagination to deceive him with gross analogies, nor hesitates to accept with docility whatever science shall prove as to the true character of natural laws. But he is assuredly not so entangled in purely mechanical conceptions as to be incapacitated for rising to any higher idea of Infinite Intelligence than that of a Great Mechanic. Perceiving that mind is the noblest outcome of Nature, he sees in Nature itself the expression of that which is not less, but more, than mind,—the self-utterance of that which is not below him, but eternally and infinitely above; and in this supreme conviction he finds the open secret of the universe.

A clergyman at a recent Baptist Sunday-School convention said that he was called to the bedside of an old lady who expressed her dislike of the minister who had been visiting her, "because," she said, "he only bent one knee when he prayed, and the Bible says 'every knee shall bow.'"—Independent.

A young man in San Francisco found an old deacon he knew "bucking the tiger" in a gambling hell. "What," he exclaimed, "deacon, you here?" "Yes," was the reply, "I am bound to break down this evil institution."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errors.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

FREE RELIGION AND SOCIAL REFORM.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Friend,—Allow one who has read with great interest, and for the most part approval, your series of articles on the above subject, a brief criticism. Nothing could be finer than your thoroughly radical statements concerning the fundamental ideas of free religion; but it seems to me you fail to do justice to, if indeed you do not entirely misunderstand, the spirit of reforms.

You begin, for example, with a very complete definition of the object of all social reform as being "the amelioration and perfection of human life, by human means, here and now, and the prevention of all preventable evils by the removal of their causes." No reformer can find fault with that. But you proceed to say, that "modern reform, having no method applicable to all abuses, fritters itself away in playing at cross purposes with itself." "Too many reforms," say you, "are the defeat of reform." On the contrary, I am unable to see any of this clashing of which you speak, and am happy in seeing, as I think I do, that all good reforms, even when they know it not, help each other and altogether help free religion as free religion helps or should help them. Take two instances.

You say, "The social-evil reform endeavors to get rid of prostitution, while the free-love reform aims directly to increase it under a disguise." Here you do a great injustice to the free-love reform, and in so doing make a seeming antagonism. There may be people advocating free love who mean by it to increase prostitution; but I most earnestly affirm that the real, essential philosophy of the movement aims to make the relation of the sexes purer and truer than they have ever been and to decrease prostitution. That cannot be love which is not founded on freedom, and that love which is truly free is as far above promiscuity—nay, as far above the present status of marriage, which often is simply legalized prostitution—as is the eternal truth itself above falsehood. Now if this is so,—and there is neither time nor space at present to argue it at length,—this movement, instead of being antagonistic to, is strongly in sympathy with, the social-evil reform; and both, though working in different channels, have the same end in view.

Again, you say: "The peace reform proposes to abolish war, while the labor reform fomenta an antagonism between capital and labor, of which social war would be the natural outcome." Pardon me, but the man who makes such a statement as that cannot understand the labor movement. People used to say the abolitionists would cause a war between the North and South, and when the war came they were held responsible for it; but in truth they were only the engineers and firemen who pointed out the dangerous walls and sounded the alarm—the prophets who foretold, the wise philosophers who would have prevented. So here, labor reform is the abolitionist who tells of the slavery of poverty, of the unnatural and therefore unsafe social system which is every day making trouble between capital and labor more and more probable, more and more inevitable. It says, "Establish justice between man and man, secure through the working of natural causes a more equal distribution of wealth, that the antagonism between capital and labor may cease, and both live as brothers in harmony." Could anything be more consistent with the objects of the peace movement than this? Peace could not exist long in a nation of slave-owners. Neither can it exist long in a nation of labor-owners. Man must own himself and have a fair share of the good things of the world as well as of its duties, be he capitalist or laborer. This is the demand of justice, and justice is the foundation stone of peace. So we might go through with all the reforms.

The mistake you make (is it not?) is this,—that you hold the reforms responsible for the weakness of individual reformers. This course, I need hardly say, would be likely to kill any great idea that ever got a hearing. Must we not in justice ask rather, concerning each reform, Has it a philosophy? and judge it by that. For example, you say the labor reform relies on trades-unions as the sure means of redressing the wrongs of laborers; that these oppress all independent men who refuse to join them, exclude women from membership, perpetuate injustice towards the Chinese, and so forth. How unfair a statement! Suppose some labor reformers do rely on trades-unions, some trades-unions oppress independent men, exclude women; suppose they all do it,—does it therefore follow that the labor movement is narrow, extravagant, and unworthy of confidence? If you study its underlying idea, its philosophy, you will find that it means an entire re-organization of the existing social system; and how? Why, through the peaceful operation of natural causes; not by force, not by oppression, not by the exclusion of woman. The brains and heart of the movement—and they are what will finally prevail in this as in everything else—work for equity in all the relations of labor and capital, for women as for men, for Chinaman as for the native. Is that narrow? Is that an object unworthy the sympathy of, or in any way antagonistic to, the peace and free religious movements? But, you say, this and all other reforms are perpetually interfering with the natural order of things by legislation. Now what is proper legislation in behalf of a true reform? Simply this. The brute force, or shrewd cunning, of some men has enabled them to get the upper hand of some others, not so strong and shrewd, whom they have deprived of their natural right to that liberty which is essential to the broad education of which you treat so ably, or in other words to the fullest possible development of all their faculties. In so far as these their weaker brethren are concerned, therefore, they have suspended the operation of a natural law. Just here the reform steps in and proposes certain legislation. What is it? Why, it is society saying to these robbers of the rights of others, Hands off! It is the State exercising its trust, I had almost said its only legitimate function, that of protecting all its citizens in the largest liberty necessary to a full development of all their faculties.

You lay down with much clearness the four great fundamental ideas of free religion and then say, that the true origin of genuine reformatory movement must be sought in conscious or unconscious faith in them. It seems to me that it is so sought now, usually in unconscious faith. You say elsewhere, that all attempts to reform special evils must be brought to the test of these great ideas. Most certainly they must be; and, spite of all the weaknesses of their advocates, most certainly will a majority of them stand the test.

What then is the true relation of free religion and social reform? It seems to me most thoroughly friendly. Free religion is the grand super-structure in which each true reform is a separate apartment; or perhaps better still, it is the life-giving sap in the tree of true living, of which reforms are the twigs and branches. True, if the sap is stopped the twigs die; but I cannot help thinking that the tree will be less beautiful if you cut them off, supposing that all it needs is sap. By the presence and beauty of the twigs, I would detect the quality of the inward vital force. Free religion is fundamental. Reforms are outgrowths of its cardinal principles. Let them recognize their mutual dependence, work harmoniously together, and we shall travel faster than could otherwise be the case towards that essential wholeness of humanity which each in its way would serve.

Yours in the spirit which would seek truth, lead where it may.

F. A. HICKLEY.

RESULT OF CHURCH-GOING.

MR. ABBOT:—

I have felt an interest in understanding the tone of thought and feeling pervading the different churches around me, and have lately made quite a circuit in my attendance upon their services. They are all, I think, fair specimens of Orthodox and Unitarian denominations. The effect upon me has been an oppressive sense of their bondage to established and unquestioned beliefs, and of their crying need of the "Liberty and Light," and the practical stimulus and warmth, of "Free Religion." In formalism, superstition, and a species of idolatry, they impress me as differing in degree only from Catholicism or Paganism. Evidently, with minister and people, there is the principle, "if not having the feeling, to act as though they had." There is the formal reading of passages which, falling upon the ear for the ten thousandth time, have ceased to make any impression; the studiously bowed head; the solemn tones, and the dwelling upon stirring themes as verities, for the truth of which no satisfactory evidence can be given. The teachings seem almost fruitless, as it respects man's relations to this world; and, as the hearers go away, the question arises, What are they the better for all they have heard? In one instance, to be sure, where the discourse was in advocacy of church-going, one argument used was, that it made a man more respectable, enabled him to get a better position in business, and thus helped him to get on in the world more prosperously!

In the Unitarian Church, the impression produced differed from that of the Orthodox only in being less emphasized. Arguing in behalf of Christianity, it was said that some might be so elevated into the regions of absolute truth, so near the Father of all, that no need was felt of a Mediator; but that to the most of persons, suffering from a sense of errors, short-comings, and sins, the want was felt, and the Lordship and Leadership of Jesus Christ needed. The belief was expressed, that many of those who took their stand outside of Christianity were real Christians in spirit and aims, and were unconsciously indebted to Christianity for what they were; and it was confessed that they were doing more to carry forward Christian principles than most persons in the Unitarian body.

A. H.

AN EVENING WITH THE POSITIVISTS.

"Let us eat freely of the herb that produces sublime dreams," says an ancient Indian proverb. And so, believing that whatever of substantial benefit the philosophy of Comte may be destined to confer upon the world, it does at least nourish in its disciples the faculty of noble dreaming, we accompanied a friend on the first Saturday evening of the New Year, to a pleasant social meeting of the "New York Positivists." It was held in the pleasant parlors of an up-town house; parlors of which I may say in passing, that they bear abundant evidence that the tastes of their occupants do not run in prescribed conventional grooves. "I should know the people here were Positivists, or Platonists, or Pythagoreans, or something," was the whispered comment of a lady upon entering the rooms. It does not come about by accident when carpets are cabalistic, when tables suggest Petra and Pompeii, when gas-lights convey ideas, when pictures and bijouterie make you turn back to them again, yearning to read their whole secret; when the tout ensemble is unique and pronounced, without being in the smallest degree obtrusive or overdone.

Between thirty and forty people had assembled, perhaps half of whom were members of the society. After an invocation offered by the leader, to the "great spirit of Humanity," a sweet little babe—the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Croly—was presented to the society, christened Alice Carey, and dedicated in a few tender and solemn words to the service of the same august Humanity. Christening is the first of the nine social sacraments by which Positivists at different times assume and renew their allegiance to the Deity they serve. Toasts followed next, and were responded to by the members in short speeches,—all excellent, all stimulating to the moral sense, some rich in conceptions of beauty and ideality, some strong in practical suggestions. To report even a moiety of the good things said would require more space than THE INDEX could spare. Mrs. Croly's paper was a pithy and sensible response to a sentiment upon Domestic Service. In these days of invention, when domestic service is so simplified, lightened, and refined, there is no reason why women of culture should not find pleasure in giving it the attention it deserves, thus removing the friction and jar always caused in a household by incompetent service. A fine reading from Shakspere, by Professor Lyman, agreeably varied the proceedings, as did also the recitation of Sydney Dobell's tearful poem, "How's my Boy?" by a blue-eyed young positivist in short dress and hair—Miss Minnie Croly.

From Mr. Elderkin's response to the sentiment, "The New Priests—philosophers, men of science, and artists," we quote a few passages. After a statement that the Biblical traditions had lost their power over intelligent men and women, he adds:—

"The transcendental metaphysics of those who would retain the old form, giving words and ceremonies a new interpretation, takes no hold upon the people. There is a deficiency of substance, a subjective indefiniteness in their new interpretations of Christianity, which defeat all efforts to make it popular." "Although there is a quasi-allegiance to the old theological order, there is beneath it a governing power derived from another order of thought and action. The same instincts which impel a man east overboard to seek dry land for his feet, are impelling those who have been wrecked in the theological galleons to throw themselves upon the grounds of realized knowledge." "When the supposititious unknown quantity, which has so muddled all attempts at a rational organization of society, shall have been eliminated from men's minds, and it shall be recognized that we have only to deal with man and his environment, we may then hope for measures directly adapted to elevate the condition of the race." "All functions which co-operate in the elevation of man will be regenerated. Reason, imagination, and feeling will be brought into union. Science, poetry, and art will be devoted to the study and celebration of humanity. Science will acquire a position of unparalleled importance, as the sole means by which we come to know the Great Being, of which the present generation of men is but a continuation in time, and of which individuals are but infinitesimal organs."

At twelve o'clock a delicate feast of fruits supplemented the feast of reason; two or three more short speeches followed, in one of which Mr. Croly considered the relations of Capital and Labor; then a fervently uttered benediction closed this most enjoyable re-union.

There is something contagious in the earnestness of these people. Not that they make a parade of their enthusiasm, or that they seek to proselytize. On the contrary, they especially deprecate hasty and unripe conversions. They do not seek that their ideas shall pierce the world's consciousness from without, but rather penetrate it from within. "You cannot believe in a day or a week," they say. "It will seem hollow and shallow at first. Only time and culture lead us to see that there is nothing in the world but continuous man." The objective world is to them a bundle of relations, appearances, phenomena. We have no conception of it, they say, except as an exhibition of the forms of our own consciousness.

All this is far from being a captivating creed to the masses. And we are inclined to believe that few embrace it, or will for some years to come, save those upon whose lives the cold shadows of older theologies have fallen with exceptional gloom. But it is something to be drawn aside from the everlasting clamor about Rights, and shut in alone with thoughts of Duty. It is something to look calmly in the face of death, believing that time and space, being only a form of our thinking, will cease to exist for us when we die. It is surely better to believe that no life can be rightly and fully lived here, while the expectation of another exists, than to trust too much to a future existence for righting the wrongs and amending the neglects of this. It is better to strive to abide by the difficult motto, "Live for others and live without concealment," than to be too selfishly absorbed in one's own business, even though that business be the supposed "saving" of one's immortal soul.

The attitude of other materialists, at present, towards Positivism, reminds one of that of the bewildered school-men in the exquisite ballad, "Year Two Thousand and Ninety-nine." Gathering about the uncommunicative "goose-girl" who had retired into the hills to "watch the slow atoms fall from the grists of God," they question her:—

"Is it No, is it Yes?
Is it That, or is it This?
Labor or Idleness?"

And still the answer came:—

"—Meekly and low:
Not Thus, and not So,
Neither Yes nor No,
But, 'Come into God and see!'"

HELEN B. BOSTWICK.

NEW YORK, Jan. 1873.

SCIENTIFIC INQUIRIES.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

Please allow us to ask your scientific contributors the following question:—

Heat and cold, acting and re-acting on each other, seem to be equal partners and the common parents of all phenomena. Heat transforms the opaque into the transparent; cold reproduces the opaque from the transparent; water is converted into steam by heat, and steam to water by cold; and life in all its relations and conditions seems to be the effect of the reciprocal action of these two elements. The question we would ask is this: Are they principles or agents? If principles, does it not reduce the undulating theory to an absolute certainty; the reversion of the rule proving its correctness, the reaction balancing the action? If agents, from what source is their power of action derived?

Respectfully yours,
J. TINNEY.

WESTFIELD, N. Y.

TAKE IT BACK, BROTHER MORSE.

It is unfortunate that your "Evening Notes" should introduce themselves with such a damaging assumption (see THE INDEX of Jan. 4); and I cannot doubt that the revelations of "type and daylight" did at once, as you said they sometimes might, make you ashamed. Is it possible you consider your time and judgment of so much more value than those of the readers of THE INDEX, that you can deliberately print there your most hasty and uncultured thoughts, and even warn the readers beforehand that you intend to do so? The need of an organ for deliberate and careful utterance is so pressing, that THE INDEX has had to double its capacity. Its space is not yet so cheap that it needs padding of that kind. Will not many accept the estimate you make of your "Notes," and so pass them by as thoughts that will not live over night? If all readers do not so decide, it is because they have learned that at times something worthy falls from your pen, and so will seek it.

Had you not better write a new introduction, and start again on a sounder principle? Take time to look at the "Notes" by daylight; those that you then think are worth the postage, the labor, and the printer's ink, the reader will more confidently give his time to. The age and the cause THE INDEX seeks, we must all be agreed, are not served by random and thoughtless utterances. Is it not so? And is it not generally true that thoughts which are not worth a little elaboration, and a single exercise of judgment, are not worth their space in its crowded, earnest columns? E. C. L. B.

KEOKUK, Jan. 8.

[The readers of THE INDEX, I think, will by this time unanimously vote that Mr. Morse's "Notes" have thoroughly vindicated themselves from the modest disparagement which he made of them in the beginning. They have proved themselves to be "Notes" upon which there is little or no discount; and our friend "E. C. L. B." is now, doubtless, entirely willing to accept them as good currency."—A. W. S.]

"THE HEAD AND THE HEART."

In an article under the above caption, in THE INDEX of 28 December, Mr. Stevens speaks a few kind and earnest words in regard to science acknowledging the full place occupied by the heart in things religious. Now with all modesty it seems to me Mr. S. adopts a certain feeling prevalent among Christians, that religion must in a certain sense be of the heart. Things religious are either theoretic, or actual facts in the life of humanity. Indeed, are they not entirely of the mind? For instance, a person arrives at some new idea in regard to his relation to the laws of God, or Nature, moral or physical. At first, they are simply ideas; like an image suspended in mid-air, they are outside the person's actual life: he doubts or believes, examines the evidences and doubts again,—but still the idea remains as we might say suspended. Finally, by thought and careful watching, the person sees his idea connected with the actual facts of his daily life—in short, it becomes a fact to him. The first part of his experience is theoretic; the latter and the future become his actual life. But has not all been of the head, the intellect? I think this word heart is used too loosely. What is the heart? It is the blood engine of the body. Now while an idea of the mind does have an influence on the action of the heart, it is yet no part of the heart. Admitting the one is necessary to the other, still the heart may and does exist independent of much of any mind.

In conclusion, is not the scientific method going to have just the opposite effect to that inferred as its tendency by Mr. S.? Has not the so-called Religion of the Heart had a tendency to make religious things rather a suspended image outside the man; and is it not the tendency of science to cut the strings and drop them into the actual life of every one?

FRANK S. BILLINGS.

CHICAGO, Jan. 9, 1873.

THE MISSION OF SCIENCE.

[Letter from Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes to the New Yorkers banqueting Professor Tyndall.]

BOSTON, Jan. 23, 1873.

My Dear Sir,—I regret that it is not in my power to be present at the dinner which is to be given to our distinguished visitor. I have had great pleasure in meeting him and in listening to him while he was with us in Boston, and I should be most happy if I could join in the testimonial of respect you propose to offer him. We cannot over-estimate our debt to the men who give their lives to the sincere study of Nature. They are becoming more and more our leaders in this morning twilight of knowledge, this period of transition, when the eye is getting the better of the ear, the reason of the imagination, our trust in the established order of the universe of those terrors of the supernatural out of which have been forged the chains of thought and the weapons of tyranny. The mists are thick enough round us still, but we begin, under their guidance, to see the paths before us and to feel the firm ground on which we can place our feet. That we are not castaways upon our hungry planet, but rightful and royal heirs to all its possibilities; that we are framed, not to crouch, but to stand; not to shriek to the forces of Nature, but to command them; that the supreme source of order cannot be afraid of us or jealous lest we learn too much of the outer world in which we live, or of the inner world which lives in us,—all this is beginning to be felt as an element of the atmospheric intelligence of our time.

We cannot live to-day on the oxydated beliefs of the past. Faith is a bankrupt, and her accounts are under strict examination to determine what assets remain to be distributed among the impoverished souls that are her creditors. Science is attacking all she can lay hold of for the benefit of our common humanity and adding to it the new-born wealth she has created.

What quarrel can we have with the men who are restoring the human mind to the place from which a false humility has too long degraded it? Strange that those who find no term too opprobrious to apply to themselves and their sinful fellow-creatures, should borrow the Athanasian vocabulary to shrivel up the innocent hypothesis than man may possibly be entitled to quarter his coat with the ancestral bearings of one of the most intelligent of mammals. Strange that the homilist, who thinks nothing of calling a man a worm, should abuse the naturalist who suggests that the founder of the human family may perhaps have been an ascidian! The suggestion of the precatory ordeal as a test of supernatural interference with natural laws may have jarred upon those feelings of reverence which are never to be treated lightly. Yet we cannot but remember that this same ordeal was appealed to by one of the greatest of the Hebrew prophets, and sanctioned by a direct response from heaven.

We have with us one of those students of Nature whom the Inquisition would have delighted to burn, and the conclaves and councils would have gloried to anathematize. These are the oracles, the prophets of to-day. They are teaching us not merely the order of the heavenly movements, the constitution of the solar and the stellar atmospheres, the succession of geological changes, the stratification of the successive layers of humanity, the transformations of matter, the Proteus of Lord Bacon's essay, the vibrations of imponderable media, the metempsychosis of force, but something more than any specialized knowledge—to look for truth at first hand, and not be afraid of it when we have found it. In place of the record based upon that delusive maxim, quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus, which meant nothing but a tolerably constant and regular majority vote, modern science appeals to the facts of Nature capable of direct universal and perpetual verification. The opposition it meets with is only the friction that accompanies all movements, and the obliquity it encounters is only the squeak of friction.

We can trust the apostles of the new movement to take care of themselves, and we need not fear that any belief which is fit to live will ever die. All opinions disproved by the facts of to-day must certainly yield to that subtle process of interstitial decay and renovation by which the intellectual life of mankind is born again from generation to generation almost without knowing it. But we may be perfectly sure that there is not anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth, which can contradict the evidence that there is something higher than the firmament, and more stable than the solid continents, and deeper than the unbounded depths of the ocean—the law above all laws, which shows our reason what we ought to be, and commands our will in the authoritative accents of duty.

"Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong,
And the most ancient heavens by Thee are fresh and strong."

I am, dear sir, yours very truly,

PROF. A. M. MAYER. O. W. HOLMES.

CHRIST AND BEER.—The usual weekly family gathering in the Plymouth lecture-room was largely attended last evening. After the ordinary opening exercises Mr. Beecher said: "I will read a note which I have received." He then read as follows: "Will you please remember in your prayers just for one night a poor little music-teacher in the oil regions? Ask that her petition may be heard and answered, and that she may possess that peace which has thus far been sought in vain. Praying seems to her like trying to send a telegram to a friend without understanding the art of telegraphing. One may try, but if the operator does not render assistance, the message, however important, would not reach its destination."

In relation to this Mr. Beecher remarked: "That's a good figure anyhow. I think myself a great deal of praying is like a person drumming on a telegraph instrument without the least idea of what they are doing; but even at that there is somebody at the other end who knows that somebody is trying to do something." He then continued at length, explaining the nature and importance of prayer, holding that we should pray always and for ourselves, and those who prayed oftenest were the least skeptical as to their prayers being answered.

Brother Holliday differed from Mr. Beecher somewhat as to asking other people to pray for us. He had gone repeatedly to an old colored woman to ask her to pray for him when he needed help in any special emergency, and had always found comfort.

Mr. Beecher responded that in some cases, when one knew a person living very near to Christ, it might be well to ask that person's prayers in his behalf; but he had such a superabounding faith in the love of Christ that to ask anybody to pray for him seemed a superfluity. When he was in Stratford-on-Avon he went into a large brewery, and the brewer showed him an immense vat of beer, with a spigot nearly as large as a beer cask itself, and the great vat contains as much beer as half that lecture room would hold that had been there for two years ripening, and the idea came over him that if he should bring a tumbler there and try to get a glass of beer out of that spigot how he would be drenched in beer, and have to swim for it; and he felt just so about the great stream of Christ's love—that it was boundless, and no man could try to get ever so little without being drowned in it.—New York World.

A young servant girl from an almshouse, who was noted for her want of appreciation of truth and honesty, came, in her Sunday-school studies, to the word conscience. Her teacher asked her if she knew what it meant. "Yes," she replied, "I have heard it was a still, small voice;" and then naively added, "but I never heard it."

DIED UNBAPTIZED.—Mrs Ella Gertrude O'Neill, wife of the deceased, testified: I reside at No. 50 West Thirty-second-st.; deceased was my husband; I accompanied him to an office in Pine-st., last Monday, and left it with him; there was no disturbance there; we left the room together, I being a little in advance; Mrs. Folk and her sister, Mr. Dupignac, my husband, and myself left the office in company; Mrs. Folk and her sister went first, Mr. Dupignac next, and my husband last; when we reached the head of the stairs we were all close together; the door of Judge Sutherland's office opened, and the murderer of my husband came forth; myself and the others proceeded down stairs in the order I have mentioned; I was about half way down the stairs, I think, when the first shot was fired; I caught hold of the banister, rushed to the foot of the stairs, and immediately the second shot was fired; I heard it whiz by my head, on the right hand side; after the second shot had been fired, my husband turned, facing his murderer; I think he advanced a step or two; I advanced, also, and caught hold of his right arm; as I did so I looked up the stairs; the murderer of my husband, also advancing, fired the fatal shot; I saw it come, and it lodged in my husband's right breast; my husband then walked a few steps and leaned against the banister, turning to me he grasped his chest and said, "I'm shot; that ball hit me; King did it; call the doctor;" he then walked with me into an adjoining office and sat down in a chair; for fear that the man would escape, I rushed out of the office; a crowd had assembled; I said, "Where is that man? Have they arrested him?" People said, "Who? what?—where?" I said, "James C. King; he has shot my husband; arrest him—the man with the light overcoat;" it was all said in a few seconds; I returned to my husband and found him sinking rapidly; I then, with the assistance of some kind gentlemen, placed him upon the floor; a coat was put under his head; he seemed relieved for a moment or two, and then one of the gentlemen at his side told me that it was of no use, that he could not live, that he was dying. I remembered nothing for a few moments; the first I remember a priest was there; he asked me if I was a Catholic; I told him I was; he asked if my husband was one; I told him no; he asked me if my husband had ever made known any desire to become a Catholic; I said he had; he asked me if he should baptize him; I told him yes; the question was asked my husband if he wished to be baptized, he raised his eyebrows and breathed his last.

PROVIDENTIALLY DIRECTED.—Among the attendants at a late Methodist Conference was a very beautiful and intelligent looking young lady, who drew the admiring gaze of many eyes, particularly eyes masculine, always on the lookout for feminine faces. During the intermission at noon, a spruce young minister stepped up to the presiding elder, and said, with an air of secrecy,—

"Did you observe the young lady who sat by the first pillar on the left?"

"Yes," said the elder; "what of her?"

"Why," said the young man, "I feel impressed that the Lord desires me to take that lady for my wife. I think she would make a good companion and helpmeet in the work of the ministry."

The elder, as a good Christian ought, had nothing to object. But in a few moments another candidate for ministerial efforts and honors, and for the name of husband, came confidentially to make known a like impression regarding the same identical young lady.

"You had better wait awhile. It is not best to be too hasty in determining the source of such impressions," said the prudent elder. And he said well, for hardly were the steps of the second youth cold at his side, ere a third approached with the same story; and while the worthy confidant still marvelled, a fourth drew near with the question,—

"Did you notice the fine, noble-looking woman on your left?"

"Yes," cried the swelling elder.

"Well, sir," went on the fourth victim of this unsuspecting girl, "it is strongly borne in upon my mind that it is the will of the Lord that I should make proposals to that lady. He has impressed me that she is to be my wife."

The elder could hold in no longer.

"Impossible! impossible!" he exclaimed, in an excited tone: "the Lord never could have intended that four men should marry that one woman!"—Groton (Mass.) Public Spirit.

NOW READY!

THE
BOUND INDEX FOR 1872
(VOLUME III).

In addition to many other attractions, it contains the full course of free religious lectures delivered at Horticultural Hall, Boston, last winter, which were published in full nowhere else. A limited number only for sale. Price $2.50, and 72 cents postage. If postage is not prepaid by the purchaser, the volume will be sent by express at his expense. Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 88,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

Cultured Free Thought.

The Index Association,

With its Principal Office at No. 142, St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO, and Branch Office at No. 36, Dey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,
A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society. It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, London, England.
Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, Weston super Mare, England.
Rev. M. D. CONWAY, London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Professor MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America,—that such a journal should have been started and powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany, though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large."

Essays, lectures, and other papers of a thoughtful and liberal character; editorial articles; foreign and domestic correspondence; book reviews and notices; communications, selections, and other miscellaneous matter; in short, whatever can best promote the general cause to which THE INDEX is devoted will be found regularly in its columns.

Also, a highly interesting RATIONALISTIC STORY, entitled "PAUL GOWER," is now appearing serially in THE INDEX, and will run during the year.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial. All MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS must be addressed to

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 88, Toledo, Ohio.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 13) will be sent postpaid on receipt of eighty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them every word"); "Lectures on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. Abbot; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. Abbot; "The Vision of Heaven," by Prof. F. W. Newman. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete Edition of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

THE RICHEST MEN IN AMERICA are no more happy than those who earn their own living, and who read the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, published at $5 a year by R. WELLS, 200 Broadway, N. Y.

A FINE RADICAL ROMANCE!

TO BE PUBLISHED

SERIALLY

IN

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

WE ARE HAPPY TO ANNOUNCE that we have secured for publication in THE INDEX a most excellent novel, entitled

PAUL GOWER:

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

For the present the author desires to withhold his name. But he is well known in literary circles as a writer for the best English and American magazines. Of another story written by him Mr. JAMES PARTON says: "I consider it a master-piece of narrative." Mr. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, who was so kind as to read "PAUL GOWER" in manuscript with special reference to its publication in THE INDEX, permits us to publish the following:—

"I have looked over Mr. —'s novel, and think it would be an attractive feature in THE INDEX. It is very strong, and I found it very interesting. The story is remarkably well told; the characters are firmly drawn; and the religious tone of it will suit the paper well. The style is nervous and simple; the incident is varied; the development is natural. The writer has put a vast deal of thought into it, and spent great labor on it with admirable effect. My judgment may be at fault, but I think it would adorn THE INDEX. It will divide well as a serial, which will be an advantage."

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

- | | |
|---|---|
| CHAP. | CHAP. |
| 1.—An Old Lady and Gentleman of the Old School. | 52.—In which Paul sets out for a larger amount of Travel than he intended, and visits some Old Friends. |
| 2.—News from the United States. | 53.—A Canadian Idyll. |
| 3.—A Lover's Quarrel. | 54.—Wherein we journey from the North to nearly the most Southern of the United States. |
| 4.—Family Antecedents. | 55.—More Southern Experiences; a Look at New Orleans; and a sudden change of Programme. |
| 5.—Poor Relations. | 56.—A Return and a Disappointment. |
| 6.—Mr. Bligh resolves three Morning Calls. | 57.—The Contents of which ought to surprise nobody. |
| 7.—Is spent in Mr. Bligh's Office. | 58.—In which Paul hears more News of Friends of an Unsatisfactory Character. |
| 8.—A Shabby-Genteel Family. | 59.—Wherein Paul Gower and the Rev. George Bligh smoke a cigar together. |
| 9.—Mr. Daniel Pennethorne. | 60.—Accompanies Paul to London and describes his Doings in that Metropolis. |
| 10.—Harry Franklin. | 61.—Is a Continuation of Chapter 60. |
| 11.—"Never Overtaking and always Punting." | 62.—Contains an Accident and some Conversation. |
| 12.—A Catastrophe. | 63.—Treats of the Vicarage and Farm-house; and of the Machinations of a Wicked Woman. |
| 13.—Locked-out for the Night. | 64.—Shows that a Pliable Disposition may be wrought upon to Good as well as Evil Purposes. |
| 14.—In which diverse Persons call on each other without Invitation or Introduction. | 65.—Which only those Readers who have some knowledge of Human Nature will think at all Truthful or Probable. |
| 15.—Sickness and Convalescence. | 66.—Wherein we get rid of Mrs. Franklin for Good and All. |
| 16.—Eather Franklin. | 67.—In which the Engagement between Ruth Gower and the Rev. George Bligh comes to a perfectly natural conclusion. |
| 17.—Contains Explanations and Confidences. | 68.—Contains various matters, Reflective, Rural, and Metropolitan, and concludes at Southampton. |
| 18.—Concludes with a Street Row at the Door of Mr. James Mabberley. | 69.—New York again. And what Paul did and heard there. |
| 19.—Involves a Meeting and a Departure. | 70.—A "Cut Direct" and other Experiences, too various for particularization. |
| 20.—In which Richard Sabin talks like a Heathen. | 71.—Is as Desultory as the one preceding it, and therefore introduced without Specification. |
| 21.—"That nasty, deceitful Clergyman who behaved so badly to poor, dear Ruth." | 72.—More Boarding-House and Bohemian Details; the latter involving their own Moral. |
| 22.—"My Native Land, Good Night!" | 73.—A Loving Heart, self-portrayed; and News from England. |
| 23.—Epistolary and Maritime. | 74.—A Character; the re-appearance of a Scoundrel, and still more of Journalism. |
| 24.—Is mainly in Praise of New York City and Americans in General. | 75.—Another Return and a new Enterprise. Characterized on an Historical Occasion. |
| 25.—Paul's Father. | 76.—In which a former Acquaintance takes Paul into his confidence concerning his Domestic Infelicity. |
| 26.—Transpires in or near Nassau Street. | 77.—Might have had the same Title as Chapter 76. |
| 27.—More New Faces. | 78.—More talk of Secession, and the Beguiling of Richard Sabin's Catastrophe. |
| 28.—Is Conversational and Voludictory. | 79.—A Companion-Picture to what we have seen in Charleston, but on a larger Scale. |
| 29.—The Christening of a Comic Paper. | 80.—Clears the way for the Next and Last. |
| 30.—A New York Boarding-House. | 81.—In which John Gower's Misfortunes and the Story come to an End together. |
| 31.—Paul's Letters. | |
| 32.—In which Dick Sabin returns to New York City and is seen by Somebody who has hereafter a Great Deal to do with Him. | |
| 33.—Wherein Richard Sabin lays down a Square of Holl's Pavement. | |
| 34.—"The Porcupine." | |
| 35.—In which Paul Gower and Richard Sabin amuse themselves. | |
| 36.—A short Chapter introducing a very long one. | |
| 37.—A Young Man's Theological Experiences. | |
| 38.—Consequences. | |
| 39.—A Descent into Bohemia. | |
| 40.—More of the same Subject. | |
| 41.—In which we talk about the Fourth Estate of New York City. | |
| 42.—"At Plaf's." | |
| 43.—The Reverend Jim Scobell. | |
| 44.—"The Cornucopia." | |
| 45.—"One More Unfortunate." | |
| 46.—In which the Story progresses for about Six Months. | |
| 47.—A Little Adventure. | |
| 48.—Injured Innocence. | |
| 49.—"Lead us not into Temptation." | |
| 50.—Just what might have been Expected. | |
| 51.—What People said about it; and an Item of News concerning the Fugitives. | |

Whoever desires to possess all the numbers of THE INDEX containing this novel should subscribe at once, beginning his subscription with the year. Send $3.00 for the FOURTH VOLUME OF THE INDEX.

Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 88, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Third Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

Address, THE INDEX,
Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

Back Numbers of The Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

IT is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

THE COMMONWEALTH

LIFE INSURANCE CO.
GENTLEMEN of standing and ability (either in professional or mercantile pursuits) are desired in all parts of the country to represent this reliable company. Our plans of Insurance are simple, popular, and honest.
Address 178 Broadway,
NEW YORK.

REAL ESTATE,

In all parts of the U. S.,

RAILROAD AND OTHER STOCKS,

Also

MERCHANDISE OF ALL KINDS,

Bought, sold, and exchanged.

All wishing to sell, or who desire to procure bargains, will find it to their interest to apply to
S. T. POMEROY,
No. 1, Park Place, New York City.

ASA K. BUTTS,

Manufacturer's Agent, Broker and Dealer in

Domestic Cotton Goods

CORDAGE, & C.,

111 Worth Street, New York.

Refers to

JOHN M. CONWAY, New York.
O. W. BUCKINGHAM,
C. A. WORTENDIKE, Godwinville, N. J.
PEARSON BROS & CO., Boston.
PENLEY & SCHLICHTER, Philadelphia.

THE BUTLER HEALTH LIFT.

LEWIS G. JAMES, MANAGER.

Principal Office—New York.

Park Bank Building, 214 Broadway,

Also,

BROOKLYN, 158 REMSEN STREET.

"This kind of exertion not only increases muscular power but refreshes exhausted nervous energy."—H. D. NOTES, M. D., Professor in Bellevue Medical College.

Apparatus for private use of the most perfect construction, and at the most reasonable prices. Refer to Rev. O. B. Frothingham, Rev. Dr. Bartol, D. S. Rogers, and many others.

Visitors Always Welcome.

"The Greatest Luxury in the World."

TURKISH BATHS.

& 23 COLUMBIA HEIGHTS, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Three minutes' walk from Fulton Ferry.

A series of these Baths will relieve, if not cure, nearly every form of disease. The beauty and simplicity of their action consists in the perfect adaptability, either mild or powerful, of this method of treatment to each and every case. It cleanses the body, purifies the blood, and equalizes the circulation, thus arousing dormant functions, and restoring the highest measure of health possible to the individual.

Innumerable references can be given to cases cured by the Bath, and the proprietor will freely advise with those who desire any information regarding its proper use.

First-class rooms and board at moderate prices.
CHARLES H. SHEPARD, M. D.

A GREAT OFFER! HOLIDAYS!

HORACE WATERS, 481 BROADWAY, N. Y., will dispose of 100 Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of three first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during the HOLIDAYS. New 7-octave first-class Pianos, modern improvements, for $275 cash. The Concerto Parlor Organs are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Price, for 6-stops, $185, 10-stops, $225 and $250 cash. Other Organs and Melodeons for $45 and upwards for cash. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S NEW BOOK.

The Religion of Humanity,

By O. B. Frothingham. Contents.—I. Tendencies; II. God; III. Bible; IV. Christ; V. Atonement; VI. Power of Moral Inspiration; VII. Providence; VIII. Moral Ideal; IX. Immortality; X. Education of Conscience; XI. The Soul of Good in Evil; XII. The Soul of Truth in Error.
One vol., 12 mo. $1.50. Sent free on receipt of price.

DAVID G. FRANCIS, Publisher,
17 Astor Place, New York.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS

for the

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES: an historical summary of the origin, growth, and perfection of the chief industrial arts of this country. 1,300 PAGES, and 500 ENGRAVINGS. WRITTEN BY 20 EMINENT AUTHORS, including John B. Gough, Leon Case, Edward Howland, Jos. B. Lyman, Rev. E. Edwin Hall, Horace Greeley, Philip Ripley, Albert Brisbane, F. B. Perkins, etc., etc.

This work is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufacture, etc., in all ages. It is a complete encyclopedia of arts and manufactures, and is the most entertaining and valuable work of information on subjects of general interest ever offered to the public. It is adapted to the wants of the Merchant, Manufacturer, Mechanic, Farmer, Student, and Inventor, and sells to both old and young of all classes. The book is sold by agents, who are making large sales in all parts of the country. It is offered at the low price of $3.50, and is the cheapest book ever sold by subscription. No family should be without a copy. We want Agents in every town of the United States, and no Agent can fail to do well with this book. Our terms are liberal. We give our agents the exclusive right of territory. One of our agents sold 333 copies in eight days; another sold 368 in two weeks. Our agent in Hartford sold 397 in one week. Specimens of the work sent to agents on receipt of stamp. For circulars and terms to agents address the publishers,

J. B. BURR & HYDE,
Hartford, Conn.,
CHICAGO, ILL., or CINCINNATI, OHIO.

THE BABCOCK

FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against Fire."

SURE,

SIMPLE,

SELF-ACTING.

Used by the Fire Departments of the principal cities of the Union.

F. W. FARWELL,

Secretary,

407 Broadway, N. Y.

Over Twelve Hundred Actual Fires put out with it.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

NEW TRACTS!

INTENDED TO TEACH RELIGION WITHOUT SUPERSTITION.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 20.

SECOND SERIES.....No. 21 to No. 35.

Either Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
19 PINCKNEY ST., BOSTON.

C. A. MORSE,

American and Swiss Watches,

CLOCKS, JEWELRY, SOLID SILVER, & C.,

223 West Madison St., Chicago.

Fine Watches put in order. Repairing neatly done.

Burned out at cor. Clark and Lake streets.

Samuel Johnson's Work on India. Sent on receipt of price, —$5.00.

Address S. H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

Send to same address for Catalogue of other scientific and religious works.

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at (two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

HARLAN P. HYDE.

REAL ESTATE AGENT,

AND

Negotiator of Mortgages.

95 1-2 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents Wanted!

All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than in anything else. Particulars Free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Me.

BRYANT & BENTLEY,

Manufacturing Jewelers. Rings a specialty. 355 patterns hard solder rings, stamped and warranted 16 carat fine. 18 carat Bracelets, Cameos, Coral, Roman, and engraved sets; Masonic Jewelry, &c. No. 12 Maiden Lane, New York (up stairs).

SPIRIT OF REFORM

WILLIAM WHITE & CO.,

14 HANOVER STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Issue weekly the

BANNER OF LIGHT:

An exponent of the Spiritual Philosophy of the nineteenth century.

The above is a first-class, eight-page, family Newspaper, containing poetry, columns of interesting and instructive readings, classed as follows:—

LITERARY DEPARTMENT.—Original Novels of reformatory tendencies, and occasional translations from French and German authors.

REPORTS OF SPIRITUAL LECTURES.—By able Trance and Normal Speakers.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.—Upon Spiritual, Philosophical, and Scientific Subjects.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.—Subjects of General Interest, the Spiritual Philosophy, its Phenomena, etc., Current Events, Entertaining Miscellany, Notices of New Publications, etc.

MESSAGE DEPARTMENT.—Spirit-Messages from the departed to their friends in earthly life, given through the mediumship of Mrs. J. H. COMANT, which demonstrate direct intercourse between the Mundane and Super-Mundane Worlds.

ORIGINAL CONTRIBUTIONS.—From the most talented writers in the world.

All which features render this Journal a popular Family Paper, and at the same time the Harbinger of a Glorious Scientific Religion.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, IN ADVANCE.

Per Year	83.00
Six Months	45.00
Three Months	25.00

Specimen copies sent free.

We confidently call the attention of the friends of progress and reform, whether in material or spiritual matters, to the self-respecting and dignified tone, and the liberal position assumed and maintained by the BANNER OF LIGHT in the past, the same being the guarantee of future usefulness.

WILLIAM WHITE & Company also publish and offer for sale, at the BANNER OF LIGHT Bookstore, many books and pamphlets of a spiritual and reformatory nature.

The complete works of ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS; also books by Judge J. W. Edmonds, Mrs. Emma Hardinge, William Howitt, Hon. Robert Dale Owen, D. D. Home, Prof. William Denton, Miss Lizzie Doten, J. S. Peabody, Mrs. J. S. Adams, Prof. S. B. Brittan, Rodman C. Emma Tuttle, Henry C. Wright, Warren Chase, Charles S. Woodruff, Dr. A. B. Child, Mrs. L. Walsbrook, P. B. Randolph, Warren S. Barlow, George Stearns, and others, will here be found.

READ, and let unbiased reason decide as to what is true.

THE (ORIGINAL)

CONTINENTAL LIFE

INSURANCE CO.,

of Hartford, Conn. Incorporated May, 1869.

SAM'L E. ELMORE, President,
JOHN S. PRICE, Vice President,
FRANCIS D. DOUGLASS, Secretary,
H. R. MORLEY, Actuary.

The CONTINENTAL especially commends itself, by its past experience and present success, to those who desire to place their insurance in a conservative company, conducted on the principle of furnishing RELIABLE AND ACCURATE INSURANCE at as REASONABLE COST as is consistent with PERFECT SECURITY.

A few First-Class Agents wanted for unoccupied fields.

GUNS FOR THE PEOPLE.

Breach-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $200. Double-Barrel Shot-Guns, $5 to $150. Single Guns, $5 to $200. Breech-loading and Repetitive Guns, $20 to $100. Revolvers, $5 to $100. Pistols, 75c. to $5. Gun material, fixtures, and ammunition of every kind very cheap. STAMP for Large Illustrated and Descriptive Price-List to GREAT WESTERN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The Science of a New Life

By JOHN COWAN, M. D. A radical work on Sexual Physiology and the laws necessary to the elevation of the Human Race. Recommended and endorsed by O. B. Frothingham, Dr. and endorsed by O. B. Frothingham, Dr. and endorsed by O. B. Frothingham, Dr. and endorsed by O. B. Frothingham, Dr. Every copy sold helps in the direction of the coming "millennium." Agents wanted everywhere. Send for circulars only by Subscription and at the Publisher's Price. COWAN & CO., 139 Eighth St., New York.

F. J. SCOTT,

J. H. STORRE

ARCHITECTS,

73 MADISON STREET (Near Bowdoy St.)
TOLEDO, OHIO.

KELLER, SAITER, & C.

Manufacturers of RICH JEWELRY. Cameo sets a specialty. Office, 12 Maiden Lane, New York. Factory, Bleeker St., cor. Bowery, New York.

Digitized by Google

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

Published by the Index Association at No. 142,
St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio, with Branch
Office at No. 36, Dey Street, New York City.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.
M. D. CONWAY, England.

THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A new LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MOSES, late editor of the RADICAL, whose EVENING NOTES will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 36, Dey Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. F. DINSMORE, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post office money order.

Address

THE INDEX,

DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A UNIQUE PREMIUM.

Photographs and Autographs

LEADING WRITERS

THE INDEX.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

W. J. POTTER.

W. H. SPENCER.

F. W. NEWMAN.

CHAS. VOYSEY.

A. W. STEVENS.

F. E. ABBOT.

☞ The PHOTOGRAPH of any ONE of the above-named persons will be mailed post-paid to any NEW subscriber who shall remit $5.00 for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

☞ To any one who shall send a list of names of from one to eight NEW subscribers and $5.00 for each, a corresponding number of Photographs shall be mailed post-paid, to be given to these subscribers; and the same number of Photographs shall also be mailed, post paid, as premium to the sender himself.

☞ To any one who shall send $9.00 for three years' subscription to THE INDEX in advance, a full set of the Photographs shall be mailed post-paid.

☞ None of the above Photographs will be sent, unless specially requested and unless a choice is made from the list.

☞ The Autograph of each of the above American writers will in all cases accompany the corresponding Photograph; but no Autograph can be sent with the Photograph of the English writers.

☞ These Photographs are well executed, are not on sale anywhere, and can be obtained in no other way. In offering them as premiums, the INDEX ASSOCIATION rely on the good will and active co-operation of all friends of THE INDEX.

☞ All orders for Photographs and remittances of money should be addressed to

THE INDEX,

DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A SYNOPSIS

OF

PAUL GOWER,

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a Story of English and American Life; the localisation being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not in-curious.

It is, also, in the very warp and weft of it, an heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potential with the uninquiring and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfilment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, didactically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is emphatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION of 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, Wm. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "L'ÉVÊQUE ET LA CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION RESIST A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A FENESTRABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE LIEBOW OF HUMANITY;" together with the report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Al Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace M. Alexander Loe, and others. Price, 35 cent packages of five or more, 35 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER,

Secr.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, MARCH 1, 1873.

WHOLE No. 166.

ORGANIZE!

LIBERALS OF AMERICA!

The hour for action has arrived. The cause of freedom calls upon us to combine our strength, our zeal, our efforts. These are

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governor of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Let us boldly and with high purpose meet the duty of the hour. I submit to you the following

FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

- ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.
- ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———. Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.
- ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.
- ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.
- ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.
- ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.
- ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

Liberals! I pledge to you my undivided sympathies and most vigorous co-operation, both in THE INDEX and out of it, in this work of local and national organization. Let us begin at once to lay the foundations of a great national party of freedom, which shall demand the entire secularization of our municipal, state, and national government. Send to me promptly the list of officers of every Liberal League that may be formed, and a standing list of all such Leagues shall be kept in THE INDEX. Hence, then, to the great work of freeing America from the usurpations of the Church! Make this continent from ocean to ocean sacred to human liberty! Prove that you are worthy descendants of those whose wisdom and patriotism gave us a Constitution unshaken by superstition! Shake off your slumbers, and break the chains to which you have too long tamely submitted!

Toledo, O., Jan. 1, 1873.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

LIST OF LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ST. LOUIS, MO.—M. A. McLeod, President; J. Gallion, Vice President; P. A. Lofgreen, L. La Grille, Secretaries; E. K. Thomas, Treasurer.

BOSTON, MASS.—J. S. Rogers, President; A. Davis, J. W. Smith, Vice Presidents; J. P. Titcomb, G. A. Bacon, Secretaries; J. A. J. Wilcox, Treasurer; R. H. Ranney, F. W. Clarke, H. B. Storer, Executive Committee.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1873.

ZOROASTER AND THE RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT PERSIANS.

BY JOHN W. CHADWICK.

FOURTH LECTURE IN THE COURSE OF SIX "SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES," GIVEN IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, JANUARY 20, 1873.

It will never be possible, it would seem, for the student of comparative theology to understand the ancient religion of Persia so well as that of India. Not but that that religion has its living votaries, who are quite confident that they know its history from the most ancient times. Not but that these votaries have their sacred scriptures corresponding to the Vedas and the Institutes of the Brahmans, the Tripitaka of the Buddhists, and the Christian's Bible. But the living votaries of Parseeism are but a feeble remnant of the mighty following it had in ancient times, and their present Scriptures are by their own confession, which is amply corroborated by internal evidence, hardly more than a few scattered fragments of a once extensive literature. These facts and prospects are the more disagreeable because our interest is excited and our curiosity piqued by the great fame of Zoroaster in the Greek and Roman world, and by the relations of Christianity, by means of Jewish mediation, with the Persian faith. The classic world had no such lively contact with the Indian peoples as with the Persians, and their religions had for it no such beguiling charm. According to Pliny, Aristotle fixed the date of Zoroaster at six thousand years before the death of Plato; i. e., about eight thousand five hundred years ago, about two thousand five hundred years before the creation of the world by the old way of reckoning. Plutarch gives a couple of pages to Zoroaster in his Morals, and hardly more than he could tell was known of the Persian teacher or his religion till the researches of Anquetil-Duperron in the middle of the eighteenth century. But, as we should naturally expect, it was the Neo-Platonists who found in Zoroaster's oracles a spirit nearest kindred to their own. Across the pages of Plotinus and Porphyrius and Jamblichus, and their school, drifts ever and anon the shadow of this far-off eastern sage. From these writers quite a collection of detached sentences could be made, attributed to Zoroaster, and not without intrinsic value, but of very doubtful authenticity. And yet these scattered and elusive hints were of themselves conclusive that there was behind them a religious and ethical development of the most striking character. Only some mighty flame could shed its light and shower its golden sparks over such mighty areas of space and time.

The relation of Judaism, and hence of Christianity, to the Persian faith, is a yet deeper source of interest in the latter, and makes still more painful the feeling that we are never likely to understand it as we can its Indian relations. And not only is the material for scholarship to work upon made smaller in amount and more dubious in its quality in the case of Parseeism than in the case of Brahmanism and Buddhism, but the material we have has not yet, especially by English scholars, been thoroughly overhauled. But men of great ability and inexhaustible patience are hard at work, and, if I could postpone this lecture ten or a dozen years, I could make it much more instructive and satisfactory to you and to myself than I am able to at present.

ent. And although we have not such abundant data as we would fain possess, and although the material we have is capable of yielding further secrets to the importunities of scholarship, the advance that has been made from ignorance to knowledge is truly wonderful, and enables us to distinguish all the essential features of this great religion. Early in the eighteenth century it was first perceived that, if Western Europe was ever to know anything about the Persian religion, it must consult the documents of that religion still in possession of its votaries. Before the middle of the century, copies of many of these documents had been deposited in the Oxford libraries, but there was not a scholar in England who could read the language in which they were written; a dead language, not understood in the majority of cases even by those who rolled its phrases, like sweet morsels, under their plous tongues.

One would hardly expect to find anything romantic in the history of Oriental studies, but more than one department of them has been lighted up by singularly romantic actions. Thus, in the department of Buddhism, we have the romance of Csoma de Kőrös, the Hungarian traveller, who, in the hope of discovering the original habitat of his Turanian ancestors, journeyed on foot from Hungary to Thibet, there to find his original enthusiasm caught up with a greater—the object of which was the Buddhist literature of Thibet. The history of Avestan studies furnishes his peer, the celebrated Anquetil-Duperron. In 1754, he was a young man of 23, pursuing Oriental studies in Paris, when a few lines copied from one of the Oxford MSS. fell under his notice. Immediately he formed the resolution to go to India and obtain possession of the Zoroastrian writings and acquire the knowledge necessary for their interpretation. But it was no easy matter for a young man, without money, to get from France to India one hundred and twenty years ago. He set in motion all the influences he could command to procure the means of going and for his support while there, but he found as little faith in his new world, when he spoke of it to kings and princes, as Columbus found in his. He waxed desperate, and, as France at that time was disputing the control of India with England, and sending off regiments to do her fighting there, Duperron joined one of these regiments and actually marched out of Paris, as he says, "to the lugubrious sound of an ill-mounted drum." But, before he had set sail, the reward of his enthusiasm and persistency came in the shape of a discharge from the military service, a free passage, and a pension. He did not, however, reach Surat, the scene of his proper labors, until 1768. But once there, he finally succeeded, by dint of various expedients, in procuring copies of the Parsee Scriptures; and, with the aid of native priests of the religion, he translated them into his native tongue. He was about to devote himself to the study of Sanscrit, when the breaking up of the French power in India obliged him to leave the country. Could he have carried out his purpose, his contribution to Western knowledge would have been much greater than it proved, for the knowledge of Sanscrit has proved to be the only key that can unlock the treasure of the Avestan language and religion; and it was not till fifty years later, that this knowledge was acquired by European scholars and the defects of Duperron's work were clearly seen. Not but that on his return to Europe his labors and his character were fiercely assailed. Especially did Sir William Jones, the pioneer of Oriental scholarship in England, attempt to bring contempt upon him and his work. Others joined in with Sir William, and for a time success appeared to crown their efforts. After all his faith and energy, Duperron seemed destined to the humiliation of seeing his Parsee Scriptures regarded as a forgery and himself as a dupe who had allowed himself to be fooled to the top of his bent by a set of Indian sharpers.

But this savage criticism was ultimately reversed; the originals of Duperron were accredited as genuine, as they deserved to be, by the very efforts that were made to prove them forgeries. A criticism remained behind, however, which at first no one thought of, but which was quite as damaging as the first. The originals were justified, but the translation of Duperron proved to be quite worthless. With the rise and growth of Sanscrit scholarship, it was discovered that the language of the Persian Scriptures had much in common with the language of the Vedas. It became evident that the Parsees of Surat had nearly lost the ability to read intelligently their own sacred books, and that Duperron had done little more than get a doubtful meaning of the separate words and string them together in some poor fashion of his own. The task of translating the originals was all begun anew, with Vedic Sanscrit for a guide, and it is now being rapidly pushed forward. Though much remains to learn, much has been already brought to light.

And now, if you have clearly apprehended what I have said thus far, and are not already informed about this whole matter, there are at least two things which I have spoken of that must seem to you to need elucidation. One is the fact that Duperron found the followers of Zoroaster in Western India. The other is the fact that Vedic Sanscrit proves to be the best interpreter of the Zoroastrian writings.

Consider, first, the matter of locality. The religion of Zoroaster was the religion of ancient Persia. Why then did Duperron go to Western India when he wanted to look into it? Thereby hangs a tale,—a tale without a parallel, it seems to me, in the religious history of the world, with one exception; that, the tale of Judaism, a religion without a country, yet maintaining its identity with marvellous fidelity under the most various national and social forms, and in spite of the most cruel and persistent persecution. Persia emerges from the darkness of the prehistoric times into the light of history and the great company of nations, with the gospel of Zoroaster in her hands. There is abundant evidence of this. The faith of Cyrus and Darius and Xerxes, the kings of the great Persian monarchy in the fifth and sixth centuries before Christ, when its boundaries foreshadowed the immense extent of the great Roman Empire of a later day,—the faith of those times has left its solemn record on the giant ruins of Persepolis. "What I have done here and what I have done elsewhere," reads one of the inscriptions made by Xerxes in the enduring stone, "I have done by the grace of Ahura-Mazda;" and Ahura-Mazda was the Zoroastrian god, better known to us under the name of Ormazd, orOrmuzd. It is very certain that the religion of Zoroaster, at this time, was not a religion of the day, nor of yesterday. It was not a new discovery. It had all the marks of a long-standing, well-developed faith; a faith with centuries of reverence and tradition at its back. In the Avesta, Zoroaster is connected with the king Vistaspa; and Duperron was misled by a fanciful resemblance, and misled hundreds of others, with identifying this Vistaspa with Hystaspes. But Zoroastrianism was already venerable when Darius Hystaspes was born. Its beginning was already lost in an immemorial antiquity. In the times of Cyrus and Darius it was the object of a boundless veneration. But in the fourth century before Christ, Alexander the Great came raging over Western and central Asia, and he made the Persian monarchy his spoil. The Parthian dynasty succeeded his debauched and tyrannous lieutenants, but the ancient religion lost its power and prestige more and more, until in the year 229 of our era, the Parthian dynasty was overthrown and the Sassanian was established in its place. This movement was not more political than religious. Its leaders were devoted to the Zoroastrian faith. There was now a revival of that faith, even more remarkable perhaps than the revival of Brahmanism in India after centuries of hibernation. For Brahmanism, it would seem, was never quite so dead as Zoroastrianism was under the Macedonians and Parthians. Under the new régime, Persia became a power hardly less mighty than in the days of Cyrus and Darius. King Ardeshir gathered from all parts of Persia a great assemblage of priests, and, from their memory and recitation of the ancient scriptures, so much of them as was not forgotten was again collected and committed to writing. To this experiment we are probably indebted for the records that have come down to us. The scriptures discovered by Duperron have all the characteristics which we should expect to find marking a literature thus rescued from the clutches of oblivion.

The religion of Zoroaster might have had millions of followers at the present time, instead of a paltry 120,000, if the all-conquering power of Islam had not, in the seventh century, swept everything before it. The sword of Mohammed was a most persuasive rhetorician. And yet it found that conquest was one thing and conversion quite another. The page of history records no more heroic struggle and resistance than that of the Persian Zoroastrians against the attempt of the Mohammedans to subvert their glorious faith. They might well think Mohammed a poor exchange for their Zoroaster (or, as they called him, Zarathustra,) his Allah for their Ahura-Mazda. More than once in the world's history have conquered races proved to be the conquerors. Taine has shown one striking example of this in the case of the Normans and Saxons. The Normans conquered Saxon England by force of arms. But Saxon England conquered its conquerors by force of manners and ideas. So it was, to a considerable degree, in Persia. The Zoroastrians conquered their conquerors. Persia became Mohammedan, but its Mohammedanism received on every side the impress of the native faith. The stock had such abundant life in it that the character of the ingrafted wood was changed, by the infusion of that life, to something very different from what it was upon the parent tree. But there were those among the Zoroastrians so uncompromising in their faith, that, even if they had known that this would be the result, they would not have accepted it; they would have preferred to keep unsullied and intact the high faith of their fathers. They could not be compelled into submission, but, wearying at length of persecution, after three centuries of protest they became pilgrims and sojourners upon the earth. For a hundred years, they found a refuge among the mountains of Beloochistan, the great water-shed of the Indus on the west; but, being finally driven out, they betook themselves first to one island and then to another in the Persian gulf, and at last to the main land and to the locality where they still reside. Here they have kept themselves singularly free from external religious influences. They have proved equally indifferent to the fascinations of Brahmanism and Buddhism, Mohammedanism and Christianity. They are a people by themselves, strikingly different from their Hindu neighbors in their superior physique and in their active, thrifty life. They are England's best subjects in India. They are a very wealthy community, but their wealth is not greater than their benevolence. They have a genuine Quaker pride in looking out for their own poor. A Parsee pauper is a thing unknown. Mr. George Peabody's half million—the largest Christian gift on record—looks almost petty beside three millions and a half given by Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy for charitable purposes. This community of 120,000 souls is about all that is left of the once mighty company of Zoroastrian worshippers. In some corner of Persia, another little band survived the shocks of many persecutions and kept up loving communication with their migrating brethren. But some years ago these had dwindled to about forty families, and since the great famine in Persia, and its attendant horror of wild hordes sweeping off the starving population, it would probably be difficult to find, upon the soil that saw its greatest triumph, the feeblest remnant of the ancient faith.

We have thus accounted for the fact that modern Parseism has its seat in Western India. But the modern relation of this religion to India does not begin to be so interesting and suggestive as its relation, in the earliest times, to the ancestors of the Brahmins and the Buddhists. No history, except a line or two in the Avesta, tells us of this relation. But its record is the most indubitable of all records—that of language itself. This is what the similarity of the Avestan to the Vedic language teaches us—that the people who created the Vedas and the people who created the Avesta were originally one and the same people, and their religion was originally one and the same religion. I cannot see that it is, as yet, fully determined whether the family split up on account of their religious differences, or the religious differences came (after their separation upon other grounds) as the result of separate development. Bunsen would seem to think the latter. It is his opinion that the story of Cain and Abel is the story of this family quarrel—Cain, or the Indian branch, cleaving to a nomadic life; Abel, the Persian, the Iranian, preferring agriculture. There seems to be no doubt that the Iranian branch did settle down to agricultural life much sooner than the Indian. But, however the separation came, and however the difference came in religion, it is certain that they both came somehow. The common parentage of your children is not more certain, than the common parentage of the Indian and the Persian faiths. The intoxicating Soma juice is the same revered object in the Vedas and the Avesta, and the name for it is really the same, though it reads Homa in the latter. The same names of supernatural beings occur in both of these ancient Bibles, with such differences in the spelling as a separate development would lead us to expect. For it must be remembered that the division of the race took place hundreds, if not thousands, of years before the art of writing was in use. But the similarities of form only make the differences of meaning the more interesting and remarkable. "Your God is my Devil," is an amenity with which we sometimes greet our Calvinistic friends; but this figure of speech has often, in the history of religion, had a veritable counterpart in fact. Thus, early Christianity did not so much deny the existence of the Pagan gods as it denied their sanctity. It turned them into demons. A similar compliment was paid by the Persians to their Hindu relatives, and repaid of course, as compliments are generally. The gods of the Veda are the demons of the Avesta. Indra, the chief god of the Vedic pantheon becomes in the Avesta the first lieutenant of Ahriman, the Prince of devils. This principle has many illustrations. Thus, the Persians had great reverence for the dog; the Indians a corresponding hatred. This difference would seem to be a monument of the time when the agricultural Aryans used the dog to keep off the nomadic Aryans from their premises.

Exactly how all of these differences were engendered it is not likely we shall ever know. It is not at all likely that any one man—Zoroaster or anybody else—was personally responsible for such great divergencies. The greatest teachers are the exponents of a tendency which is far greater than themselves. They speak as Jesus did, "that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed." There is always a first crocus to open in the spring, but the others are not far behind. We know so little about Zoroaster that, if you should ask such scholars as Whitney and Müller for his story, they might very properly answer you, "Story! God bless you, I have none to tell, sir." There is a life of him among the Parsee Scriptures, but it is a comparatively modern work and is made up of the most extravagant narrations. There would seem to be no good reason for doubting the actual existence of such a person, or for denying that he exercised a mighty influence; but the date of his appearance cannot be determined with even approximate nicety. With the advance of scholarship, it seems to move still farther back. The average opinion would now place him from 1,200 to 1,500 years B. C. Bunsen says 2,500 or 3,000, and does not think that Aristotle's date—6,000 years before the death of Plato—is so very irrational. The scene of his activity is more certain than his date. He was "the Bactrian Sage," and Bactria was beyond the Eastern borders of the Persian Empire when they were most extensive. The nature of his spiritual function is not difficult to perceive. It was not unlike that of Abraham in the Semitic world. Behind the diversity of Nature he felt the unity of life. Leaving the distractions of Nature-worship, he lifted his heart to the one God who is over all, blessed forever. There is a story told of Abraham, in the Koran, which would apply just as well to Zoroaster. "When night overshadowed him he saw a star and said, 'This is my Lord.' But when it set he said, 'I like not those that set.' And when he saw the moon rising, he said, 'This is my Lord.' But when the moon set, he said, 'Verily, if my Lord direct me not in the right way, I shall be as one of those who err.' And when he saw the sun rising, he said, 'This is my Lord; this is greater than the star or moon.' But when the sun went down, he said, 'O my people, I am clear of these things. I turn my face to Him who made the heavens and the earth.' But such a story, rightly understood, does not record the isolated experience of one man. It records the experience of generations, their doubts and questionings culminating at length in some superior heart and brain.

There is not merely hostility between the Vedas and the Avesta. There is development of ideas. There is cause and effect. Even within the Vedas, we hear the solemn undertone of a faith in spiritual unity behind the net-work of phenomena. If they do not speak of a God, they speak of God, of the Divine. "That which is one," they say, "the wise call many ways. They call it Indra, Agni, Varuna." And when the Persian branch had split off from the Hindu, this process still went on in the Hindu branch as well as in the Persian. Only, when the Hindu had fairly reached up to the conception of a central Unity, he named it Brahman, while the Persian named the same conception Ahura-Mazda. Nor did the correlation of growth stop at this point. The dualism of the Persian—his Ahura and Ahriman pitted against each other—was matched by a dualism in India. Brahman the creator had his Siva the destroyer. To these Vishnu the restorer was added. The Persian had no need of such a complementary deity, because there was in his God, Ahura, a Vishnu element,—a power of restoration, a power against which the power of Ahriman, the destroyer, would at length be broken.

The Avesta is regarded by the Parsees to this day as the work of Zoroaster himself; but the nature of its contents does not permit us to believe that it dates back to him, except perhaps in a few instances. It is written in a much older dialect than the stone inscriptions at Persepolis, which belong to the fifth century B. C., and probably records what had been orally transmitted for a long time before. These facts would favor its remote antiquity, and so far Zoroaster's authorship; but the internal evidence is all against the latter supposition. The Avesta is evidently the work of many generations, though it is dominated throughout by the genius of Zoroaster. His name is constantly recurring. It is always spoken with the deepest reverence. It is always a summons to thanksgiving. But his loftiest praises have a soberness and dignity the contrast very sharply with the Buddhist legends and even with his own in later times, and with the Christian legend of the middle ages and to day. In the earlier portions of the Avesta, he is a purely human character, and only the late portions ascribe to him supernatural powers.

The name by which the Zoroastrian Scriptures are best known—the Zend-Avesta—is a misnomer. They are the Avesta, pure and simple. The Zend is a translation and explication of the third century after Christ. The Zend-Avesta properly speaking, is this commentary and I original Avesta made into one book, the commentary following the original, line after line.

The Avesta is a very fragmentary work. It contains no system of theology or ethics or philosophy definitely wrought out. If we want anything of this sort, we must make it for ourselves, out of such scattered hints as the text offers, and reading too between the lines as carefully as possible. The Avesta is a collection of prayers, hymns, invocations, and thanksgivings. It contains, like all of the old Bibles of humanity (our own most certainly included), a great deal that is childish and some things that are monstrous and absurd. But it also contains innumerable sentences that have not been dimmed by age, and that have lost nothing of their everlasting spiritual substance by the attrition of the centuries and millenniums that have beat upon them since first they rose, obedient to some mighty impulse, above the stagnant levels of the primeval world.

Let me now read you a few passages. You will at once discover that you are in a different region from that charming Vedic upland, or that jungle of Brahmanic subtleties, or that cold, gray, joyless land of Buddhism, through which you have of late been wandering. I trust, under the splendid guidance of our friend Samuel Johnson. You will find that the dim presentiments of a spiritual deity, which haunt the Vedas, have here developed into conscious living faith in such a deity. You will find that the deity is no such abstraction as the god of Brahmanism, and that the faith contrasts very sharply, clear-voiced and whole-souled as it is, with the silence of Buddhism, albeit in that very silence there were implications of a central Life and Love.

The very name of the Zoroastrian god—Ahura-Mazda—indicates that, whatever general tendencies had been at work, a mighty personal force co-operated with them and left its seal on the religion. For Ahura-Mazda means "Spiritual Mighty One;" and this is not one of those names that grow up spontaneously among a people. It bears the marks of individual thought upon it. "He maketh his sun to shine upon the evil and upon the good," said Jesus; and, in the words which the most rigid scholarship concedes as likely to be Zoroaster's own, we read: "I will believe thee O Mazda, the powerful, holy God. With thine helpful hand thou givest to the pious man and to the impious man by means of the sun which strengthenest all things. Thus I believe in thee, thou wise and living God, because I behold thee to be the primal cause of life to thy creation. To the evil thou hast apportioned evil; to the good the true good. I will believe in thee, thou glorious God, even to the last moment of existence. In whatever time I have trusted in thee, thou wise and living God, in that thou comest unto me."

There is a passage supposed by Haug and Bunsen to have been spoken by Zoroaster at the opening of his mission. "Every one, both man and woman, ought this day to choose his faith. In the beginning there were twins, the good and the base, in thought, word and deed. Choose one of these two Spirits. Be good, not base. Ye cannot belong to both of them. Some may choose the hardest lot. Others adore Ahura-Mazda by means of faithful actions."

Other sentences from the oldest part of the Avesta read as follows: "I have entrusted my soul to Heaven, and I will teach what is pure so long as I can." "I keep forever purity and good-mindedness. Teach thou me, Ahura-Mazda, out of thyself." "I praise Ahura-Mazda who has created the water and the good trees, the splendor of light, the earth, and all good." "We praise our own souls, the cattle who maintain our life, good men and women, the mountains which make the waters flow, the strong wind created by Ahura-Mazda." "How shall I satisfy thee, O Mazda; I who have little wealth? . . . How may I exalt thee according to my wish? I will be contented with thy desires. This is the decision of my understanding and of my soul." "Then spake Zarathustra: 'Tell me then thy name, O pure Ahura-Mazda; which is thy greatest, best, and fairest name?' Then answered Ahura-Mazda: 'My name is He who may be questioned; the gatherer of the people; the most pure; He who takes account of men's actions. I am the All-beholding; the desirer of good for my creatures; He who cannot be deceived; the protector; the tormentor of tormentors; the creator of all.'" This is from the Khordeh Avesta. In the same section, Ahura is described as the "Omniscient, the Lord over all lords, the Forgiving, the rich in Love."

The entire aspect of this lofty faith is spiritual. The Hebrew Jehovah is much more limited by anthropomorphic conceptions. Ahura has his ministering spirits, but they never question his supremacy. He is the supreme, the only God. No images of him, or of his ministering spirits, have ever been made. The Mohammedans found in Persia a hatred of idolatry as unpromising as their own. The Zoroastrians have been called fire-worshippers, often rather anything else. The name does not belong to them. They never worshipped the fire, nor the sun. But the sun has always seemed to them a fitting symbol of the Deity. And if any symbol is necessary, is not this the best? We know, much better than the ancient Persians did, what creating, and sustaining, and renewing power there is in that great orb; but our knowledge of all other things has increased in like proportion, so that he does not stand out, nearly so sharply today, from the multitude of the Almighty's works as he did in that old time. But we ourselves can do no better than to use his glory as a symbol of the Creator's, in the daily symbolism of our speech. If we are not idolatrous, no more were the disciples of Zoroaster. "My Light," Ahura says to Zoroaster,—"My Light is hidden under all that shines." It is this light, "the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," that Zoroaster worships—this alone. All other light is but the sign of this. The sign may sometimes take the place of the thing signified, but the intention is always good and high. Let one more (metrical but almost literal) translation attest the spiritual purity of the Zoroastrian's conception of his god:—

"He who before all time by his own light
Kindled to life the myriad lights of heaven,
By his own wisdom has brought forth the truth
Which is the source of all good thoughts and aims.
Prosper thy truth, O Spirit, only wise,
Thou who abidest changeless without end.
Thee, O wise Mazda, fount of all existence
Lord of the earth and heavens, my soul adores,
Since I discovered thee with my spirit's eye,
Knew thee to be the parent of good thoughts,
The essence of the truth, the cause of life,
That lives and works in all that moves and is.
The sacred earth rests evermore in thee,
Who in thy wisdom hast her frame contrived;
And, travelling on the paths ordained by thee,
From dawn of time till latest age she brings
Rich gifts and joys to him who tends her well,
But leaves unblessed who seems to till her soil."

The idea of the reward of labor, contained in these last lines, is eminently characteristic of the Zoroastrian religion. It is commonly said, and very truly, that its leading idea is that of battle. Ormazd is pitted against Ahri-man, light against darkness, truth against falsehood, man against all the powers of darkness that strive for the possession of his soul. It is a fighting faith; but it is no less a working faith. The fighting is largely to be done by working. The splendid thrift of the Parsee community, still extant in Western India, dates from the most ancient injunctions of their religion. Here is no praise of mendicancy, nor of asceticism. Here is faith, not only that God made man, but that he meant him. It is a part of the religion to practise agriculture or some useful art. Fasting is forbidden, as a culpable weakening of "the powers entrusted to a man for the service of Ormazd." Celibacy is not merely undesirable; marriage is a sacred duty, and the girl of eighteen who neglects an opportunity to marry is doomed to hell until the resurrection. Zoroaster was wiser than Proudhon, who believed that "property is theft." He saw with the more sensible of our political economists, that man's right to the soil is proportioned to the labor that he spends upon it. He named the planting of a tree as a most virtuous action. "With the fruits of the field increases the law of Ormazd, and with them it is multiplied a hundred fold. The earth rejoices when man builds on it his house; when his flocks abound; when, surrounded by wife and children, he makes the grass and the corn to grow, and plants fruit-trees abundantly."

Whenever the vocabulary of a people is peculiarly rich in a particular direction, it is safe, we have been told, to infer a generous development of that people's life in that direction. The vocabulary of the Avesta is peculiarly rich in terms conveying ethical distinctions. Piety is so often substituted for morality, and the piety of the Avesta is so highly developed, that we hardly expect to find it equally strong upon the moral side. But we are happily disappointed. One of the most remarkable characteristics of Zoroastrian ethics is the positiveness of their injunctions. The vice of primitive ethics ordinarily is their negative aspect. The Moslem decalogue is entirely negative. It says, "Thou shalt not do thus and so." It enjoins no positive duties. One might obey all these commandments from his youth up and still be a pretty worthless character: very good, no doubt, but good for nothing; harmless, but not helpful. The Avesta has its prohibitions, but its positive injunctions are much more numerous. The sins which it enumerates are mostly sins of omission. What are called "sins of the Bridge"—i. e., sins that prevent the soul from passing safely over the bridge Chinvat, which is the only way to Paradise—are all sins of omission. The forms of confession could not be more comprehensive than they are. "That which was the wish of Ahura-Mazda and I ought to have thought and have not thought, that which I ought to have spoken and have not spoken, that which I ought to have done and have not done,—of these sins I repent with thoughts, words, and works, corporeal as well as spiritual, earthly as well as heavenly. Pardon me, O Lord; I repent of my sins. That which was the wish of Ahri-man and I ought not to have thought and yet have thought, that which I ought not to have spoken and yet have spoken, that which I ought not to have done and yet have done,—of these sins I repent with thoughts, words, and works, corporeal as well as spiritual, earthly as well as heavenly. Pardon me, O Lord; I repent of my sins." Accompanying such confessions, we meet with resolutions like the following: "As long as life endures, I will stand fast in good thoughts in my soul, in good words in my speech, in good deeds in my actions. With all good am I in agreement, with all evil am I at variance. With the punishments [of the future life] am I contented and satisfied. I have taken hold of good thoughts, words, and works. May the power of Ahri-man be broken! May the reign of Ahura-Mazda increase!" And again: "I am steadfast in this faith and turn myself not away from it for the sake of a happy life, nor for the sake of a longer life, nor for power nor for a kingdom. If I must give up my body for the sake of my soul, I give it contentedly. I believe steadfastly in the good faith of Mazda; in the resurrection; in the bridge of souls; in the invariable reward of good deeds, and punishment of bad deeds; in the everlasting continuance of paradise and the annihilation of hell; and I believe that at the last Ahura-Mazda will be victorious and Ahri-man will perish with the Devils and all the children of darkness." "I am full of hope that I may attain to paradise and the shining heaven, where all majesty dwelleth. I make this confession in the hope that I may hereafter become more zealous to accomplish good works and keep myself more from sin; and that my good deeds may serve for the lessening of evil and the increase of good till the resurrection."

In these sentences are revealed three characteristic traits of the Avestan teaching. First, the three-fold division of duty, which is constantly recurring—thoughts, words, and works. To be pure and true in all of these is represented as the sum of all religion. Second, the annihilation of hell. The faith expressed in such annihilation is not an accident. It is an essential part of the Avestan teaching. Those who know nothing else about the ancient Persian faith know that it was a dualistic faith. It had its Ormazd and it had its Ahri-man, its powers of light and darkness, warring against each other. But it is not generally known how much of all this was an aftergrowth, and how little of it comparatively is to be found in the earliest records of the faith. The one God of Zoroaster does not share his throne with any other co-eternal being. The powers of darkness are represented as the product of men's evil thoughts. And when, later, Ahri-man, the prince of darkness, is represented as a being co-eval with Ormazd, the war between them is to have no doubtful termination. Hell is to be abolished. Ahri-man and all his hosts and all his victims are to become pure and true, and Ormazd is to reign without a rival, throughout all eternity. This unrighteous one, this impure one, who is nothing but a devil in his affections; this stark-blind king of wickedness, he who does nothing but evil,—will yet at the end speak the word and observe the laws of Ormazd, and introduce the wicked into the dwellings of the good. The details of this system are wrought out very elaborately in the Bundehesh, a writing much later than the Avesta, but illustrating even more clearly the character of the religion in its most prosperous days. In this writing, we discover a deity not mentioned in the Avesta, evidently a philosophic invention, the object of which is to make one again of what had become two, to unite Ormazd and Ahri-man in a higher synthesis. This deity is called Zerina Akerana (Time without bounds). He produces from himself both Ormazd and Ahri-man. Thus the idea of absolute evil is renounced. Thus optimism is enthroned. But the religion of Zoroaster did not really need to be pieced out in this way. It was essentially monotheistic and optimistic. Its dualism was an incident, not an essential trait.

And notice, also, that, in every stage of the development of this religion, Ahri-man was a devil. He was not another God. There has been a great deal of devil-worship in the world, but it has all been outside of Parseism. The belief in evil spirits has been commonly attended with a disposition to placate them with deprecatory rites and sacrifices. It has been "Good God" and "Good Devil," or nothing but "good devil." Within the Christian Church for many centuries, the death of Jesus was represented as a price paid to the devil for the souls of men. The doctrine of atonement took this form, till Anselm revised it in the eleventh century. Nothing could be further from the Persian faith than such a line of thought. With its devil it refused to compromise. It defied him. It declared war against him, war without truce or parley, till his power was broken and his kingdom overthrown. Whatever we may think of the conception, this attitude was surely manly enough to suit the manliest among us.

There is a third thing in the passages above quoted which I wish you to notice—the prayer "that my good deeds may serve for the lessening of evil and the increase of good, until the resurrection." In this prayer is revealed another noble trait—the refusal of the Zoroastrian to fix his attention on his individual salvation. He had a conception of humanity. He felt the solidarity of universal life; he agreed with the Buddhist: "Never will I accept private individual salvation; never will I enter into final peace alone;" and also with Christian Paul: "No man liveth to himself and no man dieth to himself."

The Avesta was not without superlatives, as we perceive when Zoroaster asks Ahura-Mazda which is the prayer that outweighs a hundred, a thousand, ten thousand other prayers; and finally which is the prayer "which in greatness, goodness, and beauty is worth all that is between heaven and this world, and those lights, and all good things created?" Ahura-Mazda answered: "That prayer, O pure Zarathustra, when a man renounces all evil thoughts, and words, and works." When we arrive at the answer, the form of the question seems less extravagant. Again we read: "To arrive at prayer is to arrive at a good conscience. The good seed of prayer is virtuous conscience, virtuous words, and virtuous deeds."

There are many psalms in the Avesta which compare not unfavorably with the psalms of David. I will quote but one of them:—

"That which I ask of Thee tell me Thou aright, O living God! Who was in the beginning the Father and Creator of Truth? Who made the way of the sun and the stars? Who causeth the moon to wax and wane?"

"That which I ask of Thee tell me Thou aright, O living God! Who upholdeth the earth and the unsupported heavens, so that they fall not? Who made the waters and the trees of the forest? Who driveth the winds and the storms that they so quickly run?"

"That which I ask of Thee tell me Thou aright, O living God! Who made the beneficent light and the darkness? Who made the blessedness of sleep and of awaking? Who made the dawn and the noon and the night, recalling man to his prayer?"

No religion has ever had a firmer faith in immortality than the religion of Zoroaster, nor a firmer faith in final universal restoration. In its ideas of hell, it never erred to the extent of meting out one punishment for all offenders. The punishment was to be measured by the offence. Life is called "the way of the two destinies." This way having been travelled to the end, the things that next await the good or evil soul are set forth with the most charming confidence and simplicity. "Zarathustra asked Ahura-Mazda, 'When a pure man dies, where does his soul dwell during the first night?' Then answered Ahura-Mazda: 'Near his head it sits down praying.' On this night his soul sees as much joy as the whole living world possesses. On the second and third nights the soul keeps the same place. When the third night turns itself to light, then the soul of the pure man goes forward. A wind blows to meet it from the south, more sweet than other winds. In that wind there comes to meet him the sum of his good deeds in the appearance of a maiden, beautiful and shining. When the soul of the pure man arrives at the eternal lights, a pure one, who has preceded him, speaks to him saying, 'How hast thou, O pure one, come from the perishable world hither to the imperishable?' Then speaks Ahura-Mazda: 'Ask him not, for he has come upon the fearful trembling way. Bring him hither the food that is the proper food for one who thinks, speaks, acts rightly.'"

Such is the way of the soul; and what is the way of the body it has left behind? Sickness and death, the messengers of the evil Abriman, have polluted it. The pure elements, earth, fire, and water cannot receive it. It is carried to a tower of silence, far away upon some lofty hill or mountain, and there with tender words is left to be exposed to the pure birds of heaven whom Ormazd makes his instruments of purification. When the bones have been denuded of their flesh, and sun and air have bleached them, they are considered worthy to be buried in the pure earth, which is the creator's perfect gift to man.

But our last picture of a religion so high and pure and spiritual as that of Zoroaster should not be one so sad as this disposal of the body, which jars upon our sensibilities even while we recognize that there was no intention of dishonoring the empty tenement, that nothing could have been further from their thought.

Let us turn from death to love, and from the strangely solemn burial to the happy wedding-day. The bride and bridegroom are seated side by side, and the priest pronounces on them this marriage benediction. Bethink you, if it would come amiss in our own churches, or better still in our own homes; if you could ask a better or a sweeter service for your dearest friend: "Know ye that both of you have loved each other and are therefore thus united. Look not with impious eye on other people, but make it your study to love, honor, and cherish each other as long as both of you remain in this world. May quarrels never arise between you, and may your fondness for each other increase from day to day. May you both adhere to the truth, and be always pure in your thoughts as well as in your actions, and always try to please the Almighty who is the lover of Truth and Righteousness. Shun evil company; abstain from avarice, envy, pride. Think not of other men's riches, but strive industriously, and without any dishonest means, to improve your own. Cultivate friendship between yourselves, and with your neighbors, and among those who are known to be good people. Hold out a helping hand to the poor and needy. Always respect your parents. May success crown all your efforts. May you be blessed with children and grandchildren. . . . May the blessings of the Almighty descend upon you."

The history of Christianity in the New Testament reports among the legends of the infancy of Jesus, that "wise men from the East" brought to the Messiah gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh. It is as if the writer's hand had been constrained by a superior wisdom to write down that symbol of the influence which the religion of Zoroaster exerted upon Christianity. For this influence was undoubtedly immense, though not direct, but acting through a Jewish medium. Contact with Persia revolutionized the faith which the Hebrew people had received from Moses. Not until after this contact were they fairly cured of polytheism and idolatry. The Old Testament has scarcely a sentence that implies belief in immortality, because its various writings were completed before the Persian influence was fairly at work. But the Apocrypha, which is to a great extent a monument of Persian influence, is full of this faith. It is not to be denied that the "gold" brought by these "wise men" had in it something of alloy. With faith in immortality came the fancy of a bodily resurrection. We cannot be very thankful to Persia for this contribution to the sum of Christian superstition. From the same source came the Christian devil, and the beliefs in angels and demons that have played so important a part in the great drama of our Christian hopes and fears. There is no devil in the Old Testament. The serpent in Genesis is his Satanic majesty only by a long, long afterthought; and even at this, the story is quite possibly of Persian origin. The Satan in Job is one of the sons of God, an accusing angel; not at all the devil of the later creeds. But before the rise of Christianity, the Persian "adversary" had taken full possession of the Hebrew mind, and he passed from thence unchallenged into the Christian consciousness, where for seventeen hundred years he played a fearful part, and where there are scars of his making that are still unhealed.

Thus it would appear that Persia's gift to Christianity has been, upon the whole, of doubtful quality. But the whole has not yet been made manifest. The Jewish Talmud proves that the development of Christianity was part of a great movement of liberation and of higher aspiration in the Jewish mind. The contribution of Persia to this movement has not yet been measured; but every new increase of knowledge bids us regard her as one of the greatest helpers of the new and better time. There were gifts in her hands which Christianity did not choose to receive, with which, if she had received them, there would have gone a blessing quite unspeakable. It is not too late to take them even now, though some of them we have already earned by hard experience. The Zoroastrian hatred of asceticism would have saved us from its immeasurable curse. The Zoroastrian love of work would have done much to lift the imaginary curse of Adam from our shoulders. The Zoroastrian sense of this world as a place to be redeemed and glorified would have proved a strong ally to the Christian idea of the Kingdom of Heaven upon earth, and a sturdy foe of that "other-worldliness" which has been the greatest curse of Christianity. But though nearly dead, the ancient faith yet speaketh, and should it speak no more, its history need not greatly sadden us. Its life is coursing through a hundred million hearts upon the earth; and if, as we believe, there is that heaven of which Zoroaster dreamed, it must count among its citizens a mighty company of men and women who, while they lived, were rescued from a life of falsehood and impurity by his manly summons to a life of sacred and ideal significance.

LONDON, April 25.—In the House of Lords, to-night, Duke Cleveland moved the second reading of the Prisoners' Ministers bill, the object of which is to pay the Roman Catholic chaplains for their services in prisons. Lord Cleveland said he had observed that many sections of the country, and notably Liverpool and its neighborhood, were intensely Catholic, and the passage of this bill was as much a matter of policy as of justice. Lord Oranmore spoke against the measure, and declared that the time would come when the pretensions of the Church of Rome should be curbed. Lords Carnarvon and Morley supported the bill as in accordance with the spirit of the age. Viscount Middleton confessed that when it was proposed to make a Romish priest an official person, he felt bound to halt. The bill was passed by a vote of 58 to 22.

A New Haven revivalist the other night painted the future state of the wicked in gloomy colors, and, saying that his father died a very wicked man and had gone to hell, was proceeding, when a young man rose to go out. The preacher at once announced that there was a young man going straight to the same burning region, when the seceder stopped and coolly asked: "Well, elder, don't you want to send some word to your father?"

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1878, by F. E. Annot, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER IX.

MR. DANIEL PENNETHORNE.

When Richard Sabin reached his father's house, to which he proceeded straightway from Scho Square, the slatternly girl who opened the door received him with her ordinary grin of recognition, overlaying a palpable look of flurry and bewilderment. (The family kept no servant, but spent twice the wages of one on intermittent charwomen and hangers-on, from an adjacent mews.) Dick was about to inquire the cause of the girl's disquiet, when a sudden clamor from the interior, including the sound of his sister Kate's voice raised in vehement expostulation, directed him, at once, to its source. He went therefore to the door of his father's work-room or studio, an apartment in the rear of the house, divided from it by a small area, and occupying the space of what had once been a yard, or what land-owners are wont to denominate a garden. Here he found Kate, with her best dress on (an unusual spectacle at that period of the day), her hair in disorder and her face crimsoned with anger and excitement. She was pounding at the door, trying its handle, and loudly exclaiming against somebody within.

"What's the matter, Kitty?" he asked.

"It's a shame, that it is!" she answered; "Frank's inside with little Arty, and they're roasting Lucy's doll."

"What?"

"They've got it tied to a string before the stove, and are twirling it round until all the wax will be melted." Which information a burst of childish glee from within, and a loud, exultant, ornithological imitation, intended for the crowing of a cock, from the scapegrace brother, seemed to confirm.

"I'll tell mother, Frank, directly she comes home, as sure as you are born!" bawled Kate, resuming her assaults on the door. It was one of those very rare occasions when Mrs. Sabin had gone out, in company with her married daughter and the child of the latter; who, leaving her doll in charge of her juvenile cousin, had afforded the confederates within an opportunity for mischief, which they were improving accordingly.

"Come, Frank, open the door!" said Richard, after a fresh burst of defiance and further oburgations from the besieged and besieger, and putting his foot against the obstacle as if he intended a forcible entrance. Less on account of this exhortation than the fact that the novel cookery was nearly completed, and the wax-doll reduced to a very gressome spectacle—her eyes staring awfully in their sunken sockets, from beneath her singed hair, while the sawdust which had composed her body seemed, in conjunction with a tallow candle, to have supplied hasting for this extraordinary "roast"—Frank surrendered at discretion, his childish accessory dancing about the stove and clapping his small hands in a transport of elfin joy.

"You'll catch it, both of you," cried Kate, rescuing the remains of the doll and boxing the ears of little Arthur with a celerity which made both actions appear simultaneous. Upon which the imp set up a loud howl, partly of lamentation, partly of defiance, called his aunt a "toward," told her to "hit one of her own size," and tried to butt at her with his curly head; which, as it had evidently served as a towel to cleanse his fingers from the accumulations of melted wax, tallow, and sawdust, attendant on his recent occupation, presented an agreeable contingency to Kate's only silk dress. Frank, meanwhile, who had dextrously dodged his sister's onslaught, was digging his knuckles into his eyes and whimpering in burlesque remorse and terror.

"Oh! would you? you bad child! Here Polly, take this brat down stairs!" And, holding him at arm's length, Kate thrust the juvenile rebel into the grasp of the slatternly girl, who presently did as she was bidden; not without receiving severe punishment in the shape of slaps and kicks from her burden, as he was borne screaming from the apartment; what time the delighted Frank drank his sister's health from a pewter pot, the contents of which (bee and gin) he and the child had been sharing together. He was its preceptor and comrade in all kinds of mischief, and had tutored it so admirably as to render it a perfect phenomenon of annoyance to society in general.

A sharp rating from Kate, coupled with it suggestion that "it was high time he was at Biker's, if he intended going there at all, to-day sent him off to a drawing-school in the vicinity or at least out of the house. This clearance effected, she turned to her brother.

"I'm so glad you've come, for everybody's out, and there's a gentleman in the parlor, waiting for Harry Franklin—Mr. Pennethorne, you know; they came together and Harry has gone off after you, to Great James street, leaving him here, like a great stupid. And I wish you'd go and speak to him." Kate spoke while arranging her hair and smoothing her rumpled plumage.

"Mr. Pennethorne! what did Harry bring him here for? I didn't think he liked the fellow well enough to travel in his company."

"I don't know—they met at the station, and I suppose Harry couldn't help it, though I wish to goodness gracious he had! for there won't be no dinner to-day if I don't go and see about it directly; and then mother will be as cross as two sticks; and it's getting on for two o'clock, and that Polly'll never do a thing unless she's made to. Go and talk to him!" And Miss Sabin (who was not particularly grammatical, especially when excited) pushed her brother in the direction of the front-parlor, and briskly descended the kitchen stairs; her voice being heard immediately afterwards, scolding the slatternly girl.

Richard seemed rather more inclined to avail himself of the street-door than that of the apartment indicated; but, willing to oblige his sister, opened the latter,—which had been judiciously closed by Kate, when the report of the doings of Frank and his pupil had summoned her from a rudimentary flirtation with the stranger. Sabin found that person suspiciously near the said door, as if he had been listening to the recent uproar (as was indeed the case); a position he quitted in some confusion, to offer his hand to the in-comer.

"How d'ye do? Mr. Richard, how d'ye do?" he said, when Dick had ignored his salutation, with the exception of a brief nod. "Glad to see you again!—thought it was your father when you knocked. What a collection he has here!"—pointing to the pictures on the wall. "I've been admiring 'em. Any of your doing, now?"

"Some," answered the artist, with more than his usual nonchalance.

"Must be worth a good deal—the lot?" suggested Mr. Pennethorne, putting his head on one side, with an air of great interest and appreciation.

"About five pounds, including the frames," replied Sabin. It was a decided understatement, though few of the paintings possessed much merit. Whenever his father obtained a really good picture (and nobody was more capable of appreciating one), some financial crisis always swept it away; hence those ornamenting his abode were chiefly remarkable for their unobtainable qualities.

"In-deed!" Mr. Pennethorne elevated his eyebrows, and smiled approbatively, as if his opinion had been confirmed. But he looked distrustful afterwards, as though not quite sure of it.

Sabin, meanwhile, had seated himself and was regarding the man carelessly, yet with some of the instinctive observation of an artist—that is to say, one accustomed to take in a great deal through the visual medium. "Rather a Wilkie-like head," he decided, mentally; "rustic and strongly-marked and peculiar. I wonder I didn't notice him more, when I was introduced to him." And he closed his eyes momentarily, to ascertain if he remembered the countenance sufficiently to secure it on paper—if he should desire to do so.

The subject of this speculation had a long face, a high but narrow forehead, light gray eyes, and a nose more sharp than aquiline. He was five-and-thirty, but looked at least ten years older, notwithstanding his freshness of complexion; for his countenance exhibited a great many lines, especially in the region of the eyes. He wore little, reddish, stubbly whiskers, cut close to his cheek-bones, and the rest of his beard was so ill-shaven as to show marks of the razor. His mouth—always the most expressive of features after the eyes—would have been handsome, but for the thinness of his lips, and the presence of an uneasy smile, apparently habitual to it, the effect of which was decidedly unpleasant: you could scarcely avoid inferring from it a want of candor and manhood, probably originating in a too eager desire of propitiation, or some similar infirmity of character. Dressed in a plain suit of clothes of countrified cut, with hob-nailed shoes, and holding in his hand a hat of obsolete fashion, Mr. Pennethorne had very much the appearance of a cunning, complaisant, rustic shop-keeper, instead of one whose real business—that of woolstapler and peltonager—might have been expected to impart to him something of the independence of manner of the farmers with whom he dealt.

"What might be the price of that, now?" he asked, indicating a little sketch in oil, of Kate Sabin, painted by her brother—a work of art exceedingly coveted by Paul Gower.

"Eighteen pence," responded Richard, with perfect gravity.

But the assertion was too much for the other's ignorance. "I shouldn't mind paying that for it," he said, with an admiring leer, and laughing; "for it's a picture of as nice a young lady as ever I see. Come, master Richard, you painters beant so bad off as that comes to, I warrant! There were one as took my father—not Master Franklin, you know—and he got three guineas for it. Dares say you've seen it on the staircase at Thrup—it used to hang in our parlor at home."

"Perhaps it's a pity it ever left that situation," said Dick, who resented the familiar allusion to his sister, and was, therefore, cooler and more repellent than before. And he seated himself at the open piano (upon which, notwithstanding the necessity for her presence elsewhere, Kate had been performing to Mr. Pennethorne), and began running his fingers up and down the keys. He was wondering what his cousin had brought the man there for; and meditating a speedy retreat to his own lodgings.

The woolstapler took a chair and drew it towards him, as though preparing for a conference.

"Muster Richard," he began, in his midland vernacular, and with that air of uncomfortable, superfluous deference which some underbred people employ, supposing it politeness—which only those akin to them in spirit can mistake it for, or like—"I want pretend to misunderstand you. What you've just said brings me to the subject I wanted to talk to you about—leastways in a roundabout kind of manner. That is your cousin, Harry Franklin. Don't think it a liberty—" Sabin had opened his eyes so extremely wide that the remark seemed called for—"I like the lad and 'u'd do a good deal to serve him, and you may be sure he wouldn't have brought me here if he didn't regard me as a friend. You'll admit that, now, won't you?"

"Well?" The admission—if such it might be considered—was of the faintest kind, but Mr. Pennethorne clutched at it and went on.

"Well, sir, he comes to town to talk with you about going to America. And I couldn't let him without speaking my mind on the matter." And here, instead of doing so, Mr. Pennethorne came to a dead stop.

Perfectly indifferent towards helping him on and, in fact, thinking his expression of any opinion on the subject an impertinence, Sabin said nothing, naturally increasing the woolstapler's perplexity. After an awkward pause he began again.

"What does he want to goo abroad for? He has got a good home here, and there's no occasion for his leaving it. I put it to you now?"

"I suppose he has a right to act upon his own inclinations." And Richard's recollection of his father's visit to Mr. Bligh that morning, and his object, imparted additional stiffness to his vicarious assertion of independence.

"To be sure! to be sure! But would it be advisable, do you think? Nobody wants him to goo. His father don't, and I'm sure my mother don't. You remember the commandment—'Honor thy father and mother that thy days may be —'"

Sabin interrupted him with open contempt. "I don't think it applies to step-mothers," he said; "and therefore I presume Harry Franklin will do as he pleases, without much apprehension of shortening his life by it."

Thus repulsed, Mr. Pennethorne seemed determined to speak directly to the purpose; which he did with more self-assertion than he had hitherto exhibited, and a proportionate improvement in his manner.

"Muster Richard, I know as well as you do how things are at Thrup Parva. There ain't no love lost between my mother and Harry Franklin, nor has been ever since she came into the house. The more's the pity. She's a woman as likes to have her own way—as all on us does, for the matter of that; it is but nat'ral. She made me mind when I was a boy, and I don't know as I'm much the wiser for it, either. Of course that's nothing to do with Harry; and, as his cousin, you sides with him, for which I'm not blaming you—blood's thicker than water, and ought to be. But his life ain't so bad that he needs to run away from it, as perhaps you suppose. It needn't be bad at all if he'd only keep a civil tongue in his yead and take things a little easy-like."

"That may be impossible. There's an old story about a sailor being flogged with the cat—strike high or strike low, there was no pleasing him."

Mr. Pennethorne did not, at first, appear to understand the illustration, but presently colored up in acknowledgment of it. "Tain't so bad as that comes to," he repeated, deprecatingly, yet with a little show of resentment. "And what is the good of rubbin' a sore place? 'A soft answer turneth away wrath, but grievous words stir up anger'—if people 'u'd remember that it 'u'd be all the better. What I want to know is this—Do you think Harry 'll improve his condition by cuttin' off to foreign parts? Jumpin' out of the frying-pan into the fire, I call it."

"Upon my word I don't see that we have the slightest right to discuss the question. And I'm certainly not going to do it with anybody but the person immediately concerned."

"But," persevered the other, apparently too much in earnest to be checked by the observation; "look at his position. Only son of his father, a man with land of his own—entailed, too, so that he can't will it away; and it's as sure to be Harry's, some day (if he's spared), as—as this ere hat's mine. Nothin' to do but just what he likes—lead the life of a gentleman-farmer—goo outshootin' and ride buntin' and everything, and only a few disagreeables at home to put up wi', as a sort of set-off and quilt-rent for the lot. 'That ain't the kind of young man as needs to goo emigratin'.' Suppose he were to be drowned, now—and it is a mortal sight of water, surely—why, you'd never forgive yourself for taking him."

Sabin began to play a lively tune upon the piano. Baffled by his determination to adhere to his resolution, yet evidently unwilling to abandon his object without another trial, Mr. Pennethorne made a great effort and recommenced: "I see as you've made up your mind as its no business of mine and — do'ee stop, please, if but for a moment. Have you heerd as Miss East'er talks of goin' too?"

Richard Sabin finished his musical performance with a flourish and a bang, and then very deliberately rose and put on his hat. "I think," he said, regarding the confused and irritated countenance of the woolstapler with a half-smile, in which there was some malice but more good-nature—"there have just as good reasons for consulting their own inclinations as I have, at present, for bidding you good morning." And without another word he quitted the room and the house, leaving Mr. Pennethorne in a great state of annoyance and exasperation.

Elder Hook tells a story which requires mere faith to believe than to swallow the yarns of Sinbad the sailor. He says that Mrs. Barnard Colby, of Warner, N. H., whom he visited last April to try the efficacy of prayer and anointing in curing the heart disease and consumption, with which she was lying dangerously sick, arose from her bed immediately after the ceremony and the next day was about the house doing her accustomed work. Suppose he should come here and try a small-pox case or two.—New York Evening Mail.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OXFORD HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1878. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED previously, Nine Hundred and Sixty-Seven Shares, $66,700.
W. A. THURSTON, West Newton, Mass., One Share, 100
$50,800

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending February 22, 1878.

Asahel Wheeler.....	$ 8.00	Chicago Pub. Library.....	3.00
Wm. H. Adams.....	3.00	Calvin B. Cook.....	3.00
W. H. Colcord.....	1.50	A. B. Chase.....	3.00
N. McLeod.....	50	H. W. Henning.....	3.00
Mrs. Benj. Cummings.....	18.00	J. Ehrmann.....	3.00
Abner R. Tucker.....	3.00	Gustavus Jacoby.....	3.00
Wm. C. Macy.....	3.00	Dan'l W. McLand.....	3.00
Wm. Howland.....	3.00	A. F. Corlie.....	75
Chas. H. Cornin.....	3.00	Eljah Whinery.....	3.00
Andrew B. Palmer.....	3.00	W. F. Allen.....	3.00
Geo. F. Parlow.....	3.00	Geo. Rutson.....	75
C. B. Thompson.....	75	H. A. Austin.....	1.00
A. G. Browne, Jr.....	3.00	Electa S. Keesee.....	1.10
R. F. Briggs.....	3.00	J. L. Mansfield.....	3.00
John F. Mills.....	3.00	Fred. Muller.....	3.00
Nelson Thwing.....	1.00	Mary S. Nichols.....	1.50
J. O. Chandler.....	75	Adolph J. Fix.....	1.50
S. Backett.....	3.00	E. R. Hyatt.....	1.00
A. L. Davis.....	3.00	Q. G. Warner.....	75
O. Merrill.....	75	Mrs. S. C. D'Aute-
W. K. Rogers.....	3.00	mont.....	3.10
D. A. Robertson.....	3.00	Augusta Clement.....	3.00
C. R. Powell.....	3.00	Mrs. W. A. Perkins.....	3.00
A. C. McAllister.....	1.00	C. H. Horsch.....	9.00
Geo. H. Fay.....	1.00	R. H. Ranney.....	10.00
Wm. H. Franklin.....	50	John T. Sargent.....	3.00
P. H. Bateson & Co.....	10.00	C. Auchard.....	3.00
P. H. Bateson.....	10.00	Mrs. M. J. Barker.....	3.00
Rev. J. E. Walton.....	20	F. L. Willis.....	1.50
Geo. S. Foster.....	10	L. J. Fuller & Son.....	3.00
Geo. C. Holt.....	10	Edward Twiss.....	20.00
W. H. Parsons.....	8.25	Mrs. J. C. Hill.....	45
E. F. Dinamore.....	48	Jesse Matteson.....	10
Chas. Almy.....	10.00	E. L. Davis.....	25
F. Gardner.....	10.00	Hugo Andriessen.....	10.00
F. Smith.....	75	Andrew E. Whitmore.....	20.00
W. H. Franklin.....	1.50	John J. Stevens.....	4.00
Jno. W. Poston.....	75	David Branson.....	7.00
Anna Mann.....	2.00	John S. Baldwin.....	7.00
John Christie.....	2.00	Geo. H. Francis.....	10.00
Q. Sturhevan.....	2.00	A. B. Chase.....	20.00
Andrew Ayle.....	2.00	James R. Stone.....	10.00
B. O. Brigham.....	2.00	T. A. Kinney.....	7.00
Noah Green.....	3.00	Walter F. Austin.....	2.50
John F. Stevens.....	3.00	Titus L. Brown.....	2.50
M. B. Jarvis.....	3.00	Beth Hunt.....	10.00
Irving L. Roberts.....	3.00	Mrs. C. B. Richmond.....	8.25
Mrs. C. E. Beecher.....	3.00	Chester A. Greenleaf.....	10.00
N. F. Leslie.....	3.00	Lucius A. Harbaugh.....	8.25
Joseph Barnhill.....	3.00	J. N. Randall.....	1.50
E. M. Twining.....	3.00	Chas. A. Finley.....	1.25
Chas. W. Buck.....	3.00

The Index.

MARCH 1, 1873.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers. The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under its general purposes.

No. 45. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWERS, TOLEDO, OHIO." All checks, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or respect in the fulfillment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

FRANCIS ELLSWORTH ABBOT, Editor
ANDREW WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor
GUSTAVUS BURGESS FREDERICKSON, THOMAS WENTWORTH HOBARTS, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLGREN, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MISS E. D. CHURCH, REV. CHARLES VOTAW (England), PROF. FRANK W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MORDECAI D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Please send all matter intended for any particular issue of THE INDEX at least a fortnight in advance of date. We shall be very greatly obliged by attention to this request.

Subscribers in New York complain that they are obliged to pay the carriers two cents on every copy of THE INDEX delivered to them. This is unnecessary. If they will only take the trouble to prepay the postage at the New York Post Office, the charge will be only five cents a quarter, or twenty cents a year. The receipt given will protect them, if shown, from all such extra charges as are complained of.

Mr. S. B. McCracken, of Detroit, has published a "Protest against Sectarianism in the University and other State Institutions," addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan. It has been circulating widely, accompanied by a printed form of petition "asking investigation as to the alleged sectarian character of the University of Michigan;" also by another circular signed by Mr. W. F. Jamieson, urging that numerous signatures be collected and sent to Mr. McCracken, at Lansing, by the first of March. All these documents are dignified in tone, strong in statement, and well arranged in form; and the protest itself is supported by such evidence as must justify it thoroughly in the eyes of all intelligent liberals. We are sorry not to have received the papers earlier; but we recommend to all our Michigan subscribers to interest themselves in the matter, and to send to Mr. McCracken for blank petitions.

An interesting case touching the right of women to hold office has been before the Court of Common Pleas in Toledo. Miss M. A. Sibley, who has been Deputy Clerk of the Court for eight years, is now threatened with non-confirmation this year, on the ground that, as a woman, she is not an elector, which qualification is required by the State Constitution. The question involved is whether the Deputy Clerkship is an "office" in the meaning of the law. The Woman Suffrage Association secured the services of Messrs. M. R. Waite, E. P. Bassett, and A. H. McVey; and the case, as might be expected, has been very ably argued. We do not profess to decide law-points; but common sense suggests that, after eight years of faithful and valuable service, it is rather late in the day to discover that Miss Sibley is ineligible to the position she fills. It is greatly to be hoped that a decision in her favor will be made by the court. But the unjust exclusion of women from the exercise of the electoral franchise lies at the bottom of the matter. The present case will in any event call increased attention to this great injustice.

DR. BARTOL ON THE LIBERAL LEAGUE.

The following note from Dr. Bartol should have no little weight with thoughtful radicals:—

BOSTON, Feb. 6, 1873.

MY DEAR ABBOT,—Spite of my perhaps congenital incapacity to be, save as a necessity, organized, be sure, and assure your friends, of my sympathy, as an observer of all, yet worker in my own way, with whatever honest League may be a genuine working power for the practical ends proposed.

Ever cordially yours,

C. A. BARTOL.

Believing as we do that the present movement to secure organized effort for the complete secularization of the American government will prove to be premature, unless men and women of the highest character give it the sanction of their approval, we are exceedingly gratified by this note; and cannot help saying that we honor the courage and fidelity with which this veteran radical hastens to give his approving word to the essential purpose of the movement. Without waiting till the adhesion of multitudes makes such a word easy and expected, he runs all risks, and fearlessly declares that the objects of the League are right. Let such an example stimulate others to evince likewise the "courage of their opinions."

WAITING WHILE THE WORLD MOVES.

Under the caption "Why Organize?" a communication will be found in another column from the Hon. George F. Talbot, of Portland, Maine. It is an exceedingly able, calm, and thoughtful criticism of the proposal to organize Liberal Leagues. Notwithstanding its length and the fact that scores of communications which ought to be printed are crowded out of our columns, its character is such as to entitle it to precedence. The subject itself, in our opinion, is one of the first importance; and it is so needful to hear the best that can be urged against the movement in question that we would invite special attention to this article from all who are interested in liberal organization. Let its arguments be carefully weighed, that the whole project may be abandoned if found to be wrong or unwise. Without attempting to answer all the objections made by Mr. Talbot, we intend now to note only a few points which seem most necessary to a just consideration of the subject.

1. We should be very sorry if the object of THE INDEX in proposing a union of all liberals should be generally regarded as "the ambition to take a census of its supporters," or any other species of private ambition. In that case, the only fitting response would be, and ought to be, universal reprobation. The object is solely to secure the complete and consistent secularization of our government, to the end of carrying out more thoroughly the American idea and promoting the higher development of American civilization. Let the just wrath of mankind confound and overwhelm all schemers who would cunningly abuse the confidence of the public by working for themselves under pretence of universal ends.

2. Is it true that "comeouterism is a mistake"? Equally good people differ on this point. We venture to say that the "one self-possessed parishioner, always in his pew," who disbelieves entirely what he hears from the pulpit, but who continues to pay his money year after year to support the public preaching of what he thus disbelieves, has by no means the influence over the preacher which Mr. Talbot imagines. The gradual decline of Orthodoxy is due to no cause so inadequate. It is rather the vast and increasing power of free thought outside of the churches, the general and growing enlightenment of the unchurched multitudes, to which this effect should be attributed. The same light of modern science which makes comeouters penetrate through the narrow windows of the church, and even shoots a fitful ray into the minister's study. When all literature is becoming permeated with scepticism as to the doctrines of Orthodoxy, and inspired with the new and larger faith of the age, every one who reads at all is more or less affected by it; and even Orthodox ministers read sometimes. We fear that the "self-possessed parishioner" flatters himself unduly, when he attributes such immense potency to his own mere presence at church.

3. Is it indeed "wiser and braver to stay in"? It may be wiser; hardly braver, since it costs absolutely nothing but the payment of a pew-tax, while comeouterism certainly makes a large draft on moral courage and self-sacrifice. In fact, the "insidious and salutary influence" ascribed to the stayinners negatives the supposition of any especial bravery on their part. Insidiousness is not a trait of high heroism.

4. The object of the proposed Liberal League is not to institute "a new cultus" in any sense. It is rather to leave the people free to decide for themselves, unawed by a State religion, whether they will have any cultus or not.

5. That every great change involves some incidental harm, and especially that every great change in religion involves it, may be true. But the Liberal League does not propose a change of religion. It simply says, "Remand religion to the brain and heart of the people, and no longer concede to it the unnatural and injurious support of the State." Yet, even if the institution of Liberal Leagues tends directly to help forward the great change in religion which is now going on, and will go on even without their help, the greater good that must ensue will infinitely overbalance the incidental harm. Mr. Talbot would surely not regret the Protestant Reformation, to which he alludes by way of instance. Should he then regret the greater reformation in progress now?

6. The main body of the article we are considering is devoted to a demonstration of the "pettiness" of the grievances which the Liberal League proposes to redress. Into the details of this demonstration we cannot now enter. Mr. Talbot says a great many very excellent things, with which we heartily agree; and we admire his style unfeignedly, as worthy of a dispassionate and discriminating thinker. With his main thesis, however, that the existing infractions of the American principle of non-union of Church and State are "petty grievances," we can by no means agree. No infraction of a great principle can be "petty." It is a fundamental part of most of our State constitutions that no one can be legally taxed to support any religious beliefs, especially those not his own. We do but point out wherein this wise and just provision is infringed. It is not the amount of the tax, but the assumed right to tax at all, that constitutes the grievance. When Mr. Talbot says, "The fraction of a cent you pay for all governmental praying is not worth computing," we admit it; and we have never computed it. But that on this account it is "not worth mentioning," by no means follows. "The duty was now taken from everything except tea," says Mr. Venable in his account of the Revolution, "and on that it was reduced to three pence a pound; but the right to impose any tax at all was denied, and no tea was imported." That is the issue now. We deny the right of the government to tax us even to the amount of one mill for the support of any religion; and that denial must be made by every man and woman who knows what religious liberty means. Taxes are generally paid in the gross, without specification of the uses to which they will be applied; and it is by subsequent appropriation that the money is devoted to religious uses. Were it not for this fact, many a stern protest would be made which now there is no opportunity to make. A great revolution was worthily inaugurated by the refusal to pay three pence; a still greater revolution would then be worthily inaugurated by the refusal to pay even "the fraction of a cent."

In short, these so-called "petty grievances" are of momentous consequence, viewed in the light of principle; and it is for this reason that they demand redress. If the Liberal League is the best means to secure redress (and we believe it is), then it will most certainly be formed, sooner or later. The attempt may or may not succeed at present; but it is now, and always, reasonable to denounce an injustice and insist on its rectification. It is possible to stand still and wait while the world moves towards larger justice and higher civilization. It is also possible to take hold and help it move. Against those who prefer the former course, we have no reproaches to make; but, for our own part we judge it both "wiser and braver" to adopt the latter, and, while life lasts, to spend it in an effort, however humble, to hasten the advent of the nobler age.

THE MAMMON OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

The Puritan Captain Underhill, hero of the Pequot war, boasted to his fellow-saints that he had received his assurance of salvation "while enjoying a pipe of that good creature tobacco."

Since which he had never doubted it, nor ever should, though he should fall into sin. This fall unhappily soon occurred, and in a very flagrant manner; and it brought discredit on tobacco conversions, as being too liable to end in smoke.

Is smoke to be the end of many of our public reformatorys, in these days also? In view of recent developments, the Boston Post—never very Evangelical—speaks of the growing distrust of what are called "Christian statesmen;" and the New York Nation warns the Young Men's Christian Associations which endorsed Mr. Colfax, that, if these things go on, their endorsement will be enough to ruin a man's reputation. Not a man of those implicated in the Credit Mobilier had ever been implicated in any theological heresies, I believe. Mr. Harlan, who leaves Congress amid more general distrust than any one not involved in that perilous disaster, is the very senator for whom the Rev. Dr. Newman besought the support of the Methodist clergy, two years ago, on the ground that he was "regular at church and his influence" was "in the right direction." Captain Underhill did not carry himself more correctly at first, nor did he fall more absolutely at last, than these conspicuous gentlemen.

Nor are such undesirable conversions confined to the politicians. It is a common remark among brokers, that the great mistake made by Fisk & Gould was that they did not, like their rival, Daniel Drew, make friends of the mammon of righteousness by founding a theological school. It has been pointed out by lawyers, that the New York bar has at least put David Dudley Field on trial, but that Plymouth Church did not subject his partner, Mr. Sharswood, to even so much moral criticism as that. Can any one claim that the world's people now expect a man to pay his debts any better for being a church-member, or that a politician is more trusted for having just made a public profession of religion?

And even when we come to darker sins, the same reasonable distrust holds good. The modern Borgia, the woman who lately confessed to have poisoned husband after husband and child after child in mere wantonness, had experienced religion at seventeen; and the half imbecile criminal just convicted at Exeter, N. H., of the worst of crimes had been accustomed, as one witness states, to give public religious exhortations. Why are these things? Why do the Captain Underhills of this world make public boast of their piety? Because there are still many persons with whom this boast has a marketable value. When a criminal goes into any community to plan misdeeds, he is under no temptation to avow himself a heretic. Quite the contrary. All his temptation is the other way. He must go to church early and often; he must, if possible, exhort and teach and pray. It is a part of his stock in trade. The heretic is presumably an honest man at least; for, if he were dishonest, he would have no inducement to be a heretic.

The common answer to all this is, that the sincere church-member is like counterfeit coin, whose very existence proves the worth of the genuine. Yes; but when the counterfeit sufficiently abounds, it suggests the need of finding some other metal less easily debased. Again, there is this vast difference. In case of the coin, it is the makers of the genuine who are most ready to hunt down the counterfeiters; all their energy, all their zeal, is given to that. With the Church it is all the other way; the counterfeiters effect a lodgment in the mint itself, and it is the officers of the mint who stand by them longest. For this, Dr. Newman tried to bring the whole Methodist clergy of Iowa to protect Mr. Harlan; for this, Zion's Herald defends Daniel Drew to this moment, for aught I know, as an injured saint.

It is right that the "visible church" should have credit for any light that it monopolizes, but it must also be held responsible for the darkness that it protects. Constantly charging moral wrong-doing on those who keep aloof from it, there is justice in making it accountable for the wrong-doing which it shields. No matter how much good religious worship may do, the theory that there is a separate body of spiritual elect does harm. So long as merely joining an organization or partaking of bread and wine are counted for righteousness, hypocrisy can always find an easy cloak. It is the old Romish doctrine of Indulgences adapted to modern life. "The mammon of unrighteousness" may be a bad thing; but the mammon of righteousness is just now a greater danger. T. W. H.

THE BIBLE IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Speaking of Theodore Parker, Father Taylor once said: "This man tells us that we must destroy the Bible. Destroy this book! destroy this book!" said he (placing it under his arm and patting its leaves, as he paced up and down the pulpit); "I tell you, before he has marred the gilding on one of its pages, that man will have been in hell so long that he won't recollect that he was ever out." Whoever knew Father Taylor knew that the "old man eloquent" had too much heaven in his heart to send any one to hell for a very long time. He loved the Bible, but he loved man more, and though his volcanic feeling might fire him into hot maledictions sometimes, yet, when he had regained possession of himself, his curses would be changed to kisses and his blows to caresses. This man who thought Emerson was so good that "if the Devil got him he would never know what to do with him," and who could call Bartol his "sweetheart," could not have damned Theodore Parker "to any great extent."

And whoever has read Theodore Parker's eloquent and tender tribute to the worth of the Bible would know that that brave and reverent reformer never desired to destroy that book. He was fearless in his attacks upon the bibliolatry of his day and honestly exposed to the public view the follies and errors of the Bible; but no man loved and revered more its truths, or was more ready or able to advocate and defend them.

But to-day, as twenty years ago, the cry goes up against all who desire to secularize our government, and to that end would prohibit Bible-reading as a religious service in our schools: "Oh, you want to destroy the Bible!" "You are making a crusade against our Holy Bible!" "You want to kick the Bible out of the schools!" "You won't read the Bible yourself, and, like the dog in the manger, you are determined to prevent others from enjoying the privilege you decline." No; you misjudge our motives. We do not wish to destroy the Bible, nor "kick" it out of the schools, nor mar the "gilding on one of its pages." We would save it; for much of it is good for reproof, correction, instruction in righteousness, and all of it is valuable as the record of a peculiar people. But there is a time and place for all things, and the place for Bible-reading, we think, is not in the public schools.

Why was it put there? Because the Puritans, in the re-action from Catholicism which kept the Bible out of the hands of the laity, wished to put it into the hands of everybody in every place; because they had a superstitious belief that there was a peculiar charm in the book to ward off evil and ensure blessings; because they supposed government to rest on the Christian religion, and that to rest on the Bible; and hence it should be taught in schools as a political measure,—and perhaps in early days it was used sometimes as a reader, for the very good reason that they had no other book that could serve so well.

Why is the Bible now kept in the schools? The statutes in this State (Massachusetts) "require the daily reading of some portion of the Bible, without note or oral comment, in the public schools; but no scholar shall be required to read from any particular version whose parent or guardian shall declare that he has conscientious scruples against allowing him to read therefrom; nor shall the School Committee ever direct any school books, calculated to favor the tenets of any particular sect of Christians, to be purchased or used in any of the public schools." This statute has the appearance of fairness on its face, and no doubt was considered an ample concession to the scruples of conscience and a guarantee of justice and equality to all before the law. But it cannot satisfy those who desire the complete separation of Church and State. It may, however, be a long time before this law is repealed in favor of a more liberal one and absolutely just to all men and all faiths. We believe that, notwithstanding most Unitarians and Spiritualists in the State desire religious service in public schools to be discontinued, at least four out of five of the voting population of this Commonwealth to-day would oppose a repeal of the present law. The reasons commonly given are, first, "because it would please the Catholics. How they would crow over it as their triumph! No, sir, I won't give in to Catholics. If they don't like our laws, let them leave; when we go to Catholic countries we have to submit to their laws, and when they come here they must submit to our laws. This is a Protestant country; we have a right to put our Bible in our own schools. What toleration would they show to us if they had us by the throat? Look out for Spanish Inquisitions then! No, sir; I wouldn't give in to the Catholics," and so forth. To which we reply: "Let them crow; it may do them good and need not trouble you. You know that five million Catholics cannot coerce thirty-five million Protestants. 'Give in'? yes: be proud and glad to give in to justice. True, we must submit to their laws when we go to Catholic countries; but does that prove their laws just? They must of course submit to our laws, as they are in the minority; but let us not compel them to submit to unjust laws. If they would persecute us, then let us here retaliate by returning good for evil. The spirit of the Golden Rule is an answer to all such objections."

The second objection to removing the Bible from the schools is, that the government is founded on the Christian religion, and therefore the Bible, which is the source of Christianity, the government should secure to be taught in the public schools. Government founded on Christianity! we reply. Indeed! What Christian saint was it that inspired the "infidel" Jefferson to pen the Declaration of Independence? No; our republic grew out of the love of liberty and self-control, which are scarcely found taught in Christian Scriptures, directly or indirectly; rather the opposite—obedience to the spiritual authority of Christ and the temporal authority of the "powers that be." But granting that Christianity is the foundation of our republic, then the present system of Bible-instruction in the schools is a farce; for the laws of this State expressly provide that the teacher shall read from the Bible "without note or oral comment," and in such a manner as to give the least instruction possible. The reading is a bore to pupils who tolerate it because they must, and is generally a tedious perfunctory service to the teacher. We might dispense with it without any serious danger of starving the moral or religious nature of either teachers or pupils.

But, thirdly, it is kept in out of the force of habit, which is the governing force with the majority; the indisposition and hostility to any change.

If it were out, few would think of putting it in, even among those who protest loudest against its exclusion. Most Americans even are afraid to step out of the "sheep-walks," as Sidney Smith calls them. Practically, we think that Bible-reading in wholly Protestant schools neither hurts nor helps any one very much; but the evil of the bad principle breaks out when children of Jews, Catholics, Protestants, and anti-Christians are educated together, as they must be in many parts of our country.

Now, for the sake of social harmony, if for nothing more, we would exclude the Bible. Remove it because it is an offence in the nostrils of so many. Its use in schools furnishes the Catholics with a reasonable excuse to break up the public school system; it feathers the arrows they fire. Take it out of the school, and you disarm them. But we would remove it, moreover, because the State, which is bound to be unsectarian, does thereby give its sanction and moral support to the Protestant faith to the prejudice of all others. This is contrary to the spirit of our Constitution, contrary to justice, equal rights, and fair dealing, and the whole tendency of our laws. We shall never have rest, harmony, and peace, until Church and State are completely divorced. They have been bound together, like Siamese twins, long enough. The Bible in public schools is one of the last ligaments of this once powerful bond. Sever it, that religion and government may each march more freely. We believe that neither will bleed to death by the operation. The Church may, indeed, bleed a little at first; but it will lose nothing but its bad blood, be sure.

W. H. S.

PRAYER OR ADVERTISING--WHICH?

In a recent number of THE INDEX, Mr. Voysey has a letter in which he speaks of George Müller's famous Orphan Schools as supported by advertising rather than by prayer, as is claimed. As is well known, an annual Report of his Institution is printed and widely circulated, which sets forth its objects and the benevolent work it is doing, and states the amount of money that is necessarily expended annually in sustaining the work. This in itself is, of course, an appeal to the public for the needed means, even though there may be no direct asking for donations. Other means are also resorted to in order to keep the Institution before the public, and to attract the sympathies and aid of the charitable,—especially of the charitable in the Evangelical sects. Particular emphasis is laid upon the belief that to help such a cause is to lay up treasure in heaven. In short, as Mr. Voysey says, the whole process is "a gigantic system of advertising," adapted especially to Evangelical believers. It is just as much advertising as is the continual publication concerning their business which traders or shippers or insurance companies or any other business men are accustomed to make. Yet Müller says that his schools are supported "without applying to individuals for help;" that, since he started the work, he has received from the Lord, solely in answer to prayer, five hundred and forty thousand pounds.

A similar case, though on a smaller scale, of a charitable institution alleged to be supported by prayer, but where at least the sceptical will be likely to suspect advertising, has recently come under my notice on this side of the Atlantic. In Boston, there is an Institution known as the Consumptives' Home. One of its zealous friends, publishing a brief account of it a few weeks ago in a newspaper, says that some ten years since "a young physician in Boston began to pray that God would send him the means to open a hospital for poor persons afflicted with consumption." At the end of two years, "a small donation having been received for the purpose," the physician bought a house, and proceeded to establish the hospital. It is intimated that the donation was not of itself nearly sufficient to make the purchase, and that the purchaser had very little money of his own, but that he had faith that the necessary funds would be contributed. And in this he was not mistaken. The funds came, and the hospital was a success. The only question is, whether the funds came in answer to prayer or in answer to advertising,—from a secret appeal to God alone, or from an open appeal to the humanity in human hearts.

During the two years that the young physician was praying for the hospital but making no public manifestation of his object, it seems that only a "small donation" was received; it is not said that this did not come from friends who knew of his desire in the natural way, and believed in the object, without any supernatural intervention through prayer. However this may be, the writer of the communication to which I have referred says distinctly, that the good deacon of whom the house was purchased deducted $500 from his price for it "in consideration of its object." His humanity, then, it would appear, was appealed to successfully by simply informing him of the object. The fact of purchasing for such an object became a wider advertisement which immediately brought fresh contributions; and, when the house was ready for use, it was publicly dedicated and the benevolent project advertised in the best way possible. Two or three of the most honored and influential Evangelical clergymen of Boston took part in the services; the newspapers reported the proceedings; and the Institution was openly committed to the sympathies and cares of all charitable hearts, and particularly of all charitable hearts connected with Evangelical heads. From this time, the Institution has not lacked for friends or funds. Its work has prospered and been greatly enlarged, it being now an Evangelical mission as well as a hospital. It sends forth an annual Report which describes in detail its operations and annually advertises its financial needs. It keeps itself before the public by numerous contribution-boxes set in public places on which its wants are inscribed. Yet the claim is still made that the Institution receives its donations solely in answer to prayer. The last annual Report, after describing the philanthropic work, says:—

"Our sole trust for the entire support of the work is not in man, but in the living God, who has said, 'Ask, and ye shall receive.' During the past year, the Lord has sent us in cash, $46,201.47. For the eight years that the work has been established, without any solicitation from man, but in answer to prayer, God has sent the amount of $188,230.25. Also, in answer to prayer, towards building a Cancer House, $961.07; making, in addition to gifts of a previous year, $1,611."

Here is a plain statement that the Institution has been carried on for eight years, "without any solicitation from man." Yet not to speak of the tacit "solicitation" which is made to every benevolent person by the annual Report, and by newspaper notices describing the Institution, its contribution boxes make a very open "solicitation." I have copied the following inscription from one in the Post Office in New Bedford:—

"The Consumptives' Home, Boston, has no fund for its support.

"Please give one cent.

"He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord."—Prov. xix. 17."

I have seen similar boxes in banks and insurance offices; and the writer from whose article I have quoted says that these boxes are widely distributed, and bring in the course of the year a good deal of money.

In view of such facts, what can we say? That the managers of the Consumptives' Home are guilty of falsehood? That would doubtless be a harsh judgment, for they are evidently earnest people, and mean to be moral and humane. Their confession that the credit side of their account is kept by the Lord, even to the exactness of odd dollars and cents, is so naïve in its frankness as almost to suggest the hand of a caricaturist. We may admit, then, the sincerity; but is it not a case of conscience grievously deluded by a false theology? And more than this. When it is claimed that an institution is supported solely by prayer, would not every rational mind have more respect even for the sincerity of the claim, if the prayer were confined to the secret of the closet? If our young Evangelical physician had put up his prayer for a hospital wholly in secret, he could certainly receive more credit for consistency of faith, but probably would have got very little money and no hospital. His belief in prayer as the means may have quickened his own earnestness; but after all, he really relied on the "tender mercies" that are natural to the human heart, and through which the spirit of Infinite Love is ever flowing to manifest itself in all good works.

W. J. P.

LONDON LETTER.

THE KNIGHT CASE—THE SIN OF EXCHANGING WITH A UNITARIAN—THE WALLACE CASE—HETERODOXY IN THE PROFESSOR'S CHAIR.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—It is my aim, in writing most of my letters to you, to keep your readers posted up on the "signs of the times;" and I trust that I do not wrongly reckon on their interest in what is passing in Great Britain on all subjects connected with religious progress.

In my last letter, I gave you some account of the proceedings instituted against the Rev. George Porter, rector of St. Leonard, Exeter. I am happy to say that his prosecutors have thought twice about the chances of success, and have ignominiously backed out of their hazardous undertaking.

According to my promise, I will now tell you something about the Rev. William Knight, minister of the Free Church in Scotland, who is likely to exercise considerable influence in modifying—or perhaps overthrowing—that Scotch Orthodoxy which has hitherto been so inimitably severe. Last year, the Presbytery of Dundee summoned Mr. Knight to show cause why he had ventured to preach in the Unitarian pulpit of the Rev. James Martineau. The arguments of his accusers chiefly turned on the outrageous act of violating precedent. "Such a thing had never been done before." "It was an atrocious scandal." "It was a dishonor to our blessed Lord, the second Person of the Trinity." Such was the substance of the charges; and the movers in the prosecution made the most of them because Mr. Knight's sermon contained nothing that they could stigmatize as heresy.

His defence was that the law of the Church had no provision against such an act; and that it was out of his loyalty to Christ that he had gone amongst those who did not believe in his deity, in order to convert them to a better mind. In this case, the law was so clearly on his side that even the Presbytery could do no more than tell him he had done very wrong, and hope "little Billy won't do it again."

Soon after that acquittal, Mr. Knight published a lecture on the "Ethics of Subscription," which gave rise to another judicial inquiry, but was again followed by the same result. They were obliged to let him alone.

At length the Presbytery of Dundee, evidently swayed by the fierce zeal of the orthodox champion, Dr. Wilson, has been moved a third time to take proceedings against Mr. Knight. In the Contemporary Review for this month, he published an article on Prayer, which certainly is, in its way, one of the most remarkable signs of progress in North Britain which we have yet seen in the ranks of the clergy.

I need not quote from the Review, but merely say that Mr. Knight's views, as therein stated, are as advanced as any you may find among Theists. He repudiates all attempts to interfere with Nature, or Providence, which he recognizes as already perfect and complete. He discourages prayer even for food (and thus brings himself into antagonism with the Lord's Prayer, "give us this day our daily bread"); and he says that the proper objects of prayer are spiritual blessings. These are the chief points worthy of notice in the paper which is now under legal scrutiny.

In passing, I may mention that, as usual in such cases, Dr. Wilson, his chief accuser, said that "in some sentences the lecture appears to me to advocate entirely atheistic principles;" although he held in his hands a petition to the Presbytery, signed by the lay agitators against Mr. Knight, in which occurred the following words: "He does not . . . shut the spirit (of man) out from direct intercourse with God, or of God from it." His own accusers admit that Mr. Knight is at least theistic in his views; and yet Dr. Wilson, who endorses and presents the petition in which that admission is made, has the effrontery to attribute to him atheism.

Fortunately, Mr. Knight has some friends in the Presbytery; probably some deep sympathizers. But more than one member, during the discussion as to proceedings being taken or not, gave unmistakable signs of the orthodox fear and panic lest the agitation and vindication of Mr. Kulight's views should do more harm than good to the cause of Christianity.

So far, Dr. Wilson has gained a committee of three to study thoroughly and report on the Essay on Prayer; and then the real tug of war will commence, when the Presbytery will have to take action in the matter, or leave it to drop through their sheer inability to tackle so able an opponent as Mr. Knight.

Another little triumph of heterodoxy has just been gained in Edinburgh, where Dr. Wallace has been presented by Mr. Gladstone to the chair of Church History in the University. A special meeting of the General Assembly was called to consider the best means of cancelling the appointment, at which Mr. Milne Home succeeded in carrying a resolution to the effect that "on various grounds the appointment was likely to be prejudicial to the interests of the Church and of religion in Scotland, and that this opinion be immediately communicated to Her Majesty's Government."

Happily, in this case, the orthodox party were foiled and Dr. Wallace's appointment was confirmed. His sympathies are manifestly in the direction of freedom, if not absolutely heretical; and although he has not lately said anything that could be made the ground of accusation, we cannot forget his masterly "Essay on Burns," into which he had every opportunity of introducing views which are fatal to the old religion; and every such opportunity he not only seized, but vigorously used.

Altogether, progress in Scotland is much more rapid than could have been expected; but the Scots, alas! have a far deeper awe of "Mrs. Grundy" than even we Englishmen have; and the consequence is that the land, undermined though it be by heresy, is full of hypocrisy.

I am, sir, very sincerely yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE,

DELWICH, S. E., Jan. 31, 1873.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

HOSPITALER HALL is an institution in Boston not by any means to be omitted in any complete review of the reformatory phenomena of the time. What else the hall is used for I do not know; but if one is asked, "Have you been to Hospitaler Hall?" the person who puts the question, at least, means to inquire if you have attended the Sunday discussions that are held there. I believe that there are three sessions every Sunday; and, if the weather be fair, the hall is on each occasion well filled. Who goes there? Well, everybody. That is, men and women with all sorts of ideas in their heads, representing nearly every sect inside of Christianity and outside, too. A strange and motley crowd, one might say, and yet feel a large degree of respect for both audience and speakers. There appears to be great liberty of speech, and also of interruption: at times, one feels that "heaven's first law" might be put in force there to read advantage. The din of voices sounding from all parts of the room is occasionally overwhelming. But on the whole, the presiding officer holds this turbulence fairly in check, and secures fair play to all sides. As to sides, there is perhaps this general division of Liberal and Christian; a Roman Catholic professor leading the latter, while Mr. Horace Seaver is undoubtedly the champion of the former. When he enters, he is received with a round of applause. He seems to have won the respect of all parties, and, when he speaks, he is listened to with close attention. He is a pointed and intelligent debater. His ten-minute speech will have a beginning, an ending, and also a body. A stranger will be surprised to hear loud calls for Shakespeare and for other gentlemen with names not less known to fame. "Shakespeare" is a champion of Spiritism. Just how the man became thus re-christened, I have not learned. But some years ago—for these discussions are not exactly a modern institution—as I remember, there was a man on the floor wildly gesticulating, when suddenly he cried, "As the immortal William Shakespeare has recently said through the mouth of"—he called the name of a distinguished spirit-medium which I will here omit. Suffice it to say that the shouts of laughter, repeated again and again, were more than sufficient to drown the quotation. Possibly the man thus interrupted, and he who last night responded to the call for "Shakespeare," are one and the same. The debate last evening was on the question, "Has Free Religion proposed anything new?" Neither side contributed much to enlighten the ignorant; but it must be confessed that the question has its difficulties. It is to be said, however, that these debates are not infrequently conducted with much ability, and some of the speakers show much research and close thinking. What is the good result? Well, I suppose the result from year to year is not easily measured. Who is able to track the wind? "Ye hear the noise thereof, but cannot tell whence it came, or whither it goeth."

THE EVANGELICAL CLERGYMEN of the city are not of one mind on the subject, but a goodly number under the lead of Dr. Fulton are moving to get the Public Library closed again on Sundays. Says one of these clergymen, "There is no need of opening the library to supply reading, as the churches afford ample means of instruction." Indeed! Why not shut up the churches also, if they are engaged in the same heinous business? Is there any sane reason for their holding the monopoly? Suppose a large proportion of citizens do not like their "means of instruction," have they any right to say—"Our food or none?" But then, opening the Public Library "will tend to desecrate and secularize the Christian Sabbath." If Christians want a Sabbath, let them have it. If others don't, need Christians interfere? But the Library is public property. Well, hasn't it always been the property of the public? Christians have had their way, controlling this public property, shutting it up on Sundays for years. The doctrine may not be in the New Testament, but, for all that, "turn about is fair play." There is little danger, I think, that this clerical protest will bear much fruit.

ABOUT THE TIME HEPPWORTH turned Evangelical, a Mr. Powers left the Orthodox camp for Unitarian liberalism. The two sects swapped horses. The Unitarians think that they got the better man, and I doubt not they think rightly. But Mr. Powers is only a "Liberal Christian;" and he, like all others of that denomination, makes it a subject of deep study how he can get hold of the great, outside, un-church'd, rational world, and "liberal-church" it. In his discourse here yesterday, Mr. Powers is reported as saying:—

"This time of ours is very like that in ancient Palestine. Now, as then, there is to be noted unrest, hypocrisy, corruption in high places. It is, also, a characteristic of the day, this presence of a vast multitude of people whom Christ's own words fitly describe as 'sheep without a shepherd.' Here in Boston, to the South and to the West, are several millions of fellow-citizens, who have broken with the traditional church, many of whom are striving for something that shall fill the place of Christianity. What shall be done with these? The great church organizations in the land, though doing an immense amount of good to those to whom they preach, are powerless in this matter. The Romish Church—because it is a foreign church, because it has set itself in opposition to the spirit of the age, because it believes in an infallible Pope and exclusive salvation for those within its fold—cannot influence these men. Again, the churches called Evangelical, or Orthodox, are unable to supply spiritual good to this vast number for similar, though modified reasons. Instead of an infallible Pope they have an infallible book, and there is a supremacy of the catechism, if not of a church. There is visible in the conduct of these churches a fear of science and human progress. The other day the Popular Science Monthly was removed from the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, in New York, because of supposed irreligious matter contained therein. Such significant facts as this, and the refusal to allow Mr. Wells to deliver a course of literary lectures in Association Hall because his theology is not sound, makes it impossible for the so-called Evangelical churches to make headway in this matter.

Is free religion sufficient? The preacher thought not, because it is a speculation rather than a religion, meeting the wants of a class, not those of all mankind. The heart is left out of consideration. What is wanted is to reach all the wants of the human mind, to bring about a complete development of man's powers."

The programme as embodied in the last sentence is generous and shows a recognition of what is coming. But I hold to my distrust of the efficacy of such universal institutions. Is it not a little remarkable that our brother, viewing these "millions" who are "striving for something that shall fill the place of Christianity," should be asking, "What shall be done with these?" As though they were not like himself, taking care of themselves! What has he to offer? A homoeopathic prescription of the same thing they have put aside and would free themselves from? "No," he replies; "thank God, we liberals have no fixed creed, but we have the truth, which is ever new." Well, we all are heirs of the same inheritance, if we choose to be, and that without church or priest.

I WAS RECENTLY PRESENT at a funeral where the services were conducted by the venerable Dr. Kirk of this city. The old man is nearly blind, and feeble. Before him lay the body of a young man who had, as Christians are wont to say, "died in his sins." That is, he was not a member of any church. Broken down in the war, in which he served as captain of a company, doing his duty well and winning the respect of his men, he returned home an invalid, dependent on his mother's care up to his death. Dr. Kirk drew a lesson, both from his own physical condition and from the event that had called the company together, of the uncertainty of life, and pressed home the question, "Are you prepared?" If not, why? Were you going to Europe, you would not start off without preparation. How much more important to prepare for eternity! How can you go and face God without first obeying him? Will you depend on his mercy? His mercy is hid away in Christ. And so the doctor proclaimed and illustrated salvation by the blood of Jesus. This to the living, warning all to "prepare" in season. He spoke of the aged widow, her church-membership, her dependence on Christ: how it fortified her for the great trials of her life. On returning home, this woman only said, I am told, "I didn't want him to talk of me: if he had only said something about my boy!" That was the omission. The silence told but too plainly that in the doctor's mind there was no ray of hope for the soul of this widow's son. And such is Orthodoxy. What of the young man? Somewhat could be said not to his credit. But all that could be overlooked, had he professed a faith in Christ. Much could be said in his favor, all of which would pass for naught. Well, right here is where humanity, common sense, and justice take issue with this whole Christian scheme, and pronounce it a libel on the character of the universe, a base slander of God Almighty. If the virtues of this young man stick to him in the hereafter, as they have done here in spite of great temptations which he could not altogether parry or escape, I think there is little danger but he will hold his own, and improve upon his capital stock. Is it possible that a being calling himself God will confront him there, to deny him the opportunity? Will he say to the trembling soul, "My mercy is hid in Christ, and you should have sought it before you came hither; you have sealed your own fate, and must dwell in torment forever"? I think a soul might have the courage of a smile in such a presence, perceiving well that it stood only before some huge impostor, while the great I AM it had still to meet. No; if fair play be not a ministering angel in the other world, a poor, barren world it is! Heaven?—

"The strong gods pine for my abode,
And pine in vain the sacred seven;
But thou, meek lover of the good,
Find me, and turn thy back on heaven!"

The American Board reports that the past year has not been marked by any especial revivals in its missions, though 919 members have been added by profession to its churches. Within the year, fourteen ordained missionaries, one physician, not ordained, and fourteen women have left the United States as new laborers, including seven for Turkey, one for India, six for China, three for Japan, one for Spain, six for Austria, and three for Mexico. Eight have returned to their old fields; while twenty-five have been constrained to return home, of whom some will not return to their fields. Two have been removed by death; so that, leaving out the new missions in nominally Christian lands, the number of missionaries at work has not been increased or diminished. Of the more important missions, that in Western Turkey reports 23 churches, 983 members, of whom 93 were received by profession during the year. Central Turkey has 23 churches, 1,868 members, 15 native pastors, and 7,746 registered Protestants. Eastern Turkey has 28 churches, 23 pastors, 1,181 members, of whom 107 were added by profession during the year, 6,686 registered Protestants and over 3,000 scholars under instruction. The Madura Mission has 27 churches and 1,485 members, of whom 117 were added by profession during the year. There are in all 16 missions, 77 stations, 445 out-stations, 121 ordained missionaries, 12 physicians and other male laborers not ordained, 175 female assistants, 95 native pastors, 242 native preachers and catechists, 419 school-teachers, 173 churches, 9,019 church-members (so far as reported), of whom 919 were added during the year, 15,480 pupils in common schools and 1,642 adults under instruction.—Independent.

There may not be much wine, and probably only very little milk, in the Free Religious lectures at Horticultural Hall, but they can now be bought without money and without price. At last, the poor are to have the new gospel preached to them. If they fail to listen, it will not be because their ears are stopped with fractional currency. This is well, for Free Religion at half a dollar a head always impressed us as a contradiction in terms. In the course of human events, the common people may yet be admitted to the Radical Club, where democratic principles are now proclaimed under aristocratic auspices.

Having indulged in at least enough criminal levity about this serious subject, we now say in our most solemn manner, that we think the Horticultural Hall lectures promise to be interesting ones. The ability of the speakers, and the importance of their themes, warrant, and will doubtless ensure, a good attendance. Probably the most of our ministers who can command the leisure will be sure to hear Mr. Gannett, at least. His hereditary interest in his topic, and the absolute fairness of his mind, give him rare qualifications for his task.—Christian Register.

Mr. Frothingham's congregation has repudiated the name of church. They wish to be known as "The Independent Society."—Independent.

Literary Department.

NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS.—All books designed for review in these columns must be addressed to THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

RECEIVED.

THE PILGRIM AND THE SHRINE: OF PASSAGES from the Life and Correspondence of HERBERT AINSLIE, B. A., late a student of the Church of England. London: CHAPMAN & HALL, Piccadilly. New York: G. P. PUTNAM & SONS, 1871.

HIGHER LAW: A Romance. By the Author of "The Pilgrim and the Shrine." New York: G. P. PUTNAM & SONS, TINSLEY BROTHERS, London. 1872.

BACKLOG STUDIES. By CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER, Author of "Saunterings," "My Summer in a Garden," etc. With Twenty-one Illustrations by AUGUSTUS HOPPIN. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO. 1873.

THE SPY: A Tale of the Neutral Ground. By J. FENIMORE COOPER. Illustrated from Drawings by F. O. C. DABLEY. New York: D. APPLETON & CO. [Paper.]

THIRD ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BUREAU OF STATISTICS OF LABOR, of Massachusetts, embracing the Account of its Operations and Inquiries from March 1, 1871, to March 1, 1872. Boston: WRIGHT & POTTER, State Printers. 1872. pp. 506.

THE FAITH IN IMMORTALITY. A Sermon by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached at Lyric Hall, Dec. 15, 1872. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1873.

SACRILEGIOUSNESS. An Address delivered to the Members and Friends of the National Sunday League, by GEORGE J. WILD, LL. D., at St. George's Hall, Dec. 8, 1872. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, London.

SCIENTIFIC AND INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION: ITS IMPORTANCE TO OUR COUNTRY. Lecture in behalf of the Toledo University of Arts and Trades, in Odeon Hall, Toledo, Ohio, Dec. 10, 1872. By G. B. STREIBER, of Detroit, Mich. Detroit: DAILY POST, BOOK AND JOB PRINTING ESTABLISHMENT. 1872.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. March, 1873. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO.

THE GALAXY. March, 1873. New York: SHELDON & CO.

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE. March, 1873. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

ARTHUR'S ILLUSTRATED HOME MAGAZINE. March, 1873. Philadelphia: T. S. ARTHUR & SON.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR. March, 1873. Philadelphia: T. S. ARTHUR & SON.

THE PENN. MONTHLY. February, 1873. Philadelphia: 606 Walnut St.

THE HERALD OF HEALTH. February, 1873. New York: WOOD & HOLBROOK.

THE MICHIGAN FREEMASON. January, 1873. Kalamazoo, Mich.: ILLING BROS.

OUR YANKEE LAND. February, 1873. Detroit: A. W. BAIRD.

PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. February, 1873. New York: R. R. WELLS.

THE ILLUSTRATED ANNUAL OF PHRENOLOGY AND PHYSIOGNOMY. 1873. New York: R. R. WELLS.

SCHLÖGE IN DER SCHULE? VON DR. TH. MERTENS, DIRECTOR DER STADTSCHEITERSCHULE II. ZU HANNOVER. (Blows in School? By Dr. Th. Mertens, Director of the Second City School for Girls in Hanover.) Hanover, 1873. 8vo. pp. 47.

This brochure bears the exceedingly appropriate motto: Supere aude! The author thereof has most nobly followed his own injunction. Blows are as old as history itself; the infliction of them has been one of the great motive powers of civilization, and will doubtless continue to be. They may be regarded as that universal language of which many have dreamed, which is understood and spoken everywhere, and is often potent and persuasive where all other means of conviction fail. Every child may be said to be born into this world with the right to strike and to be struck, in certain contingencies. War is the exercise of this right in the highest instance. Now one of the surest marks of human progress is the growing clearness of vision in respect to rights and to the limits within which they may be made good. There was a time when bodily chastisement was everywhere recognized as a legitimate means of compelling one person to do the will of another. It was thought to be the proper way of governing wives, children, and servants, in particular. Directions in regard to the infliction of corporal punishment have been found in the ancient pyramids. We all know that it is frequently referred to in the Bible. In Sparta, youths were subject to be beaten until the age of thirty. Aristophanes turned the arrows of his wit against those who objected to it. On the walls of Herculaneum there is preserved to us an illustration of how it was practised when Rome was in its glory. And so the record might be extended, with illustrations from various countries, down to the present day.

"Blows in school" have a history which is inseparable from that of education itself. They have been administered wherever schools have existed; and to-day there is no country that has been found wise enough to prohibit them. Nor have they been confined in their application to the younger scholars. Milton was flogged after he became a student. Even as late as the end of the last century (1798), Minister Rochow could in Prussia threaten to punish disturbances of the peace among university students by flogging. So Burke, when questioned as to the principles on which instruction was given in Eton, only needed to point to a forest of birch; and an old instructor could boast that he had walloped every member of the House of Peers. The palm, however, in this department of culture, undoubtedly belongs to a Saxon schoolmaster, Johann Jacob Häuberle, who died at the beginning of the present century, and who has been immortalized by Jean Paul. It seems that this genius kept a record of his achievements. "Who of us," says Richter, "can boast, like Häuberle, of having in fifty-one years and seven months of school teaching inflicted 911,527 blows with the stick and 124,000 with the switch? Then 20,989 raps on the ends of the fingers with the ruler, 10,235 slaps on the mouth, 7,905 boxes on the ear, and 1,115,800 fillops on the head? Who, like him, has given 22,763 nota-benes, now with the Bible, then with the catechism, at one time with the hymn-book, at another with the grammar? And did he not make 1707 children hold up the rod with which they were not whipped, 777 kneel upon round pens, and 631 upon a sharp wooden prism, and to all these did he not add a corps of 5001 dunce-cap wearers?" But perhaps, after all, the Saxonian pedagogues seems to have distanced all others in his disciplinary achievements only because others were not careful to keep an account thereof. Still, an average of 175 punishments per day, counting the school-days at 250 to the year, would not be easy to beat.

But, universal as has been and is the practice of beating children in school, the opposition is by no means of recent birth. The names of such men as Terence, Plautus, Seneca, Quintilian, Plutarch, Erasmus, Luther, Melancthon, Montaigne, Charron, Comenius, Rollin, Fénelon, Rousseau, and Schleiermacher, may be mentioned among those who have lifted up their voices in various ways against the barbarism of teachers. Schleiermacher said: "Corporal punishment must disappear also from the popular schools. The degree to which they can dispense with it, without detriment to order, may be regarded as the measure of their moral perfection." In modern times, there has been a quite general endeavor to suppress and exclude all the grosser forms of such punishment. In most European countries, for instance, there are restrictions concerning it in the laws and ordinances which govern the schools. Nevertheless, there are as yet but few schoolmasters anywhere who are convinced that it would be better to banish the rod from the school altogether. Among the few is Dr. Mertens, the author of the pamphlet before us. Assuredly, the children could not have a more enthusiastic or an abler advocate. Not but that he is a thorough believer in the necessity of punishment, and even of corporal punishment in certain cases. But he ~~would~~ have the latter inflicted only in the family, and even there he would restrict it to the nursery; that is to say, he would not make use of it (except in very extraordinary instances) after the child has attained its third year. He insists on children being trained to obedience before this age; and inasmuch as they can scarcely be said to be amenable to reason before that, he would as the ultima ratio use the rod. He is not much of an admirer of that refinement of silliness and cruelty which insists that the delinquent shall never be punished except when the blood of the person who takes the matter in hand is at the freezing point. The amount of heat which is incident to righteous anger may be said to be absolutely necessary to make the punishment human and humane.

Dr. Martens follows Rosenkranz in dividing pedagogical punishment into three kinds, corresponding to different ages: corporal punishment for the age of childhood; deprivation of liberty for girls and boys; punishments affecting the sense of honor for youths and young women. His little book gives evidence on every page of the experienced teacher, and at the same time of great love and respect for children. It would be of great service to both teachers and parents in this country, if it were made accessible to them.

T. V.

—The Saturday Review says that "the great mass of preachers seem really to forget that those to whom they are speaking are Englishmen of the nineteenth century;" that "it is strange how the Judaic leaven clings to us, an inheritance alike from mediæval and from Puritan times, but decidedly a case of salt which has lost its savor;" that "the ordinary average sermon never thinks of dealing directly and in plain words with the particular state of life of those who hear it," and that the theology and morality given by the pulpit "seem not to belong to England now, but to Judea in ages past."

—A minister of the Free Church of Scotland, Mr. W. Knight, has made himself liable to prosecution for heresy, and is to be proceeded against, for advancing views of prayer which considerably dilute the usual superstition on that subject. Mr. Knight does not believe that Deity "interrupts the working of his machine, to prove that he is there behind it." He considers such a notion "the offspring of the very rudest anthropomorphism," and describes the Orthodox idea as follows: "It is supposed that, having created a tiny creature, and brought him into the midst of the universal order (a creature that scarcely ever comprehends the meaning of that order), the Supreme Artificer finds it expedient continually to announce himself by an alteration of the course and destination of phenomena, at the unlightened (it may be the selfish) call of that creature; and that he does so while at the same time his presence is ceaselessly revealed within every pulse and movement of the universe." Mr. Knight earnestly declares, speaking of the chain of cause and effect, that "catastrophe, the breaking of the chain, is simply inconceivable."

—A recent history of the English city of Liverpool says that, in the days when the great part of the African slave-trade was carried on by Liverpool ships, the slave-dealers, however atrociously they dealt with their stolen fellow-creatures, took care to be polite and forbearing towards Providence. Bills of lading declared such and such cargoes of human, living, suffering flesh were "shipped by the grace of God." The ruffian who was styled Master of the slave-ship held his office "under God," and the vessel was said to be bound "by God's grace" to West Indies, with a prayer endorsed on the bill to this effect: "God send the good ship to her desired port in safety."

—A correspondent of the London Athenæum relates notes of conversations with Mr. Buckle, the great English freethinker. Mr. Buckle was a great tea-drinker, and said that only one lady he knew could make tea properly, and that he had taught that one; and even then she sometimes made a mistake, and spoilt a brewing by not sufficiently seasoning the spoon with which she put the tea into the pot. He said also that he never got a first-class dinner at a married man's house. It was Mr. Buckle's opinion that Froide's estimate of Henry the Eighth was very near the truth. He inclined to the belief that the different races of men were originally from one stock. Having seen some of the phenomena of spiritualism so called, he avowed his conviction that they perhaps pointed to some new force well worthy of scientific investigation, although he would not admit that there was anything supernatural about them. One day, after visiting the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem to witness the so-called miracle of the descent of fire from heaven, Mr. Buckle remarked: "Pious frauds have been considered allowable in all ages of the Church." He said that he believed the New Testament, after eliminating the supernatural; that he considered Jesus the greatest civilizer and teacher of mankind that ever lived; that his life even compelled belief that he was divinely inspired; and that next to Jesus as a civilizer he put William Shakspeare.

—The English had lately a praying-day for missions, and now the journals contain reports of what is said about it by able Hindu journals in India, which comment very sharply on "that nuisance, the missionary." The Bombay Argus says that "there is as much probability of the English throwing off their Christianity as there is that Christianity will be the religion of the people of India." The Madras Times says that the English archbishop should have taken stock of what missions have already accomplished in India—or have failed to accomplish—before inviting the faithful to spend more money on the venture. It says that the missionaries succeed in conducting schools scarcely one of whose pupils ever turns out a Christian, and that money given to spread the Bible and the catechism goes to furnish "heathens" with mere secular education. It concludes thus: "Many of the people at home would be rather surprised if they only knew how the money subscribed by them was spent. . . . It would be only right of the different societies to let them know how matters stand."

—The London Examiner, in reviewing an Orthodox series of lectures on "Faith and Free Thought," remarks as follows: "We are convinced that, if any intelligent readers take up these volumes, their faith is very much more likely to be shaken than to be confirmed by what they read." The lecturers are described as "advocates for God," and the Examiner points out how they "show themselves skilled in the disreputable ways of Orthodox special pleading." Of a Dr. Boulbee's performance it says: "He admits that the Jews were a coarse and brutal race, and he virtually tells us that the God whom they worshipped could not help being coarse and brutal, if he wanted to preserve any authority over them. Dr. Boulbee says: 'Was anything higher and better possible consistently with that age of the world and the state of that people? Look at them as they are photographed before us in the Bible. Mark their relapses into idolatry—their utter failure to escape the polytheism or pantheism that reigned around them. Mark well the direful reign of lust. See the hard Eastern cruelty. Could you in that age and for that people strain the standard higher?' 'Let me ask one short question,' says Dr. Boulbee, 'which will suggest all we need: Can we here, whatever our moral standard may be in this nineteenth century, abolish brothels?' Dr. Boulbee does not add, but he forces us to infer from his question and its context that, seeing that nineteenth century statesmen cannot put down brothels, the God of the Jews—whom we are also asked to accept as the God of the Christians—was justified, not only in encouraging rape among his subjects, but even in using for that pastime their holiest places. What else are we to believe, if we are to see no 'moral difficulties' in the thirty-first chapter of the Book of Numbers, which records that the children of Israel, after slaying all the males and married women of Midian, were ordered, 'in the name of the Lord,' to outrage all the virgins of the hated race, to the number of thirty-two thousand, with the exception of thirty-two selected damsels who were handed over to Eleazer as 'the Lord's tribute'?

Dr. Boulton's lecture contaminates the whole volume, and scandalises the whole Christian Evidence Society. In publishing and republishing that lecture, the Society brands itself forever as a body with which honest men should not disgrace themselves by attempting to argue. If the 'faith' that the Christian Evidence Society attempts to strengthen be of that sort, surely the time is at hand when 'free thought' will master it. The only use of such a society is to show the weakness and the grossness of the opinions it undertakes to uphold.

—In commenting on the loss of the steamer Northfleet and over three hundred lives, the London Spectator remarks on the failure of Christian faith to remove the fear of death. It says: "What strikes us as most remarkable is that the spiritual faith of centuries seems to have had so very little result in overcoming this weakest of all paralyzing terrors. . . . How is it that by this time there is not a far larger number of persons who, in the immediate expectation of death, feel rather a curious desire for the change before them than anything like alarm? How strange that centuries of a faith which, if it teaches anything, teaches spiritual presence of mind and dependence on God, should have apparently had no effect in nerving the spirit in the face of sudden danger and death! The physiological speculations which seem to show that even mental and moral tendencies are inherited, make the want of this presence of mind in the face of death even more astonishing. One would suppose that centuries of contemplation of the life beyond the grave would have steadied our nerves and strung our wills to meet unexpected death more as we should enter on an unexpected journey than with the wild recoil of fear."

—London has a "Lord's Day Rest Association," fighting the public demand for the opening of libraries, museums, and galleries, at the same time that 24,000 persons are kept at work on Sundays with cabs and omnibuses, chiefly to carry pious people to church.

E. C. T.

Sometimes we think that Satan has seen his best days, and sometimes we do not feel so sure that his influence is waning. However this may be, the arch fiend has met with more than his match in Mrs. Van Cott, the modest revivalist. We learn from The Advance that this meek and lowly lady has written as follows to the North Western Advocate, about her work in Lynn, Massachusetts. During the three weeks of her labor there, she says: "Two hundred and three have started for heaven." "On Tuesday night the devil declared we should not prevail. I declared, by the grace of God, that I would not leave the house till I had seen a victory; and so, with thirty young converts, spent the entire night in prayer. The interest never for one moment abated. I never left that house for a moment for thirty-three hours. But O, what praying! and, glory be to God, we did have the victory in answer to prayer! Many who were asleep, awakened, sprang out of bed and fell upon their knees. We heard from all parts of the city that men and women were awakened; some at midnight; others at three o'clock in the morning arose and prayed earnestly for salvation. Many of these did not know that the meeting was being held. Glory be to God, hallelujah!"

Mrs. Van Cott is a representative woman. She illustrates the religious progress of this enlightened nineteenth century. In the first century, the disciples were told to enter their closets, and, when they had shut their doors, pray to their Father in secret; which was all very well for those benighted times. But now the disciples are to gather in crowds, and pray loud enough to awaken the whole neighborhood, and then write exultant letters to the newspapers boasting of their wonderful doings.—Christian Register.

"We have received from an esteemed contributor an exceedingly well-written critique on Dr. —'s Thanksgiving sermon. We had already reviewed this work in a paragraph which is crowded out, allotting to it the space to which it seemed entitled; namely, about the width of the doctor's nose. We cannot, therefore, spare the length of his ears also. Two columns are more than he deserves."—Exch.

No man who has subscribed to creeds or formulas, whether in theology or philosophy, can be an unbiased investigator of the truth, or an unprejudiced judge of the opinions of others.—David Page.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

WHY ORGANIZE?

MR. EDITOR:—

Has the success of THE INDEX, and its establishment upon an apparently permanent basis, kindled the ambition to take a census of its supporters, with a view of embodying them into some form of sectarian action? Has it been sufficiently considered that these men are natural outlaws against any ecclesiastical authority; that the only thing they have in common is a certain wild love of freedom, incapable of organization; and that they are more at odds with each other than they are with the most Orthodox forms of belief?

Such a league as you recommend, as extensive as the spirit of free inquiry in this country, will require that hundreds of men and women, with crude, half-educated minds, shall become teachers, preachers, and debaters, upon questions concerning which they are now feeling their way in doubt toward the light. We can count upon the fingers the men who, like you, have got beyond this stage to a clearness of conviction and certainty of knowledge, so that they can give a reason for the faith that is in them, and can guide the inquiring minds of others. Without learning, without distinguished talent, how easy a prey will the rest of us, a mere mob of fanatics, be to the ecclesiastical dogmatism whose armory of arguments, polished by habitual use, is kept ready at hand in tracts, Sunday-school books, and theological newspapers!

The organizing that segregates the element of free thinking dissipates and paralyzes it; for it arrests the process by which the little leaven is leavening the whole lump of Orthodoxy. Concomitism is a mistake. It is wiser and braver to stay in. Nothing disconcerts the zealous propagandist of a morbid theology as the one self-possessed parishioner, always in his pew, refusing to be terrorized by scenic pictures of the day of judgment and hell fire, and coolly keeping his temper under the scoldings of an imaginary angry Deity. He is the one unbejuggled onlooker in the spiritual circle, who interrupts the manifestations. The preacher tries his theologic thunder on him for years, and cannot affect him, but is affected by him. In the long run his tolerant indifference softens the hard creed of the preacher, who begins to see that native integrity and the brave quest of truth are elements of character not to be learned by any short lessons or easy methods. Just such men in every community have modified the grim theology into which we were born; and to set them by themselves in new ecclesiastical relations is to check their insidious and salutary influence.

The time has come, you say, to lay the foundation of a great national party of freedom. If I comprehend the scope of this, and other language you have used, you mean nothing less than a new cultus to take the place of the outworn cultus of Christianity. Have you well considered what it costs a people or an age to change its religion? Freedom is good, and truth sweeter to the soul than life; but when we remember the pangs and throes that attend the birth of freedom and truth, it is a birth to be brooded over with apprehension, as well as hoped for with joy. The loosening of religious obligations, the dethroning of the gods, the profaning of rites and bibles, and the casting off of authority, though it be done in the interest of higher obligations, a holier God, and purer Bible, has always been attended by outbreaks of crime, by social suffering, war, and the deterioration of society. Such phenomena attended the transition from Catholicism to Protestantism. Simultaneously with the development of Christianity and the decline of Paganism the world lapsed into barbarism for a thousand years. Jesus himself seemed to have anticipated the conflicts and hatreds which his ideas would provoke; and doubtless it was this consideration which made him so reticent, and so disposed to speak in unintelligible parables, and generally so remiss in propagandism. The wisest of the Greeks and Romans held by the forms of their national religion long after philosophic thought had transmuted its gods into the faculties and tendencies of the human soul, and reduced its historic records to poetic myths. Would Christianity be less advanced to-day, if the mutual tolerance had kept Protestantism within the Catholic Church?

When a body of men issue a declaration of independence, they accompany it with a list of grievances. I see you have not neglected this part of the programme; but did ever a body of men form a new government or a new Church upon pettier grievances? What are they? You complain that people pray or have prayers in Congress, the State Legislatures, the army, the navy, prisons, hospitals, asylums, &c. With like reason, you might complain that they prayed at funerals, at weddings, and that men prayed in their families; for though you might choose to go to Congress or the Legislature, and might be compelled to serve in the army or navy, or in the State-prison, and so have praying or the listening to praying forced upon you, the case is scarcely better at the funeral, wedding, or friend's house. You are under a sort of compulsion, particularly if you are a relative, to go to your friend's funeral or wedding, and you find it very convenient to accept an invitation to your friend's house, who has the absurd habit of praying.

Now, whether you are a member of Congress, or a convict in a prison, or whether you are a friend or a guest at a funeral or wedding, does not good sense and good breeding dictate precisely the same line of conduct—that is, that you should take off your hat and stand quietly and reverently till the praying is done? But you do not believe in God or in praying to him. What of it? Man is an intelligent being; prayer is, or is capable of being, an intellectual effort; and whatever you believe, you will hardly ever fail to hear something in a prayer that will accord with your reason, lend a suggestion to your mind, or touch beneficently your heart. You would be delighted to listen to a young lady reciting an apostrophe to spring, to the ocean, to a nightingale or to a rose; and think you had found a literary treasure, in discovering an untranslated Vedic prayer, ode to Apollo, or invocation to Thor. Or is it simply paying for prayer that you object to? The fraction of a cent you pay for all governmental praying is not worth computing, and, since you make no complaint of the larger sums you pay for killing Indians and Credit Mobilier swindles, is not worth mentioning.

I have observed that many people unaccustomed to formal devotional exercises, such as family prayer and grace at meals, are apt to be quite struck and moved by them, while those who have practised or listened to them so long that they have become a tedious form, care little for them. A mind free from conventional trammels will surely disuse prayer as soon as it ceases to quicken the intellect or heart. Formal prayers in Congress, and in courts, paid for like a lawyer's argument or physician's prescription, command very little popular respect, and must come to be disused through the unwillingness of sincere and reverent men to peddle out their devotions in such base way. If I wished to reinstate public praying in all its ancient veneration, and give this devout posturing a fierce earnestness, I would organize a league to suppress it.

You demand the omission of all religious services and particularly the reading of the Bible in public schools. I remember with much satisfaction how I used the long leisure of my own school days for all kinds of miscellaneous reading, and was so distressed for material that I mastered even the driest portions of the Bible,—an acquisition I have never regretted. Undoubtedly, there are better text-books to learn the art of reading in; but is there such a talismanic power about the Bible that it cannot be trusted in the hands of children and students? We give boys Homer, the Greek tragedies, and the Classical Dictionary with no fear of their becoming pagans, and no prologue written, like that wherein Simon Snug in the play was to tell his timid audience that he was not a lion. Will a candid youth reading the Bible, not as devotional form, but with his eye and mind open, fail to note how human it is—human in the mistakes of its scientific assumptions, in its feeble or coarse conceptions of God, in its inadequate mental philosophy, in the narrow national prejudices of its writers, in the improbability of its legends? All the freedom of modern criticism, all the inquiry into the authority of sacred scriptures, has been coincident with the most literal translation and most universal circulation of the Bible. The Bible is sold and bought and owned universally, but it is discriminatingly read out of, not read. Its gems of truth and inspiration are made familiar with use; its vast body of obsolete and barbarous rubbish is judiciously neglected and overlooked. As long as dainty extracts here and there are read from the pulpit with a solemn intonation, especially if the fashion be adopted of judiciously omitting or substituting phraseology to conform to correct taste, the Bible will remain a fetish in the public mind. The most objectionable novel of the eighteenth century would become pure, and the poetry of Martin Farquhar Tupper would become profound, if interpreted only in this discriminating manner. But lay the whole book without note or comment before the ingenious reader, and will he ever arrive at the conclusion that the whole extant body of Hebrew literature is not authentic and genuine, but is the dramatic form of a divine revelation? Will he believe that the Hebrews, a people so utterly shabby according to their own showing, were yet so divinely possessed, that no annalist among them could perpetrate a tradition, no codifier could collect a body of statutes, no chronicler could register the succession of kings and the history of battles and sieges, no poet could chant a sacrificial hymn, no voluptuous king could even write amatory verses to his concubines, but forthwith the divine hand itself should snatch the pen and compel it to divulge, though in the guise of some poor legend, or prudential proverb or erotic song, momentous truths brought from the awful realm of the spiritual world? If the men whose fingers quiver with superstition, and, as they turn the leaves of this book, are willing to thrust it into schools where curiosity is piqued by scientific study and the mind is trained in logical methods, who should forbid? Let the Bible be read in schools. Compare its narrow firmament shutting out the waters that give rain through its windows, and set with its sun to give light by day, and moon and stars to give light by night, with the vast and mysterious cosmos into which modern science opens here and there a glimpse. Compare that sublime and incomprehensible power shadowed in the wonderful processes of Nature, too vast for the telescope to reach, too subtle for the microscope to apprehend, with that tergiversant Delty squabbling through half the Old Testament for precedence with Baal, Dagon, and other Semitic deities, no whit more petty, cruel, or jealous than himself. In fine, I do not see why any radical should not join the Bible Society and contribute to its funds.

Why make a grievance of an authoritatively appointed Thanksgiving and Fast day? It is the merest recommendation, compulsory upon no one. A man may starve himself upon Thanksgiving day and feast himself incontinently upon Fast day, and escape even social censure, not to say the visitations of the constable or the tything man. It is a usage that stands only upon what good sense and propriety there are in it, and that will quietly die out as to all that is superstitious, rigorous, or oppressive in its institution.

As to the hardship of judicial oaths, you seem to be magnifying a triviality. In the serious proceedings of courts, affecting as they do the property, liberty, and life of our fellow-men, we have a right to require that testimony shall be given in a serious and responsible way. We want to know that witnesses are not jesting, dreaming, or allegorizing. We want them to speak on their honor, their veracity, their manhood; and, as to most men, if not all men, the name of God defines an idea, comprehending truth and highest virtue, why abandon a form so pregnant to all men with best meaning? I am aware that Jesus gives his weighty authority against judicial oaths; but it must be remembered that this is in the department not of the weightier matters of the law, but of the proprieties and of minor morals, wherein upon his own mature judgment a man may disregard the advice of any teacher.

It is true that we have statutes in most of the United States looking to the enforcement of a more rigorous Sabbath than is kept by ordinary reputable citizens; but since these statutes are obsolete, why provoke a controversy over them? Everywhere in the country on Sunday a man can travel, ride, or walk in the fields, forests, or by the sea, make and receive social visits, sing, play on instruments, and attend concerts, listen to lectures upon ethics, politics, science, or literature, and read novels, poems, and newspapers, without being punished, molested, censured, or unworthily esteemed. So far from being intolerant and oppressive, the great body of the Christian sects, who honestly believe Sunday a divinely appointed holy day, show a tolerance and charity towards the few who do not so believe, which radicals would do well to emulate. I like the rest and quiet of Sunday and bless the superstition that makes it quiet. As a people, we do not know how to amuse ourselves except by dissipation and excess. When I observe the silliness and hubbub with which our national holidays—the Fourth of July and Washington's birthday—are kept, I fairly regret there is not some old statute to call in aid to make these anniversaries more quiet, decorous, and delightful.

In fine, I dissent from your method, because it is destructive rather than constructive,—it is surgery and not growth. It challenges, on trivial and inadequate grounds, a controversy with a cultus, which what you term Free Religion not so much antagonizes as fulfills and comprehends. For Free Religion is either a development of Christianity, or that which supplants and succeeds Christianity. It seems to me it is the former; that it is the last word of that spirit of truth which Jesus is said to have predicted was to come after him and teach men all things. There is no character in history to whose example and words the radicalism of the day can more confidently appeal for sanction and authority than to Jesus. Its broadest and freest interpretation of religion does not do so much violence even to the written record of his life and teachings, as did the metaphysical dogmatism which Luther and Calvin studied and taught in modern times, or the domineering sacerdotalism which the Christianity of the middle ages, or even the Greek and Hebrew subtilties which Paul, with only partial success, tried to inculcate as the system of Jesus, while men were still alive who had seen and heard him.

But if Free Religion be an entirely new cultus to supplant Christianity, then its attitude towards Christianity should be that of respect. For are not all religions the outgrowth of the religious sentiment, and will the reverent spirit that has found a religious meaning in the rites of ancient Egypt, the amours and adventures of the Olympic gods, the savage orgies of the Norsemen, fail to see the deeper, purer, and holier lessons of the life of Jesus and the Sermon on the Mount? Let persecution and excommunication come, as they will soon enough, from the other side; but, finding ourselves inside Christianity and inside a narrow sect of it, let us say with Paul in his prison: "Nay, verily, but let them come themselves and fetch us out."

GEO. F. TALBOT.

SPICE OF ALL SORTS.

BOSTON, Feb. 18, 1873.

F. E. ABBOT:
Dear Sir,—I am very much pleased with THE INDEX in its late obesity. I used to think its meritorious and readable articles in such light weight of paper that some cynical people might say—"great cry and little wool." But I always had a presentiment that it would grow—I thought most likely in extension, not bulk. But I must say the form it took towards fatness pleases me; it is in the shape to keep. I do not know but it restricts its usefulness. I now hide its light under a bushel, instead of passing it along. It seems to fit a place in my sanctum, and in the proper form will be permanent.

In one of my visits to Colorado, I rode all one day from Denver to Boulder City. (The term city is not significant of size in that country; in this case it means about a hundred houses and three hundred people, four-fifths being men.) The driver of the stage or rather "shebang," as it is called, said, "Where will you stop, at the Boulder House or the Colorado House?" "The better of the two," said I. "No difference," said the driver. "Drop me then at the first one we come to," I replied. This proved to be the Colorado House. I walked in and made myself at home. The first thing I noticed, on a large side-table which served also for a writing desk (and many a good use did I make of it), was a pile of well-cared-for newspapers. There were about twenty Radicals (Morse's); the Banner of Light, some twenty-five; and a few Investigators. There were, of course, a few other miscellaneous papers; but the names above toned the pile, and a feeling of safety came over me—I felt among friends. I did not take out my revolver to have it handy, as I should have done if I had seen nothing but the Bible on the centre-table, the common ornament to a country inn.

The quality of this pile of reading matter gave me a foretaste of the landlord, and a right true gentleman did I find him, the three months I was there. This man was for years an infidel; a man not at all scholastic, but a clear thinker. He had heard of Theodore Parker; had one or two of his books, which he lent to me to read. He considered them treasures, and the sight of them so far from home, though very familiar to me, was like the sight of a friend, when among strangers. This man, strange as it may seem in these parts, was a spiritualist also. That is, from or by this light he had plucked his infidelity with a conscious hereafter, and entertained a hope now, as I do. This man set much by the Radical.

I have just received a letter from this landlord on interesting and general matters; and in the letter he says he has missed the Radical very much since it stopped. I am going to spare one or two of my fat INDEXES, and send them to him, telling him it is the paper that takes its place; and fills it, too.

Well, now, to go back; you will understand what I meant by saying its fatness restricted its usefulness. I send this landlord, and other distant, sensible people, my Golden Ages now and then, and my Commonwealths, as they accumulate, and when they seem to be worthy of so long a journey. I dare say I should the INDEXES occasionally, except for the fact that I keep them for preservation. If I don't experience religion (which is doubtful, having had it when I was young and am now somewhat pitted), I shall bind it in book form.

I did not intend to write this letter when I began, and now it is hardly put together in shape to be printed; so you may do what you please with it.

I almost wish, now my hand is in, that I had gone in for a letter on "Hub" matters; but as Brother Morse holds a fertile pen and Sister Hotchkiss a bright one, and as THE INDEX himself has been striking fire in this vicinity and will want to tell about it, it is better I defer such letters until you reach a lean period in these matters.

I will say in closing that the Liberal League, formed when Mr. Abbot was here, seems to be flourishing. The Parker Fraternity had a debate on it, which was animated, but rather one-sided. Rev. Mr. Bartol and Mr. Morse took the negative side; all others favored it. But all who know them know their spiles on this subject are driven firm into the hard-pan, and they will never fail to shout for liberty louder than Fulton shouts for Jesus, when needed.

At the close of the meeting, the Parker Fraternity voted to tender the use of their hall to the Liberal League one Friday evening each month, which we trust will secure interesting meetings.

Yours,

JOHN WETHERBEE.

[A note from Dr. Bartol in another column will show how much he believes in the object of the Liberal League, though he prefers to work for it in his own way; and a very good way it is, even if not a way that will permit many to work side by side.—ED.]

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

[The following letters from Col. Higginson and Mrs. Child were handed to us for publication by Mrs. Cole, at the Convention held in Toledo, Feb. 18 and 19.—ED.]

NEWPORT, R. I., Feb. 3, 1873.

MRS. M. M. COLE:

Dear Friend,—I am glad to hear of your meeting, and hope that a resolute effort will be made to keep up the Woman Suffrage Organization in your great State, which was one of its cradles. I hope you will not be too sure of immediate success, either, but enlist for the war. It may be as long a controversy as that which abolished the slavery of the negroes; but if we can live to see it triumph, like that, we shall not regret the effort we have made.

If republican principles mean anything, they mean it for women also. If they mean nothing, the sooner we find it out the better.

Ever truly yours,

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.

WAYLAND, Mass., Feb. 12, 1873.

DEAR MRS. COLE:

I am glad to hear there is a Woman Suffrage Convention to be held in Toledo. The perfect equality of the sexes before the law is founded on principles of eternal justice, and the more the subject is discussed the more apparent will this become. It is important that men should be convinced of this, because the complete realization of this idea would do more than any other reform to ennoble the family relation, and increase the power of States. The social and civil inferiority of Asia, in comparison with Europe and America, is largely to be attributed to the inequality between men and women; and the more women participate in all that occupies and interests men, the stronger and more progressive is the nation.

I deem no government free where one class of human beings makes laws for another class, whether it be kings and nobles making laws for laborers, whites making laws for blacks, or men making laws for women. All political arrangements which make one class the mere wards of another class impede the growth of one, and distort the growth of the other.

The true definition of a Republic is a government where all classes have an equal voice in the laws by which they are governed; and the nearer any nation approaches to this standard, the stronger and nobler it will become. Not for the elevation of women only, but for the welfare of the whole human race, do I urge the importance of perfect sympathy and co-operation between men and women in all departments of life, of labor, science, art, literature, and government.

Of course, in all transitions from old customs to new, some difficulties will occur in details, for a while; but when a reform is founded on the eternal principles of justice, details will be sure to adjust themselves harmoniously.

God bless all your efforts for the complete enfranchisement of woman, thereby rendering her more perfectly the friend, companion, and helper of man!

L. MARIA CHILD.

THE MORAL OF MARBLES.—The other Sunday, a worthy father of a numerous family was taking one of his little ones, a child of seven years, to Church. On the way, the little fellow met a playmate and stopped to play marbles. A quarter of an hour after, his father saw him coming to him bathed in tears.

"What is the matter?" he asked.

"Papa, I have lost all my marbles."

"Of course, God punishes you for not going to church."

"But, papa, neither did Joseph go—and he has won!"

Some seem to think effeminacy equivalent to saintliness, and become emasculated specimens of manhood. As the racer is trotted out a heat or two and then blanketed, and sponged, and whiskeed, and petted, so effeminate preachers are trotted out on Sunday, and through the week are flanneled, and grueled, and camphored, and petted by the good sisters, when it would be a thousand-fold better if some one would introduce them to the wood-pile with saws and axes.—Gospel Echo.

Among other things that Wells & Fargo's firm is not responsible for as carriers is couched in the following language in their regulations: "Nor for any loss or damage by fire, the acts of God, or of Indians, or any other public enemies of the government."

Cornish people have always been, until brought into closer contact in later years with the rest of the world by the railway, very unsophisticated. During the Crimean war, a lady went into a shop in Penzance to purchase groceries. While she was there, an old woman from the country came in and asked for some candles, for which she had to pay a higher price than usual.

"Why should you ask more for the candles than I have always paid?" inquired she.

"It's owing to the war," says the shopkeeper, "that the price is raised, for candles are become dearer."

"Lord!" ejaculates the poor old woman, holding up her hands. "Well, I never knowed afore that they fight by candle-light! Well, to be sure!"

WE DIRECT YOUR ATTENTION to our CELEBRATED Combination Button-Hole
and
SEWING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLICITY, EASE, AND CERTAINTY with which it operates, as well as the uniform excellence of its work, throughout the entire range of Sewing including Stitching, Hemming, Felling, Tucking, Cording, Braidings, Quilting, Darning and Sewing on the Edges, and its Beautiful Button-Hole and Fly-Hole Work, places it unquestionably

IN ADVANCE OF ANY OTHER SIMILAR INVENTION.

It is also the CHEAPEST, intrinsically, as well as the BEST, since it is really two MACHINES combined in one (by a simple and beautiful mechanical arrangement never before accomplished by human ingenuity), making either the LOCKSTITCH or BUTTON-HOLE STITCH, as occasion may require. It is, at the same time, simple in construction, comparatively noiseless, and easily understood. The Feed is adjustable, the Tension uniform.

The Company and its Agents WARRANT EVERY MACHINE they sell to give ENTIRE SATISFACTION. In the States of Ohio and Indiana, and in the Southern tier of counties of Michigan, we want live, energetic men to take agencies. Liberal terms will be given. Apply to Company's Office, 41 Madison Street, Toledo, Ohio—F. A. Wells, Manager. Applications for agencies for the balance of Michigan will be received at 233 Jefferson Avenue, Detroit—J. W. Martin, Manager. We want agents everywhere.

ATLANTIC ESSAYS.

BY THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.

1 vol. 12mo. $2.00.

Contents:—"A Plea for Culture," "Literature as an Art," "The American in Literature," "A Letter to a Young Contributor," "Ought Women to Learn the Alphabet?" "A Charge with Prisons Report," "Mademoiselle's Campaigns," "The Puritan Minister," "Payal and the Portuguese," "The Greek Goddessee," "Sappho," "On an Old Latin Text-Book."

A little number of the Graphic speaks of the English edition of this book, as follows:—

"Atlantic Essays," by Thomas Wentworth Higginson (Hampson Low & Co.), claim attention even above their intrinsic merit as illustrations of a drift, which may one day powerfully influence American intellectual life. Col. Higginson pleads ably on behalf of more thorough classical study, of culture which is not measured by the material gain, of form in literature and art. Not that he doubts his countrymen. On the contrary, he looks forward to a day when the 'America of art' shall be as great as the 'America of toll'; when the language enriched by loans from many lands shall acquire a depth and amplitude unknown before, and when the sublimated American woman shall surpass the noblest heroine Greek poets ever dreamed, or the most brilliant grandeur of Parisian salons. His criticisms rather strike back on ourselves, whom he regards as furnishing no more models for American writers, and who lost our last great master of style when Thackeray died. The essays, as occasional acerbity apart, are scholarly and graceful, and unusually even in merit; though we might, perhaps, single out for special praise the fragment of French history, entitled 'Mademoiselle's Campaigns,' and the well-drawn sketch of the primitive New England factors in the 'Puritan Minister.'"

For sale by all bookkeepers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers.

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO., Boston.

HEALTH, EXERCISE, AND

LIVING CURE. 229 FIFTH AVENUE. "As a means of retaining and, in certain chronic cases of disease, of regaining health, I regard it as of every value."—P. J. Bumstead, M. D., College of Physicians and Surgeons.

"Admirable in its results, and of the greatest benefit to those frames weakened and diseased by civil life and sedentary habits."—Edmond Sargent, M. D.

Persons who have feeble children can have them placed under our care with the assurance that all we can do to make them robust will be done.

Send stamp for a circular.

M. L. HOLBROOK, M. D.,
229 Fifth Ave., New York.
Refer to Cyrus W. Field, Asa E. Butts, O. B. Frothingham, E. P. Dalton.

ADAM ELDER,

164 Jefferson Avenue, Detroit, Mich.

PICTURE FRAMES,

and

LOOKING GLASSES.

NOW READY!

THE
BOUND INDEX FOR 1872
(VOLUME III).

In addition to many other attractions, it contains the full course of free religious lectures delivered at Horticultural Hall, Boston, last winter, which were published in full nowhere else. A limited number only for sale. Price $2.00, and 75 cents postage. If postage is not prepaid by the purchaser, the volume will be sent by express at his expense. Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

Cultured Free Thought.

The Index Association,

With its Principal Office at No. 143, St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO, and Branch Office at No. 38, Day Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,
A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society. It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLIWELL, Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. R. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, London, England.
Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, Weston super Mare, England.
Rev. M. D. CONWAY, London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Professor MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America,—that such a journal should have been started and powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany, though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large."

Essays, lectures, and other papers of a thoughtful and liberal character; editorial articles; foreign and domestic correspondence; book reviews and notices; communications, selections, and other miscellaneous matter; in short, whatever can best promote the general cause to which THE INDEX is devoted will be found regularly in its columns.

Also, a highly interesting RATIONALISTIC STORY, entitled "PAUL GOWER," is now appearing serially in THE INDEX, and will run during the year.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial. ALL MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS must be addressed to

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, Toledo, Ohio.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 13) will be sent postpaid on receipt of eighty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says: "I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admit them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. Abbot; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. J. B. Frothingham; "The Vision of Heaven," by Prof. F. W. Newman. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete Bibles of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black Morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.00 and 75 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

THE RICHEST MEN IN AMERICA are no more happy than those who earn their own living, and who read the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, published at $3 a year by S. R. WELLS, 289 Broadway, N. Y.

A FINE RADICAL ROMANCE!

TO BE PUBLISHED

SERIALLY

IN

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

WE ARE HAPPY TO ANNOUNCE that we have secured for publication in THE INDEX a most excellent novel, entitled

PAUL GOWER:

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

For the present the author desires to withhold his name. But he is well known in literary circles as a writer for the best English and American magazines. Of another story written by him Mr. JAMES PARTON says: "I consider it a master-piece of narrative." Mr. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, who was so kind as to read "PAUL GOWER" in manuscript with special reference to its publication in THE INDEX, permits us to publish the following:—

"I have looked over Mr. Gower's novel, and think it would be an attractive feature in THE INDEX. It is very strong, and I found it very interesting. The story is remarkably well told; the characters are firmly drawn; and the religious tone of it will suit the paper well. The style is nervous and simple; the incident is varied; the development is natural. The writer has put a vast deal of thought into it, and spent great labor on it with admirable effect. My judgment may be at fault, but I think it would adorn THE INDEX. It will divide well as a serial, which will be an advantage."

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAP.

- 1.—An Old Lady and Gentleman of the Old School.
- 2.—News from the United States.
- 3.—A Lovers' Quarrel.
- 4.—Family Antecedents.
- 5.—Poor Relations.
- 6.—Mr. Bligh receives three Morning Calls.
- 7.—Is spent in Mr. Bligh's Office.
- 8.—A Shabby-Genteel Family.
- 9.—Mr. Daniel Pennicorne.
- 10.—Harry Franklin.
- 11.—"Never Overtaking and always Pursuing."
- 12.—A Catastrophe.
- 13.—Locked-out for the Night.
- 14.—In which divers Persons call on each other without Invitation or Introduction.
- 15.—Sickness and Convalescence.
- 16.—Easter Franklin.
- 17.—Contains Explanations and Confidences.
- 18.—Concludes with a Street Row at the Door of Mr. James Maberley.
- 19.—Involves a Meeting and a Departure.
- 20.—In which Richard Sabin talks like a Heathen.
- 21.—"That nasty, deceitful Clergyman who behaved so badly to poor, dear Ruth."
- 22.—"My Native Land, Good Night!"
- 23.—Epistolary and Maritime.
- 24.—Is mainly in Praise of New York City and Americans in General.
- 25.—Paul's Father.
- 26.—Transpires in or near Nassau Street.
- 27.—More New Faces.
- 28.—Is Conversational and Volodictory.
- 29.—The Christening of a Comic Paper.
- 30.—A New York Boarding-House.
- 31.—Paul's Letters.
- 32.—In which Dick Sabin returns to New York City and is seen by Bombyde who has hereafter a Great Deal to do with Him.
- 33.—Wherein Richard Sabin lays down a Square of Holl's Pavement.
- 34.—"The Porcupine."
- 35.—In which Paul Gower and Richard Sabin amuse themselves.
- 36.—A short Chapter introducing a very long one.
- 37.—A Young Man's Theological Experiences.
- 38.—Consequences.
- 39.—A Descent into Bohemia.
- 40.—More of the same Subject.
- 41.—In which we talk about the Fourth Estate of New York City.
- 42.—"At Puff's."
- 43.—The Reverend Jim Scobell.
- 44.—"The Cornucopia."
- 45.—"One More Unfortunate"
- 46.—In which the Story progresses for about six Months.
- 47.—A Little Adventure.
- 48.—Injured Innocence.
- 49.—"Lead us not into Temptation."
- 50.—Just what might have been Expected.
- 51.—What People said about it; and an Item of News concerning the Fugitives.

CHAP.

- 52.—In which Paul sets out for a larger amount of Travel than he intended, and visits some Old Friends.
- 53.—A Canadian Idyll.
- 54.—Wherein we journey from the North to nearly the most Southern of the United States.
- 55.—More Southern Experiences; a Look at New Orleans; and a sudden change of Programme.
- 56.—A Return and a Disappointment.
- 57.—The Contents of which ought to surprise nobody.
- 58.—In which Paul hears more News of Old Friends of an Unsatisfactory Character.
- 59.—Wherein Paul Gower and the Rev. George Bligh smoke a cigar together.
- 60.—Accompanies Paul to London and describes his Doings in that Metropolis.
- 61.—Is a Continuation of Chapter 60.
- 62.—Contains an Accident and some Conversation.
- 63.—Treats of the Vicarage and Farm-house; and of the Machinations of a Wicked Woman.
- 64.—Shows that a Pliable Disposition may be wrought upon to Good as well as Evil Purposes.
- 65.—Which only those Readers who have some knowledge of Human Nature will think at all Truthful or Probable.
- 66.—Wherein we get rid of Mrs. Franklin for Good and All.
- 67.—In which the Engagement between Ruth Gower and the Rev. George Bligh comes to a perfectly natural conclusion.
- 68.—Contains various matters, Reflective, Rural, and Metropolitan, and concludes at Southampton.
- 69.—New York again. And what Paul did and heard there.
- 70.—A "Cut Direct" and other Experiences, too various for particularization.
- 71.—Is as Desultory as the one preceding it, and therefore introduced without Specification.
- 72.—More Boarding-House and Bohemian Details; the latter involving their own Moral.
- 73.—A Loving Heart, self-portrayed; and News from England.
- 74.—A Character: the re-appearance of a Scoundrel, and still more of Journalism.
- 75.—Another Return and a new Enterprise. Charleston on an Historical Occasion.
- 76.—In which a former Acquaintance takes Paul into his confidence concerning his Domestic Infelicity.
- 77.—Might have had the same Title as Chapter 76.
- 78.—More talk of Secession, and the Sequel of Richard Sabin's Catastrophe.
- 79.—A Companion-Picture to what we have seen in Charleston, but on a larger Scale.
- 80.—Clears the way for the Next and Last.
- 81.—In which John Gower's Misfortunes and the Story come to an End together.

Whoever desires to possess all the numbers of THE INDEX containing this novel should subscribe at once, beginning his subscription with the year. Send $3.00 for the FOURTH VOLUME OF THE INDEX.

Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admit them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Third Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

Address, THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Back Numbers of The Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

THE COMMONWEALTH

LIFE INS. CO.
GENTLEMEN of standing and ability (either in professional or mercantile pursuits) are desired in all parts of the country to represent this reliable company. Our plans of Insurance are simple, popular, and honest.
Address 178 Broadway,
NEW YORK.

REAL ESTATE,

In all parts of the U. S.,

RAILROAD AND OTHER STOCKS,

Also

MERCHANDISE OF ALL KINDS,

Bought, sold, and exchanged.

All wishing to sell, or who desire to procure bargains, will find it to their interest to apply to

S. T. POMEROY,
No. 1, Park Place, New York City.

ASA K. BUTTS,

Manufacturer's Agent, Broker and Dealer in
Domestic Cotton Goods
CORDAGE, &C.,

111 Worth Street, New York.

"The Greatest Luxury in the World."

TURKISH BATHS.

& 88 COLUMBIA HEIGHTS, BROOKLYN,
NEW YORK.

Three mirrors' walk from Fulton Ferry. A series of these Baths will relieve, if not cure, nearly every form of disease. The beauty and simplicity of their action consists in the perfect adaptability, either mild or powerful, of this method of treatment to each and every case. It cleans the body, purifies the blood, and equalizes the circulation, thus arousing dormant functions, and restoring the highest measure of health possible to the individual.

Innumerable references can be given to cases cured by the Bath, and the proprietor will freely advise with those who desire any information regarding its proper use.

First-class rooms and board at moderate prices.
CHARLES H. SHEPARD, M. D.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S NEW BOOK.

The Religion of Humanity,

By O. B. Frothingham. Contents.—I. Tendencies; II. God; III. Bible; IV. Christ; V. Angels; VI. Power of Moral Inspiration; VII. Providence; VIII. Moral Ideal; IX. Immortality; X. Education of Conscience; XI. The Soul of Good in Evil; XII. The Soul of Truth in Error.

One vol., 12 mo. $1.50. Sent free on receipt of price.

DAVID G. FRANCIS, Publisher,
17 Astor Place, New York.

RAWSON, EVANS & Co.,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS,

AND NEWS DEALERS,

229 SUPERIOR ST., CLEVELAND, O.

ALL

New Books, Papers, Magazines,
both Foreign and Domestic.

RECEIVED AS SOON AS ISSUED,

AND

Furnished by Mail or Otherwise,
at lowest rate.

THEODORE SIGLER,

Manufacturer of

LOOKING GLASS AND PICTURE FRAMES,
Gilt, Rosewood, Walnut, and Ornamental Mouldings.

LOOKING GLASS PLATES, CHROMOS, LITHOGRAPHS, ENGRAVINGS, ETC.,

34 Atwater St., Detroit, Mich.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS

for the

GREAT INDUSTRIES

of the UNITED STATES; an historical summary of the origin, growth, and perfection of the chief industrial arts of this country. 1,800 PAGES, AND 200 ENGRAVINGS. WRITTEN BY 20 EMINENT AUTHORS, including John B. Gough, Leon Case, Edward Howland, Jos. B. Lyman, Rev. E. Edwin Hall, Horace Greeley, Philip Ripley, Albert Brisbane, F. B. Perkins, etc., etc.

This work is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufacture, etc., in all ages. It is a complete encyclopedia of arts and manufactures, and is the most entertaining and valuable work of information on subjects of general interest ever offered to the public. It is adapted to the wants of the Merchant, Manufacturer, Mechanic, Farmer, Student, and Inventor, and sells to both old and young of all classes. The book is sold by agents, who are making large sales in all parts of the country. It is offered at the low price of $3.50, and is the cheapest book ever sold by subscription. No family should be without a copy. We want Agents in every town of the United States, and no agent can fail to do well with this book. Our terms are liberal. One of our agents sold 125 copies in eight days; another sold 368 in two weeks. Our agent in Hartford sold 397 in one week. Specimens of the work sent to agents on receipt of stamp. For circulars and terms to agents address the publishers,

J. B. BURR & HYDE,
Hartford, Conn.,
CHICAGO, ILL., or CINCINNATI, OHIO.

THE BABCOCK FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against Fire."

SURE,

SIMPLE,

SELF-ACTING.

Used by the Fire Departments of the principal cities of the Union.

F. W. FARWELL,
Secretary,
407 Broadway, N. Y.
Over Twelve Hundred Actual Fires put out with it.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

NEW TRACTS!

INTENDED TO TEACH RELIGION WITHOUT SUPERSTITION.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 20.

SECOND SERIES.....No. 21 to No. 35.

Either Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
19 PINEKNY ST., BOSTON.

C. A. MORSE,

American and Swiss Watches,

CLOCKS, JEWELRY, SOLID SILVER, &C.

223 West Madison St., Chicago.

Fine Watches put in order. Repairing neatly done.

Burned out at cor. Clark and Lake streets.

Samuel Johnson's Work on India.

Sent on receipt of price—$5.00.

Address S. H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

Send to same address for Catalogue of other scientific and religious works.

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

NEW SHORT ROUTE

FROM

Toledo and Saginaw,

BAY CITY AND NORTHERN MICHIGAN,

via

Flint & Pere Marquette Railway.

Trains Leave Toledo—11:25 A. M., and 8:30 P. M.

Trains arrive at Toledo—5:00 P. M., and 10:40 A. M.

The A. M. train from Toledo connects direct for Bay City, and with trains from Saginaw, as far north as Reed City, at the crossing of Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad. The only route that avoids a transfer of passengers and baggage between Toledo and Saginaw.

Low rates and quicker despatch given freight than by any other route.

JEROME MONROE, Gen'l Agent,
Toledo, Ohio.

SPIRIT OF REFORM

WILLIAM WHITE & CO.,

14 HANOVER STREET, BOSTON, MASS.,

Issue weekly the

BANNER OF LIGHT:

An exponent of the Spiritual Philosophy of the nineteenth century.

The above is a first-class, eight-page, family Newspaper, containing FORTY COLUMNS of INSTRUCTIVE and INSTRUCTIVE READING, classed as follows:—

LITERARY DEPARTMENT.—Original Novels, essays of refutation, tendencies, and occasionally translations from French and German authors.

REPORTS OF SPIRITUAL LECTURES.—By able Trance and Normal Speakers.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.—Upon Spiritual, Philosophical, and Scientific Subjects.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.—Subjects of General Interest, the Spiritual Philosophy, its Phenomena, etc., Current Events, Entertaining Miscellany, Notices of New Publications, etc.

MESSAGE DEPARTMENT.—Spirit-Messages from the departed to their friends in earthly life, given through the mediumship of Mrs. J. H. CONANT, which demonstrate direct intercourse between the Mundane and Super-Mundane Worlds.

ORIGINAL CONTRIBUTIONS.—From the most talented writers in the world.

All which features render this Journal a popular Family Paper, and at the same time the harbinger of a Glorious Scientific Religion.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, IN ADVANCE.

Per Year	$3.00
Six Months	1.50
Three Months	.75

Specimen copies sent free.

We confidently call the attention of the friends of progress and reform, whether in material or spiritual matters, to the self-respecting and dignified tone, and the liberal position assumed and maintained by the BANNER OF LIGHT in the past, the same being the guarantee of future usefulness.

WILLIAM WHITE & Company also publish and offer for sale, at the BANNER OF LIGHT Bookstore, many books and pamphlets of a spiritual and reformatory nature.

The complete works of ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS; also books by Judge J. W. Edmond, Mrs. Emma Hardinge, William Howitt, Hon. Robert Dale Owen, D. D. Home, Prof. Willis Denton, Miss Lizzie Doten, J. M. Peebles, J. S. Adams, Prof. S. B. Brittan, Hudson A. Rice, A. Tuttle, Henry C. Wright, Warren Charles S. Woodruff, Dr. A. B. Child, Mrs. L. Walbrook, P. D. Randolph, Warren S. B. Low, George Stearns, and others, will here found.

READ, and let unbiased reason decide to what is true.

THE (ORIGINAL)

CONTINENTAL LIFE

INSURANCE CO.,

of Hartford, Conn. Incorporated May 1,

SAM'L E. ELMORE, President,

JOHN S. RICE, Vice President,

FRANCIS D. DOUGLASS, Secretary,

H. K. MORLEY, Actuary.

The CONTINENTAL especially commends itself, by its past experience and present management, to those who desire to place their insurance in a conservative company, conducting the principle of furnishing REASONABLE AND LATE INSURANCE AT A REASONABLE COST AS IS SILENT WITH PERFECT SECURITY.

A few first-class Agents wanted for all copied fields.

GUNS FOR THE PEOPLE

Breach-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $150.

Double-Barrel Shot-Guns, $8 to $150.

Rifles, $3 to $200. Breach-loading and single Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers, $5 to Pistols, 75c. to $5. Gun material, fixtures ammunition of every kind very cheap.

STAMP for Large Illustrated and Descriptive

Price-List to GREAT WESTERN

WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The Science of a New I

By JOHN COWAN, M. D. A radical new

Sexual Physiology and the laws necessary elevation of the Human Race. Recovery and endorsed by O. B. Frothingham, D.

Lewis, Robert Dale Owen, T. H. Jones, and prominent ministers, physicians, religious secular papers. Every copy sold helps direction of the coming millennium.

wanted everywhere. Send for circulars only by Subscription and by the Pub

COWAN & CO., 139 Eighth St., New York

J. H. STONE,

ARCHITECTS,

78 MADISON STREET (Near Boddy

TOLEDO, OHIO.

HARLAN P. HYDE,

REAL ESTATE AGENT

AND

Negotiator of Mortgages

95 1-2 Washington St., Boston.

22 Burling Slip, New York,
and 118 Superior St., Cleveland,

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

Published by the Index Association at No. 142,
St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio, with Branch
Office at No. 86, Dey Street, New York City.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.
M. D. CONWAY, England.

THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A NEW LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MORSE, late editor of the RADICAL, whose EVENING NOTES will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 86, Dey Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. F. DIMMICK, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order.

Address—

THE INDEX,

DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A UNIQUE PREMIUM.

Photographs and Autographs

OF

LEADING WRITERS

OF

THE INDEX.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

W. J. POTTER.

W. H. SPENCER.

F. W. NEWMAN.

CHAS. VOYSEY.

A. W. STEVENS.

F. E. ABBOT.

☞ The PHOTOGRAPH of any ONE of the above-named persons will be mailed post-paid to any NEW subscriber who shall remit $5.00 for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

☞ To any one who shall send a list of names of from one to eight NEW subscribers and $5.00 for each, a corresponding number of Photographs shall be mailed post-paid, to be given to these subscribers; and the same number of Photographs shall also be mailed, post paid, as premium to the sender himself.

☞ To any one who shall send $9.00 for three years' subscription to THE INDEX in advance, a full set of the Photographs shall be mailed post-paid.

☞ None of the above Photographs will be sent, unless specially requested and unless a choice is made from the list.

☞ The Autograph of each of the above American writers will in all cases accompany the corresponding Photograph; but no Autograph can be sent with the Photograph of the English writers.

☞ These Photographs are well executed, are not on sale anywhere, and can be obtained in no other way. In offering them as premiums, the INDEX ASSOCIATION rely on the good will and active co-operation of all friends of THE INDEX.

☞ All orders for Photographs and remittances of money should be addressed to

THE INDEX,

DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A SYNOPSIS

OF

PAUL GOWER,

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a story of English and American life; the localization being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not in-curious.

It is, also, in the very warp and woof of it, an heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potential with the uninquiring and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfilment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, didactically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is emphatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, MARCH 8, 1873.

WHOLE No. 167.

ORGANIZE!

LIBERALS OF AMERICA!

The hour for action has arrived. The cause of freedom calls upon us to combine our strength, our zeal, our efforts. These are

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformable to the requirements of natural morality—equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Let us boldly and with high purpose meet the duty of the hour. I submit to you the following

FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF _____.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in —:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

Liberals! I pledge to you my undivided sympathies and most vigorous co-operation, both in THE INDEX and out of it, in this work of local and national organization. Let us begin at once to lay the foundations of a great national party of freedom, which shall demand the entire secularization of our municipal, state, and national government. Send me promptly the list of officers of every Liberal League that may be formed, and a standing list of all such Leagues shall be kept in THE INDEX. Rouse, then, to the great work of freeing America from the usurpations of the Church! Make this continent from ocean to ocean sacred to human liberty! Prove that you are worthy descendants of those whose wisdom and patriotism gave us a Constitution unstained with superstition! Shake off your slumbers, and break the chains to which you have too long lamely submitted!

TOLEDO, O., Jan. 1, 1872.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

LIST OF LIBERAL LEAGUES.

St. Louis, Mo.—M. A. McCord, President; J. Gallion, Vice President; P. A. Loggson, L. La Grille, Secretaries; E. K. Thomas, Treasurer.

Boston, Mass.—J. S. Rogers, President; A. Davis, J. W. Smith, Vice Presidents; J. P. Titcomb, G. A. Bacon, Secretaries; J. A. J. Wilcox, Treasurer; R. H. Ranney, F. W. Clarke, H. B. Storer, Executive Committee.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES

FOR 1873.

A STUDY OF RELIGION: THE NAME AND THE THING.

BY FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

FIFTH LECTURE IN THE COURSE OF SIX "SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES," GIVEN IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FEBRUARY 2, 1873.

If there is one word above all others which articulates in a breath the supreme sublimity and the most melancholy abasement of human nature,—which carries imagination up to the heights of a heroism so pure and lofty that common lungs gasp for coarser air, and then plunges her into dungeons of superstition so foul with blood and filth that the choke-damp of the coal-mine seems innocuous by comparison,—it is assuredly the word RELIGION. The page of history is lighted up by it, now as by a flood of golden sunshine, and again as by the glare, lurid and smoky, of infernal fires. All that is sweetest and tenderest, bravest and truest, most inspiring and most inspired in the human heart, has been sunned into living beauty by religion; all that is most dark, wrathful, false, crafty, cruel, has been nursed into bloody and deceitful deeds by her influence. Religion, and religion alone, has had skill to sweep the entire key-board of humanity, evoking alternately the thunders of the hoarsest and harshest bass and the silver melodies that sing to us all we know of the angelic and divine.

THE STUDY OF RELIGION.

Politics, trade, industry, literature, art, philanthropy,—there is no human interest that has not been moulded or shaped by religion; and no study so comprehensive or profound awaits the future historian as that which is busied with the religious development of man. The future historian, I say; for, although I have been so venturesome as to entitle my lecture "A Study of Religion," I am painfully aware that no study of it can at this day be otherwise than fragmentary and crude,—that in their very best investigations this present generation are but dabblers and babblers in a matter too high for them. The materials for building up a true science of religion (science must be herself the historian and the analyst) exist to-day uncut, nay, unquarried even, in the traditions and annals and poems and bibles and philosophies, the cultus and the customs, the social systems and the countless institutions of many and diverse nations, of some of which even the names are as yet scarcely known; while the constructive task of planning and executing this great master-piece of intellectual architecture can fall to the lot of those only who shall inherit the results of whole generations of mighty minds. The great structures of the existing world-religions eclipse wholly, to the common observer, the very possibility of such a science; they stand for religion itself to the common intellect; they fill the field of vision; and their magnitude, which is as nothing beside the boundlessness of the slow-coming religion of man, is quite as much as even our best scholars can appreciate to-day. In what I have presumed, therefore, to call a "study of religion," I beg to be acquitted of the pretence of anticipating the proper task of succeeding centuries.

THE CLEW OF AN IDEA.

Yet, while stumbling and groping my way, as it were, amid the ruins of decaying world-religions, and consciously devoid of the light which is needed to illumine the path of escape, I do indeed believe that the clew of an idea is given which even in the dark shall serve as a guiding-thread. These vast tottering temples of faith in which the worshippers still congregate by millions, unlike as they appear to careless inspection, betray, notwithstanding, a far profounder unity than can be detected in mere similarity of moral precepts or identity of special beliefs. Such similarity or identity, though in itself a comparatively recent discovery, appears to me to be a quite superficial fact. Moral precepts and special beliefs, mere rules and mere opinions, never yet made a religion; they do not contain the vital principle essential to the organic existence of every world-faith. Deeper than to ethical codes or to theological conceptions must we look, if we would discover the vast arterial system of spiritual life which makes all religions one. What we want to discover is the common blood of them all, not the likeness of fingers or toes. The "sympathy of religions," as the phrase has been happily coined, is a great and fruitful truth; but there is danger lest we seek it in surface characteristics. When it is seen that moral precepts and theological beliefs are never the real bond of union even among the adherents of the same religion, we shall be cautious how we proceed in taking them as the bond of union among different religions. Without "unity of spirit," churches are ropes of sand; without unity of spirit, different religions, bridling as they all do with conscious hostility, could never be one substance as they really are. It is something, then, to be warned against going off on a false scent in the search for unity. It is something to be aware that moral precepts and theological doctrines, whether shared or not shared in common by different religions, do not and cannot constitute the essence of religion, but are simply the various forms of manifestation assumed at various times and under varying circumstances by a permanent force in human history. Opinions in ethics and in theology change from age to age; what is held to be right and true in one stage of development is seen to be wrong and false at a later stage. But the deep and powerful impulsion to seek for the right and true, without which these very changes could never have taken place, is an abiding element of human nature; and it is in this direction that we must look, if we would indeed discover that common essence which is the real nexus of unity among the diversities of law, creed, and cultus.

THE PREJUDICE AGAINST RELIGION.

In the study of religion, however, one great cause of mistake and injustice should be scrupulously eliminated,—I mean, the preconception or prejudice which pronounces beforehand that religion is pure superstition. Whoever enters on this study with a bias so unscientific as this will arrive at no results. Religion must be studied as one of the greatest facts of human history, if not the very greatest. It must be studied with the previous conviction that every fact of history, even the most trivial, has its proper place and deserves to be studied with scientific impartiality. The blind fury of the partisan, whether turned in this way or that, is a complete stoppage of ear and eye, disqualifying for all valuable research. The anti-religion rage which makes the very name a red rag to be rushed at with all the violence of a mad bull, and which is by no means an uncommon phenomenon of the day, should be as carefully guarded against as the most submissive superstition. Criticise without scruple the mischievous pervasions and abuses of religion; acknowledge without palliation all the evil it has done; but avoid the mental obfuscation of confounding a permanent force with a transient form. This the adherents of the various religions do, conceiving the favored form of religion to be religion itself, and therefore condemning all other forms as false and abominable; but this the scientific student can never do, who sees that the evils done by religion in the world's history are due to the misapplication of a force whose intelligent direction must be most beneficial.

RELIGION AS FIRE.

When I say, therefore, as I must, that I believe in religion, the case is the same as when I say that I believe in fire. Of all agencies employed by man, fire is perhaps the most useful and the most terrible. It will warm your house, and cook your steak; but it will just as readily burn them up, aye, and you too, if it escapes the governance of your mind. Without fire civilization would be impossible; but the great wilderness of blackened ruins within a stone's throw from this Hall, marking the spot where the conflagration raged with frightful fury through your stores and warehouses, shows how remorselessly fire will unmake the very civilization it has made. So it is with religion. Without it human life would freeze into the desolation of an arctic winter; without it the tender flush on the face of humanity, looking upward and forward in the rocky path she climbs, would fade away, and the golden aureole of a divine purpose would vanish forever from her head; without it the suffusing glow of hope and reverence would die out from the world of men, and the hard lines of care and stolid selfishness would be ploughed by the hand of Time where now he traces the marks of noble thought and earnest aspiration and grand enthusiasm for the true, the beautiful, the good. Yet the same mighty force which, if only guided by intelligence, makes each human heart an altar, has made it, and will make it again, under the guidance of ignorant folly, a lazar-house of superstition and a torture-chamber of cruelty. Let reason lose her mastery of the inner impulse of religion, and the fire which should warm, comfort, and preserve, will with all-devouring flames turn into ashes every costly product of civilizing mind. Truly, a fearful friend is this fire of the human soul,—the greatest of all blessings or the most terrible of all curses! I repeat it, I believe in religion as I believe in fire; for, notwithstanding the incalculable evils that result from their abuse, mankind could dispense with the one as little as with the other.

THE NAME AND THE THING.

Believing that words are vitally connected in human thought with that which they represent, in studying religion I would consider first the name, and afterwards the thing.

THE NAME:

I. DERIVATION.

The popularly accepted derivation of the word religion is from the Latin word religare, signifying "to bind back or behind, to bind fast." If this derivation is correct, the word would seem etymologically to contain the idea of bondage, as its root-meaning; and consequently the use of it in connection with any word suggesting liberty, as in the phrase "Free Religion," must be condemned, as one of those attempts to put new meanings into old theological words against which every true radical instinctively and on principle protests. Should ripe and impartial scholarship ever pronounce in favor of this derivation, I for one should be disposed to abandon the word religion altogether, while still cleaving to that which to my mind it now fairly and fitly expresses. Far be it from any intrepid thinker to seek to avail himself of the prestige of any word to which his honest and unbiased thought does not justly entitle him! Let him trust the cause of truth to itself for its final vindication in the eyes of mankind.

At the same time it should be noted, in any thorough discussion of the subject, that the verb religare not only means to bind fast, but also, in poetical and post-classical Latin, to unbind, as in the line of Catullus [xiii. 84]:—

"At hee minax Cybele, religatque iuga manu."

It might be not unreasonably urged that warrant could be found, even in the vulgar derivation of the word religion, for its appropriate conjunction with the word free.

But there is no occasion to rest the case on any doubtful or questionable grounds. The best authorities are in favor of deriving the word religion, not from religare at all, but from relegere or religere, signifying "to go through or over again in reading, in speech, or in thought;" that is, to review carefully and faithfully, to ponder or reflect with conscientious fidelity. If this derivation is the correct one, then there is nothing in etymology to forbid or discourage the application of the epithet free to religion,—nothing to suggest, even, the idea of bondage or arbitrary obligation. The root-meaning of the word would be the application of the intellectual faculties under direction of the conscience to any subject in general, or more especially, by popular association merely, to the subject of man's relation to God or the gods.

Now this question of the true derivation of the word religion is so closely connected with the profoundest problems of modern religious thought, and particularly with that of the real relation of religion as an historical phenomenon to the belief in God, that I beg your indulgence for presenting to you some of the most important evidence on both sides of this question. At the risk of being dry and uninteresting to a popular audience, I wish to give in some detail such testimony as my note books furnish concerning the verdict of modern scholarship on the true derivation of the word under discussion.

THE DERIVATION FROM "RELIGARE."

Lactantius, the distinguished convert to Christianity who in the first quarter of the fourth century taught and wrote at Nicomedia, in Bithynia, was the first [Divin. Instit., iv. 28.], so far as I know, to derive the word religion from religare, referring to "the bond of piety by which we are attached and bound to God [a vinculo pietatis quo Deo obstricti et religati sumus]." Augustine, one of the most influential of the early Church Fathers, who flourished about a hundred years later, adopted the derivation of Lactantius. ["Uni Deo religantes animas nostras, unde religio dicta creditur." Retract., i. 13.] It was also adopted by Servius, in the fifth century, in his annotations on Virgil [ad Æn., viii. 349.]; and it has been sanctioned by later writers who, in my judgment, have either given too little attention to the subject, or have been biased by theological preconceptions to acquiesce in what chimed in with their own dogmatic systems. For instance, J. A. Hartung [Die Religion der Römer nach den Quellen dargestellt: 1ter Theil, S. 140. Leipzig: 1836] assumes it apparently without investigation as the true derivation; as do also the Rev. Samuel Beal [Catechism of Buddhist Scriptures from the Chinese: p. 152. London: 1871] and other writers. But the secret of the predilection for this derivation shown by many scholars is very aptly exposed by Bretschneider, who says: "Lactantius rejected Cicero's etymology, not on philological, but on dogmatic grounds. Religion was to him dependence upon God, unconditioned subjection under his law and revelation; therefore he hunted up the derivation from religare, which for similar reasons suited Augustine also." [Handbuch der Dogmatik der evangelisch-lutherische Kirche: Prolegomena, p. 1, footnote. Leipzig: 1838.] This judgment by Bretschneider I consider as just as it is penetrating. The derivation from religare at once assumes that belief in God, and explicit recognition of a supernatural Revelation as the rightful Law of the human soul, constitute the very essence of religion. It has therefore been espoused by the vast majority of Christian theologians, and defended as important testimony, rendered by philology itself, to the truth of their system. They argue, and in my opinion justly, that, if the very word religion expresses the submission of mankind to the will of a personal God, the scientific spirit which refuses to submit to anything but the intrinsic truth of things, and claims the right to decide for itself whether there is a personal God whose will must be accepted as the law of the human mind as well as of the human heart, is wholly outside the sphere of religion, and hostile to it. They declare, and rightly, that this idea of religion is incompatible with freedom; and they thus indissolubly bind up the destinies of religion with the destinies of their own supernaturalism. Whether the word religion, consequently, is to be the banner under which the great battle of free thought against superstition is to be fought and won, or whether it too, like the word Christianity, must be surrendered to the devotees of a dying faith, will depend mainly on the truth or untruth of the claims by which they seek to capture it for their own uses. Let us, then, inquire further into the etymology of the word.

THE DERIVATION FROM "RELEGERE."

Cicero, the greatest of Roman writers, who flourished three hundred years and more before Lactantius, and who certainly should be regarded as no mean authority on his native language, has a passage which I should translate as follows: "Not philosophers alone, but also our own ancestors, distinguished superstition from religion. For those who were wont to offer prayer and sacrifice, during entire days, that their children might survive them [superstitibus essent], were called superstitious; a word which was afterwards applied more widely. But they who carefully meditated and, as it were, considered and re-considered all those things which pertained to the worship of the gods, were called religious from religere." [De Nat. Deor., ii. 28.] Now it is true that the derivation of the word superstition here given is at least dubious; and this fact justifies suspicion of the other derivation. But even he who mistakes once should not therefore be immediately set down as mistaking always. There is other evidence, very strong evidence, showing that Cicero was right in his second derivation. There is a participle religens, signifying religious, which cannot possibly be derived from religare, but must be referred to relegere (or religere, as sometimes spelled.) This participle is contained in a verse quoted from an old poet by Aulus Gellius, author of the Noctes Atticæ, who lived more than a century before Lactantius:

"Religentem esse oportet, religiosum nefas."

That is, "it is right to be religious, wrong to be religious, or superstitious." Such evidence as this must have immense weight with scholars who are free from prepossession. Furthermore, the use of the word religio itself was quite common at Rome in the simple sense of a "scruple," conscientious or otherwise, implying the consciousness of a natural obligation wholly irrespective of the gods. For instance, the comic poet Terence, who flourished nearly two hundred years before Christ, makes one of his characters exclaim: "I scruple (or am ashamed) to say that I have nothing — nam nil esse mihi religiosius dicere." [Heaut., i. 228. Teubner's ed., 1857.] Faithfulness, sincerity, veracity, honor, punctiliousness, conscientiousness—these were frequent popular meanings of the word; and it is evident that they mark its original, radical signification far more clearly than the use made of it as applied to worship of the gods. They point directly to relegere as the true root.

Not to rest the case, however, on any assertions or arguments of my own, let me cite the direct testimony of the highest authorities.

The Universal Latin Lexicon of Facellatus and Forcellinus [Bailey's edition, 1828], the Wörterbuch der Lateinischen Sprache of Dr. Wilhelm Freund [Leipzig, 1840], and the Latin-English Lexicon of Dr. Andrews, which is better known in this country than the great lexicon of Dr. Freund on which it is based, all give the weight of their authority to the derivation from relegere. No better authorities could be adduced.

Dr. Ramshorn, whose Latin Synonymes is a work of the highest reputation, derives the word religion from relegere, and gives as its fundamental or root-meaning—"conscientiousness, scruple of conscience, scrupulousness." ["Et was bei sich wiederholen, immer wieder überlegen; daher die Gewissenhaftigkeit, der Gewissensscrupel, die Bedenklichkeit." Lateinische Synonymik. Leipzig: 1831.]

Dr. John William Donaldson, one of the finest of English scholars, referring to the same derivation, says very emphatically: "There can be no doubt that it is perfectly true. It is clear from the use of the word, that it is not derived from religare, 'to bind back,' but from religere, 'to gather over and over again,' 'to think perpetually and carefully on the same subject,' 'to dwell with anxious thought on some idea or recollection.' . . . Hence, practically, religio signifies, (1) 'religious worship,' considered as scrupulous obedience to the exactions of conscience, and with especial reference to the act of worship; etc." [Varronianus: A Critical and Historical Introduction to the Ethnography of Ancient Italy and to the Philological Study of the Latin Language, p. 407. London: 1852.]

Lest I should transgress beyond all hope of pardon by my citations, permit me simply to refer here to Dr. Paulus [Der Denkwürdige, i. 50.]; to Dr. Klotz [Handwörterbuch der Lateinischen Sprache]; and to Pott, the great philologist [Etymologische Forschungen, ii. 161]. These scholars are unanimous in favoring the derivation relegere, and rejecting that from religare. So far as my very imperfect studies have gone, they have led me wholly in the same direction; and I venture to think that no one who sits down faithfully to study the subject in the spirit of pure scholarship, regardless of all dogmatic bias, can come to a different conclusion. I took up the investigation two or three years ago, in order to satisfy my own mind whether radicals ought to discard the word religion as I believe they ought to discard the word Christianity, and with perfect willingness to do it myself, if necessary; and the conclusion has forced itself upon me with irresistible force that the word most certainly belongs to us by its etymology, and, as I hope to show, quite as much by its usage and by its essential meaning.

I would only add that Döderlein, who proposes a third derivation for the word religion, namely, from re and a Greek verb signifying to look to, to have a care for, assigns to it the same radical signification: "Pietas is the natural feeling of innate love; religio, the feeling of a sacred duty come to consciousness. . . . Furthermore, religio rests on an inward obligation by conscience; fides, on the other hand, on an outward obligation by a promise." [Lateinische Synonyme und Etymologien. Leipzig: 1838.] It will be seen, therefore, that Döderlein, differing from the foregoing in point of derivation, strikingly agrees with them in point of fundamental meaning.

Of the two chief derivations which are assigned to the word religion, I think I have shown conclusively that religare is not, and that relegere is, the true root. The former implies the idea of bondage, and assumes the belief in a supernatural God, whose simple will is the rightful law of human life, as the very essence of religion itself. The latter assumes the great fact of duty, of conscience, of moral obligation to a natural law of right, and implies not the faintest restriction upon any human faculty other than the natural obligation of right and truth. So far, then, as etymology is concerned, the pretence that the phrase Free Religion contains an inherent contradiction is seen to be based either upon philological ignorance or dogmatic narrowness.

II. USAGE.

Trusting that the importance of the subject will still secure to me your indulgence for some inevitable dulness, I wish to dwell a little further upon the word religion with reference to its usage; and I would broadly distinguish between two different uses of it as respectively provincial and cosmopolitan. They correspond to the two derivations already stated, but of course can be considered quite independently of them. Under each of these two uses, the provincial and the cosmopolitan, I would point out a minor distinction of the vulgar and the scholarly.

THE PROVINCIAL USE.

The vulgar provincial use of the word religion is that which confounds religion in general with the special form of it which is dominant in any particular place and time. For instance, the Catholic believes that there is no religion at all, properly so called, but Roman Catholicism. His own faith is all the faith there is; every other pretended faith is unfaith, more or less pernicious, and as absolutely hateful to God as all falsehood must necessarily be. This enormous complacency of the Catholic Church is shared to a degree by every Christian, whether Evangelical or so-called Liberal, who cannot or will not concede that Christianity stands precisely on the level of all other religions, as a natural outgrowth of humanity rather than as a supernatural revelation of God. The idea of religion it presupposes is not only provincial, but vulgarly provincial,avoring of nothing but ignorance or conceit. There is nothing about it that a large heart or well-furnished head can view otherwise than with pity for its narrowness, or contempt for its assumption. It will pass away inevitably together with the general dialect of superstition.

The scholarly provincial use of the word religion is that which, while recognizing all the diverse forms of religion as standing precisely on the same level, all natural and none supernatural, yet confines the application of the word strictly to theistic systems of belief. It is willing to reckon Judaism, Mohammedanism, Parseism, and so forth, as religions, because they are all monotheistic; and it is willing to include also Buddhism, Confucianism, Positivism even, provided these can be shown to have some sort of belief in a God or gods. At present it stoutly contends that these latter faiths do have such a belief, and it therefore does not deny that they are religions. But if ever it becomes settled by scholarly investigation beyond reasonable doubt that any one of them is nakedly and baldly and incontrovertibly atheistic, then the provincial scholar will be forced either to deny that it is a religion at all, or else without reserve to abandon his own provincialism. There is no escape from this dilemma. If there is no religion without a belief in God, and if Buddhism, for example, should be proved to have no belief in God in any intelligible sense, then one of two things must be true: either Buddhism is not a religion, or else there can be an atheistic religion. The provincial scholar, therefore, is bound to deny that Buddhism is atheistic, that Confucianism is atheistic, that Positivism is atheistic (if this is conceded to be a religion at all, although in this case the other horn of the dilemma is usually seized). The essence of scholarly provincialism consists in the assumed principle that nothing can be a religion that does not believe in a God or gods; and it exacts this belief as the one great postulate which religion, at least, must never question. Whether it can ever be reconciled with absolute freedom of thought, is a question whose answer seems to me very plain.

THE COSMOPOLITAN USE.

The vulgar cosmopolitan use of the word religion is that which loosely classes all religions together on equal terms, without making any inquiry as to their various doctrines. This is a very common use of the word among people who have given no particular thought to the subject, but who are free from all narrow prejudice. It is so very common that I claim it as a strictly popular use of the word; and I therefore deny that the radical who thinks Buddhism is atheistic, and yet continues to call it a religion, is guilty of any use of language which is a violation of its natural and current meaning. If questioned, most people would say without reflection that religion always implies a belief in God; yet, if convinced that Buddhism has no such belief, most people would refuse to attempt the impossible task of extruding it from its established place among the greatest religions of the world. To speak, then, of atheistic religions as at least a possibility, is not to tamper with words at all. The vulgar cosmopolitan usage warrants it, even on an appeal to the common people.

The scholarly cosmopolitan use of the word religion is that which carefully distinguishes between religion, as a permanent force in human history, and the religions which have been or are its various special forms. It lays down no a priori principle as to what all religion must be, but applies the term impartially to everything which proves itself to be a religion by doing religion's work in the world. It exacts no theistic or atheistic belief as a condition of admittance into the family of recognized religions; it seeks the unity of them all in something deeper than any belief; it treats them as all equally natural, all more or less imperfect, all amenable to the reason of mankind for their influence on character, life, and society. This usage of the word can alone be considered scientific, or become acceptable to the spirit of science; for it is the only usage which frankly concedes to science her right to sit in judgment on all human opinions. And it is the only usage which can justify the phrase Free Religion, by construing religion in a way which thoroughly respects and conserves freedom.

Which of these four usages we adopt, is a matter far broader than it seems; for as we use the word, so also do we conceive and treat the thing. I would not take a narrow, provincial view of what is certainly a ubiquitous and permanent fact of human history, nor knowingly cramp myself by that uncultured dialect, that mere vulgar patois of the soul, which has no words for ideas of universal import. Let our thought and our speech be alike cosmopolitan, large, and elevated, not unworthy of the profound and sublime realities with which they deal. Let us look for the meaning of that word religion in the light of universal human experience, and find it in that which is common to men of all times and climes, of all races and all phases of theological thought. Religion means something which is common to monotheistic Judaism and theistic Christianity,—to polytheistic Paganism and pantheistic Brahmanism and atheistic Buddhism; and this something must be discovered in depths of human nature far beneath the region where diverging thoughts appear. Despite the vast speculative chasms which yawn between these varying religions, there must be something shared by them all alike, or they would never have been classed together by the quick judgment of mankind. Nor is this something to be sought for in common beliefs or in common moral rules; these are simply products, not the productive principle itself. It must be sought for as a creative force in man, from which have proceeded all theological beliefs, whether alike or unlike, and all moral rules, whether identical or not. Not in the branches, not even in the trunk of the tree, but rather in the common sap, the common life, the common idea and law of the whole organism, must be at last discovered that secret of unity which pervades and dominates the growth of all religions. What is it?

THE THING:

THREE POPULAR CONCEPTIONS OF IT.

There are three chief popular conceptions of the essence of religion. All three consist in laying a special emphasis and stress on some one department of human nature, to the virtual neglect of other departments equally important. It is man alone that is religious in the common sense of the word; and therefore no one denies that religion is a manifestation of humanity. But whether it is fundamentally a manifestation of thought, feeling, or will, is a question on which there is a divergence of opinion. I believe that, although nobody perhaps would make religion consist either in thought, feeling, or will exclusively, yet most persons unduly emphasize the part in it played by some one of these three factors of human nature. Hence arise three theories of religion which err by disproportion; and this initial error becomes the root of vast subsequent mischief.

RELIGION AS THOUGHT.

It is the characteristic of all dogmatic systems to make opinion or belief the essence of religion. While also insisting on certain sentiments and actions, they nevertheless make orthodoxy the principal matter. Mr. Lecky has pointed out that "salvation by belief" has from the beginning been the fundamental principle of Christianity, as exhibited by its history; that this supreme emphasis laid on mental belief has been the root of persecution and countless gigantic evils. From Christianity a considerable number of free thinkers have accepted the idea that belief essentially constitutes religion, even while they reject religion itself as mere superstition; and they thus fail to comprehend the true nature of religion as completely as the narrowest and most bigoted churchman. But the day of a larger criticism and more thorough philosophy is dawning; and the notion that religion rests mainly on belief will sooner or later pass away.

RELIGION AS FEELING.

It is the characteristic of all forms of mysticism to make religion consist primarily in feeling. Certain phases of Christianity, such as Moravianism and Methodism, will at once occur to your minds as illustrations of this, requiring as they do above everything else a peculiar "state of the affections," even to the comparative disparagement of orthodoxy of opinion. While less interesting to the thinker than the elaborately constructed systems of dogmatic theology, this mystical species of religion is more cheerful, more genial, and more free from the persecuting or intolerant spirit, than its harder-seeming sister, dogmatism; and it is easy to see why Methodism, appealing chiefly to emotion and not rigorously exacting clear-cut opinions on doctrinal matters, should spread with great rapidity in an age when belief in Christian doctrines is either dying or dead.

Closely allied to mysticism, or the religion combining a maximum of feeling with a minimum of thought and action, is a species of modern radicalism for the historical influence of which I have profound respect and a large measure of sympathy, but which I regard as quite inadequate to take the lead to-day in the march of progress. I refer to New England Transcendentalism. It plants itself fundamentally on what it calls the "religious sentiment," as a distinct and special faculty of the human soul,—combining the quite unlike functions of intellectual intuition and emotional sensibility, and fitted, not only to apprehend supersensuous truths by direct vision or special illumination, but also to respond to them by an exalted range of feelings quite unlike all other sentiments in kind. For the great names which are most illustriously associated with this splendid movement of New England thought, and for the great good they have accomplished, I can yield to no one in point of admiration or gratitude; they are fixed stars in the galaxy of our age, and their light has come with divine cheer to great multitudes of darkened minds. But, however reluctantly, I am constrained to think and to say that their theory of religion is inadequate to meet the demands of the future, or even of the present. With all its mystical beauty and sweetness, it lacks a solid basis in thorough psychological analysis; it is a radiant dream, glorious and lovely, but not competent to fill the wants of humanity in this opening era of scientific thought. That there is indeed such a thing as "religious sentiment," I most certainly believe. But that it is a special faculty, a special power of reception of the highest truths which is not possessed by the pure intellect as such, I must as certainly deny. The primary and well established division of faculties is into thought, feeling, and will; or, in more technical phrase, the cognitive, sensitive, and conative faculties. What is called by Transcendentalism the "religious sentiment" is really a complex manifestation of the former two, thought and feeling; it does not constitute a fourth division, and can only be regarded as doing so in the absence of a scientific psychology. Thought is thought; feeling is feeling; and their union in consciousness cannot at all destroy their elemental nature. In a right use of language, the "religious sentiment" signifies the feelings or sentiments which accompany, or result from, the purely intellectual contemplation of the idea of God, regarded as an objective truth. It is not an intuitive faculty; it is not a distinct faculty at all; it is simply the play of feeling excited by religious thought. As well might we consider love towards parents as a faculty distinct from love towards children; whereas love is essentially love, whatever its objects, and however various may be the coloring given to it by the varying nature of its objects. Awe, veneration, love,—all the sentiments which enter into the so-called "religious sentiment" are of universal application; and when Transcendentalism builds upon the conglomerate as if it were a simple and original basis in human nature, it does but found its house, fair as are its proportions, upon the sand. A new phase of thought is succeeding to Transcendentalism now, which, while gratefully honoring its predecessor, must carry forward independently the same great work in the name of science.

RELIGION AS ACTION.

It is the characteristic of all formalism, legalism, ritualism, and so forth, to make religion consist in certain external observances, rites, or acts, which are supposed to be of saving efficacy. Dogma is of importance; emotion is of importance; but ceremonies loom up practically as supremely important, eclipsing even feeling and thought. This is not only the religion of fashion, which is naturally glad to escape the duty of living faith, but also of a very sincere and earnest set of people in whom the practical overbalances both the intellectual and the affectional nature. It is so much easier to go through a routine than it is to think hard or cherish exalted sentiments, that they come to rely on the performance of external actions as the substance of religion. Of course they soon come to be mere machines, losing heart and mind in a merely mechanical externalism.

There is also another and much more respectable class of persons who, being equally feeble in intellect and emotion, yet possess a vigorous moral nature. To them religion consists in the compliance with moral rules, the unreflective and uninspired doing of active duty. They are most excellent people, going through life with credit to themselves and usefulness to others, yet notwithstanding devoid of much that beautifies and ennobles existence. Correct in deportment, assiduous in duty, and exemplary in all relations, they deserve and receive unfeigned respect by giving themselves up to practical work as the main business of their lives, and by concentrating all their religion in action. Far be it from me to utter a word of disparagement where I so truly admire; but this idea of religion, omitting all that concerns the highest culture, the expansion and refinement and beautification of character in its more delicate aspects, leaves out much that is of incalculable value, and mistakes the part for the whole. Religion is more than moralism, though including it; and the emphasis on ethics which is practically neglect of intellectual, aesthetic, social, and spiritual culture distorts religion and belittles it.

THE EVIL OF DISPROPORTION.

There is a great deal of truth in each of the three conceptions of religion which I have briefly sketched, and to which almost all others may be ultimately reduced. The dogmatist, for instance, asserts the superlative importance of a true belief; and this it is almost impossible to overestimate. Yet the danger lies in assuming too hastily that a belief is true, and thereby putting all the energies of humanity under the guidance of falsehood, perhaps very cruel and noxious falsehood. If reason, and not revelation, is taken as the judge of truth, no harm ensues; for reason never assumes the prerogative of infallibility. But all history shows the terrible mischief of letting revelation pronounce that to be certainly true which reason pronounces to be doubtful or false. When this has happened, zeal for the safety of a creed has caused men to stifle mercy, and strangle freedom, and ride roughshod over every large interest of humanity. This is the evil of emphasizing belief unduly, and elevating dogma to the throne. Other and lesser evils result whenever mere feeling or mere outward activity receives the supreme and excessive emphasis.

Dogmatism values particular thoughts rather than thought; mysticism values particular feelings rather than feeling; formalism and moralism value particular actions rather than action. That is to say, they all value the definite and completed products of human faculties rather than the free play of the faculties themselves; and this over-valuation of the products, which is under-valuation of the faculties, is a natural consequence of the one-sided views of human nature implied by the defective views of religion just described. The finest and fullest thought ever conceived by the human mind will in due time be surpassed by its successors; and so will the noblest sentiments and the purest acts. It is a fatal error to prize the water you have drawn above the fountain from which you have drawn it. First in value is that in man from which all high thoughts and feelings and deeds proceed. While we love the truths we have won, let us love truth itself better, and be not unwilling to confess that what we once held or even now hold to be truths may yet turn out to be half-truths,—possibly even untruths. Whoever conceives religion in the one-sided manner I have depicted is unable to discern its true nature, or to protect himself from the countless brood of evils engendered by disproportion.

THE UNITY OF THOUGHT, FEELING, AND ACTION.

From what I have said, you may perhaps infer that I should urge the symmetrical development of thought, feeling and action, as equally essential to religion. This is true. The highest perfection of our humanity in all its aspects, not solely by individual but also by social effort, is, if I mistake not, religion's true end and aim. Conceding to each faculty the fullest and freest play consistent with the natural hegemony of reason and conscience, religion lays an equal emphasis on them all. Thought must lead; but it is no more important than feeling and will. It must decide all questions of duty or truth in the last appeal; but if it pours contempt on any one of its followers, it violates its high trust. Feeling must follow thought, adapting itself (as it always does in the end) to what thought declares to be the truth; although it stimulates thought to activity, it is itself the proof of that activity, and is indispensable to the whole and rounded character. But its place is not to govern. In every healthy mind, feeling takes care of itself, and in time will always twine itself about mature convictions as closely and as naturally as the vine clings about the supporting trellis. Hence it is unwise to borrow trouble or cherish anxiety, if new truths or beliefs produce disturbance of the feelings, or even distress. Be patient. Give the sentiments ample time to adapt themselves to what your deliberate reason accepts as true, and be sure that in the long run the truth will vindicate itself even to them. Whoever has a whole-souled devotion to truth, and cherishes the certainty that nothing else can permanently bless or benefit, will be willing, even while seeking to feed the sources of all noble feeling, to endure the temporary discord of heart and head in order to realize the higher concord that is made possible thereby. "Be simply true to truth," is the dictate of religion, "and the happiness that flows from consenting heart and head will only tarry; it is sure to come." This is the freedom that is needed: let the mind freely search for the priceless prize of truth, and let the affections freely follow in its wake to crown the victor with delight.

But this is not all that religion demands. The will is the centre of the personality. What thought decrees to be right, will must accomplish. It is the executor of a wisdom not its own; and the wisdom it executes is shadowy and unsubstantial till will has put upon it the royal seal of action. The stress laid on overt deeds by the more moralist is none too great, if equal stress is also laid on feeling and thought. The tree is known by its fruits; the faith is known by its life. Piffable indeed is the being whose religion does not create conduct in harmony with the highest conviction and the noblest sentiment. Only in the full-orbed symmetry of a character in which thought, feeling, and will are balanced and harmonized, can religion behold her work complete. To evolve out of crudity and malformation the perfect man and the perfect woman, is her task and glory. Three in one and one in three,—this is the real trinity of thought, feeling, and will, which constitutes the essence of every individuality; and religion has no other function than to fill the world with great and noble individuals.

THE NEW CONCEPTION OF RELIGION.

Perhaps you will now say: "This, then, is the essence of religion—perfection, or symmetrical development of thought, feeling, and will; of head, heart, and conscience."

Not exactly that. The perfection of humanity is indeed the object of religion, but it is not religion itself. Deeper than thought or will or feeling in its origin, religion appears in its universal aspect as the decree of Nature that her own ends shall be achieved, and hence as that inward impulsion of the soul towards the right and true which makes itself objective to thought in the ideal of humanity; while in its personal aspect it appears as the total and voluntary self-devotion of humanity to the realization of this ideal. Nothing is religion which does not include this profound impulsion of man's whole being to the conversion of ideal excellence into actual character,—this profound endeavor, partly within and partly beneath consciousness, to push forward the development of humanity in the direction of its natural and ideal goal. All religion implies these two things, an ideal and an effort to realize it. Herein it differs from simple morality. Morality proclaims a law, and commands obedience to it; religion is the inward impulsion of Nature, seconded by the conscious effort of the individual, to conform to it. It is owing to no man's choice that he has an ideal of what he ought to be ever before his eyes; Nature has provided this. Nor is it owing to any man's private thought that he feels bound by it as a sacred law; Nature, whether he thinks it or not, creates a sense of obligation which he cannot shake off even if he would. Am I wrong, then, in conceiving religion as something more than thought or feeling or will, and deeper than all these? As something ever active and creative in the very depths of man's being, impelling but not compelling him to a higher stage of development? Am I wrong in conceiving that this interior force, dwelling and operating in the very core of our humanity, holding up the everlasting ideal before our eyes, and laying upon us a sense of obligation to realize it which is a joy to the virtuous man and a knotted scourge to the vicious, is but an utterance within us of the one great law of the universe—evolution? If I am right in these surmises and in this conception of the essence of religion, many obscure questions seem to be illuminated by a sudden light.

For instance, the development theory, whether as presented by Mr. Darwin or by Mr. Spencer, has caught no glimpse of any internal cause operating to impel organisms in the path of continuous evolution; they have discovered real external causes at work in this direction, but that is all. Supposing that religion is an actual interior force, impelling man upward in the career of moral evolution—a force not purely voluntary on his part, but also at work within him beneath his consciousness, creating an ideal for his guidance and by a natural sense of obligation stimulating him to pursue it,—then here we detect Nature in the very act of evolutionary causation, at least in a single case; and it becomes by fair analogy at least an occasion for suspecting that in all evolution some similar cause is operative. The apparent absence of any such interior cause, distinct from the action of the outward environment, has been and is the greatest deficiency in the evolutionary philosophy. But if I am right in my conjectures, an interior force has been discovered in the moral evolution of man which directly operates to improve the species, and which involves the co-operative action of the universal whole. Reasoning backwards from this case to other cases, it becomes at least a legitimate scientific hypothesis to imagine that Nature is not a blind or random worker in that process of universal and continuous evolution which is the great miracle of modern science.

Again, if my view of religion is sound, the phenomena of conscience become more clearly intelligible. Why is it that right-doing produces happiness and wrong-doing misery? No cause has been hitherto discoverable. If Nature, however, ordains the faithful but free pursuit of the moral ideal by each individual, as her chosen means of ultimately improving the human species as a whole, then we discover a reason for the connection of spiritual peace with faithfulness and spiritual pain with unfaithfulness. These consequences of our moral action would become her admonition to us, her encouragement to co-operate with her by virtue, and her rebuke for our refusal to co-operate. To render strict obedience to our ideal and to pursue it with unquenchable devotion, would be to harmonize our private wills with the great dominant and evident purpose of the universe, and would necessarily create in our consciousness a sense of harmony with it which could be only a pure delight,—nay, the purest of all delights; while our wilful disobedience of the ideal would be to place ourselves in direct opposition to the general current, to thwart to the extent of our puny power the universal purpose, and inevitably to create within us a consciousness of discord and disharmony with Nature which could be nothing but pain. In this manner a reason becomes visible for the constant association of pain with vice and of happiness with virtue which otherwise seems not discoverable.

This, then, to recapitulate, is the conception of religion that I would urge, as something far deeper and sublimer than any special belief that could be mentioned: namely, a permanent creative force in human nature, partly voluntary and partly involuntary, which prompts an active effort to perfect human nature itself by constant and increasing conformity to ideal excellence in all directions. Is not this conception so vast and grand as to mark a palpable advance in religious philosophy? Does it not carry forward, and, as it were, consummate, the magnificent movement made by New England Transcendentalism in the history of thought? Does it not leave absolute freedom for the intellect to investigate all problems, even including the questions of a personal God and personal immortality, without pledging it beforehand to arrive at any particular conclusion; and thereby to lay solid and deep the foundations of a true science of religion? And does it not plainly subserve the highest interests of religion itself, by creating a complete reconciliation between it and science, and thereby obviating the most threatening danger of religion at the present day; namely, the revolt of modern scientific thought against her claims? For myself, I can answer these questions in only one way; and I have availed myself of this opportunity to make a more thorough explanation than I have been hitherto able to make of the definition of religion offered in the Fifty Affirmations: "Religion is the effort of Man to perfect himself." I trust it is not too much to ask that those who are really interested in the great questions of religious reform will give at least a thoughtful and candid consideration to the views here presented.

GRADATIONS OF RELIGION.

What I have said thus far, however, may not be wholly clear, unless something further should be added. A profound interior impulsion to seek the complete realization in character and in society of the highest idea of human excellence constitutes, as I have endeavored to show, the true essence of religion. But the direction taken by this interior force must depend, so far as it is affected by the human will, on the degree of intelligence at any particular time developed in the human mind. If man is ignorant and uncultured, his religion will reflect the fact; his ideal will be low and imperfect, and scarcely appear to deserve the name of an ideal at all. When the savage construes religion to include the slaying of his prisoner of war at the altar of his gods, and perhaps even the eating of his flesh in a solemn sacrificial feast, the civilized mind revolts with horror from the spectacle, and exclaims that this is not religion, but pure superstition. Yet cannot we discern, even in these horrid rites, the stirrings of a feeble sense of duty, which needs but to be enlightened to echo instantaneously the protest of civilized man? Superstition itself is a conglomerate of utterly irrational notions with this germinal principle of true religion. Education and culture, long continued through many generations, will suffice to rectify the evils of superstition by fostering the development of the divine seed it contains. Through numberless stages must ignorant and superstitious man patiently pass, before his savage religion can become civilized, emancipated, and purified. But it concerns us all to do justice even to superstition itself, and to perceive that it is only the crude, perhaps vile and disgusting, commencement of what all the world shall at last unite to reverence. The thread that shall guide us through the tangled labyrinth of historical religion, notwithstanding the frightful sights and sounds that assail us on every hand, is the clearly conceived and firmly held principle that religion is essentially Man's effort to perfect himself according to the light that is in him; and that, in proportion as his light increases, his religion becomes purer and nobler. With this principle to guide us, we shall be ourselves amazed to see how plain grows the path we are to tread.

RELIGION AND THE BELIEF IN GOD.

But it may be a source of disquietude to some gentle and reverential natures that it should be even proposed, explicitly and directly, to divorce the idea of religion from the idea of God,—to the extent, at least, of leaving the existence of God an open question to be answered by scientific thought. Let me say a few words on this point.

The inevitable consequence of adopting the conception of religion here sketched is certainly to make the spiritual evolution of humanity towards truth and right the direct object at which religion must aim; and to leave the mind at perfect liberty to determine, according to the fixed laws of thought, what truth and right are, and what the spiritual evolution of humanity requires. It is true that religion, thus conceived, cannot assume beforehand even that God exists; and the devout spirits that find the very breath of life in their faith in God, and have never felt the enormous pressure of modern science against the ancient bulwarks of this faith, may not un-naturally shrink back from thus putting in peril the dearest conviction of their souls. For all such I can but feel sympathy as tender as it is sincere. It is to these very ones that I would say, Be brave and strong enough to rest your faith in God on faith in truth and right! If religion shall be consecrated solely to truth and right, as its just, natural, and necessary object, and shall waive frankly and avowedly the one dogma of God's existence to which it has hitherto convulsively clung, have you any cause to fear? Do you dread lest truth and right may possibly, after all, not lead to belief in God? Do you cherish a faith in him so feeble and unsound that you dare not trust it to the sentences of truth and right? Or would you wish to retain any faith against which the decision of truth and right should prove to be adverse? If these things are so, then your faith in God is only scepticism in disguise: you do not really believe in him at all; you cherish a belief whose basis you suspect to be rotten and false, and therefore will not suffer to be examined even by yourself. In such a belief as that, there is nothing noble, nothing that will not break and suddenly give way beneath the weight of unexpected disaster. No! It is because I do believe in God that I am willing to submit my belief in him to the sharpest and most searching scrutiny of science. I am willing to do with this my dearest belief what the Christian clergy dare not do with their own professed faith in prayer,—submit it without reserve to scientific tests, promising to abide by the result. If science can kill my faith, let it die! I want none that is not immortal. Trust me, it is no secret desire to get rid of belief in God that moves me to espouse this larger conception of religion; I desire only truth and right. If they confirm my belief, well and good; if shall then be infinitely more dear and precious than ever before. But if they destroy it, then, also, well and good! I shall not have been freed from an unsuspected superstition. Surely this is a manlier, a nobler, a freer, a more inspiring conviction, than the secret thought that belief in God cannot be trusted before the bar of truth and right! If indeed it cannot be trusted there, what is it worth? Or who would want it? Or why should any one weep when it is cast out in dishonor? But if before this august tribunal the belief in God shall receive the seal of truth itself, and rest no longer on childish guesses or traditions or scriptures, what believer in God could do otherwise than rejoice? It is time the world well understood that, in all questions of truth and right, the ultimate appeal must lie to the educated intelligence of the human race,—in one word, to science; and whoever has at heart a real belief in God will not hesitate to submit it to this or any other test. What could be clearer than that they who dare submit it have a mightier faith than they who dare not?

THE FUTURE OF RELIGION.

In fact, the destinies of religion are bound up, as I believe, with the possibility of broadening the popular conception of it in some such way as I have tried to show. The common people are little aware of the nature of the intellectual influences that are now acting upon them, and do not suspect the slow changes thus wrought in their own ideas. But it is true that the cultivated mind of to-day has broken with Christianity, and, for lack of the very conception of religion I urge to-day, is breaking with religion too. Deny it or disguise it as they please, the watchful and intelligent observers of the times know this to be the fact. Science has been compelled to assume an attitude of hostility towards religion which is indeed justifiable, considering the claims made by religion itself, but which is none the less injurious both to one and to the other. If forced to choose deliberately between the two, mankind must decide for science; they cannot help themselves. The knowledge of facts never gives way to anybody or anything; and that is what science is. Unless, therefore, religion can prove itself to be other than it has allowed itself to appear, its doom is sealed, and its very name will survive only as a part of history.

It is with utter earnestness, therefore, that I declare my own conviction to be that, unless religion has been described with substantial accuracy in what I have said to-day, it will wholly vanish from the world's life. If it is not substantially the effort of Man to perfect himself, unrestricted by the obligation of arriving at any foregone theological conclusions, the world will have no use for it hereafter. Whatever perishes, freedom of thought must survive. Yet I cannot frame any other conception of religion which shall utterly and unreservedly concede freedom of thought. In urging it, therefore, I believe that I not only defend science, but religion too, patching up no wretched compromise between them, but pointing out the common ground on which both may stand erect, as natural allies instead of foes. Now, as ever, radicalism is the true conservatism; and if I had no other design but simply to conserve religion among men, without the least interest in the truth as such, I should most certainly urge these views of it as the only ones that could save it from destruction. Let that pass for what it is worth; I speak now as one who believes in religion, thus conceived, from the sole of the foot to the crown of the head,—without apology either for the name or the thing, and without the smallest concession to the prejudice that assails either the one or the other. To-day I speak only to the large in heart and broad in mind,—to those who must accept science and would fain accept religion too. To these I say that science itself would lose her fearless love of truth, were it not that religion fed its secret springs; that social reform would lose its motive and inspiration, literature and art their beauty, and all human life its sweetest and tenderest grace, did not religion evermore create the insatiable hunger after perfection in the soul of man. Bright, cheerful, ennobling, stimulating, emancipating, religion is the greatest friend of humanity, ever guiding it upward and onward to the right and the true; aye, and to all we yearn for, if, as we believe, the right and the true are indeed the pathway to God.

The Sanctuary of Superstition.

N. B.—Brief and pithy extracts for this column will be gratefully received. Please send marked copies.

A CHEERFUL PROPHECY.—Germany has not been visited with these chastisements. So much the worse for Germany! "Whom the Lord loveth he chastises, even as a father the son that is dear to him. The son that is without chastisement is a bastard, whom its father is ashamed to own." Because, notwithstanding our guilty neglect of Catholic education of our Catholic youth in most parts of the United States,—notwithstanding that in many parts of the country the semblance of Catholic increase is due only to the tide of emigration from Europe, while the country is devouring the Catholic faith of the children born in it—we yet believe that God has purposes of mercy for our people. Our trials are coming—near at hand and very fiery.—Freeman's Journal.

A BATCH OF CHRISTIAN ADVERTISEMENTS.—These ludicrous attempts to trade on religion are contained in various English journals:—

E. J. TRINGHAM, DRAPER, ETC., DAVENHAM, CHESHIRE, has a vacancy for an improver, or junior hand. One diligent in business, who would help on the work of the Lord, preferred. State age, salary, references, etc.

A CHRISTIAN YOUNG MAN DESIRES TO OBTAIN a situation in any capacity of usefulness. He would like to devote his spare time to the Lord's work. Good testimonials. G. L., Post Office, Limsfield, Redhill, Surrey.

A GENTLEMAN OF CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLE, with a capital of about £2,000, is desirous of entering into partnership with another Christian, where mutual sympathy might be relied on. A mechanical engineer or engineer's brass founder preferred. Address H. H., No. 40 New Bridge street, Edgbaston, Birmingham.

BUTLER WANTED—MUST BE A SINGLE MAN and one of the Lord's redeemed family. A Scotchman preferred. Address Mr. Allen, Inchmartin, Inchture, Perth.

A GOVERNESS, WHO DESIRES TO WORK FOR Jesus among his "little ones," requires a re-engagement. Satisfactory testimonials. Good English, French, and Music to junior pupils. Address Alpha, 25 Warwick Lane, Paternoster row.

GOVERNESS-PUPIL.—A LADY WISHES TO RE-CEIVE a young lady, to bring her up so that she may become an Efficient Teacher on Christian principles. Valuable Lectures given in the school. Age about 14. Terms moderate.

A CHRISTIAN YOUNG GENTLEMAN (WHO loves the Lord's work, going into the grocery business, would be glad if any brother could tell him of an opening in a small town, or large village. A. B., Balmoral House, Nelson road, Southsea.

WANTED BY AN EVANGELIST IN THE NORTH of England, formerly engaged in London, an engagement as accountant or bookkeeper, in any house of business in London or any part of the south of England. He would be glad to devote the whole of his time to the Lord's service, providing it be where the influence of man would not interfere with his following the leading of the Holy Spirit. Good references. Health of family is the cause of seeking a speedy change. Apply to A. B., office of The Christian.

TO THE BENEVOLENT.—A STRIVING PROFESSIONAL man, and laborous worker in Christ's vineyard, wants to borrow twenty pounds for a short time. Please communicate, directly, with Mr. O'Connor, printer, No. 14 Myddelton street, Clerkenwell. Full particulars given.

HEALING THROUGH PRAYER.—THE ADVERTISER is a physician, suffering under paralytic infirmities, from severe arthritic neuralgia, the consequences of chilling exposure during seasons of itinerant gospel preaching. After having spent more than thirty years in the study of the ordinary science of medicine, he has, during the past ten years, abundantly proved in his experience and practice the superior blessedness and power of the divine precepts for healing, as recorded in the Epistle of James and other parts of the Scripture. He is desirous of meeting a few afflicted believers like-minded, particularly elders, Scripturally qualified, who would be willing to reside in the neighborhood of his present abode, for the purpose of united prayer, encouragement, and recovery from certain kinds of affliction, especially if judicial in their appointment, can only be obtained, and should therefore be sought, by sincere and fervent united prayer. Thus shall the Lord be glorified. Communications to be addressed to J. Payley, M. D., Oakland Lodge, Malvern Link, Great Malvern.

NO FELLOWSHIP.—Is it the duty of deacons of congregations to withhold or refuse to pass the emblems of the body and blood of our Lord (called the Lord's Supper) to those not members of the "one body," and those who have been excluded or from whom the fellowship has been withdrawn?

Please give the Scripture, pro and con, and oblige, A. DILLON.

This question was answered not long ago. It is clearly the duty of the deacons to refuse the loaf and cup to such persons. It is not possible to point to Scriptures that censure or forbid that which was never attempted to be practiced in the apostolic churches, so far as known to us. But the Lord's Supper was given to the disciples, to be kept by them. They continued steadfastly in the breaking of bread. When the apostle charges Christians to put away from among them the wicked person, it is clear that he is not longer to be allowed to continue with them in their Christian fellowship or acts of devotion. The Lord's Supper is one of these acts; it is the "joint participation of the body and blood of Christ"—and one put away has no right to such joint participation.—Cincinnati Christian Standard (Dec. 28, 1872).

AT THE CROSS.—Calvary is a little hill to the eye, but it is the only spot on earth that touches heaven. The Cross is foolishness to human reason, and a stumbling block to human righteousness; but there only do mercy and truth meet together, and righteousness and peace kiss each other. Jesus Christ was a man of low condition, and died a death of shame on an accursed tree; but there is salvation in no other. There is no mercy-seat in the universe, but at His feet.—Dr. Hoge.

ALREADY DONE.—A Maine correspondent in the Herald of Dec. 12, inquires, "Will not some Yankee invent a heart-stretcher, and give it the power of a stump-machine?" Already done by the Lord, my brother, and done far better than you request. The grace of God will do the work thoroughly—completely. Recommend the people to try it. It will put the heart right for any and every good work; and it never fails.—Zion's Herald.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OGDON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED previously, Nine Hundred and Sixty-seven Shares, $66,700.
W. A. TUCKER, West Newton, Mass., One Share, 100 $66,800

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending March 1, 1873.

Lilly B. Head.....	$ 3 00	Geo. W. Mead.....	2 00
Jno. Hoffman.....	10	Adolph Pfafflin.....	3 00
F. B. Hanson.....	75	Mary E. Hayden.....	3 00
Wm. F. Perkins.....	2 00	Henry G. Spencer.....	3 00
Leck T. Tufts.....	1 50	H. L. Runyan.....	1 00
F. B. Webber.....	1 00	Jno. Blain.....	75
E. Bryant.....	3 00	Dr. Rimbberger.....	1 50
Ada P. Gist.....	3 00	G. A. Atwood.....	1 50
Matthew Anderson.....	3 00	M. B. Leavitt.....	1 50
Elizabeth Blackstock.....	3 00	E. G. Blandell.....	75
Mary S. Osborn.....	3 00	A. O. Royleton.....	3 00
Ephraim Geo.....	1 50	E. Liverzey.....	1 00
D. C. Glover.....	2 00	W. T. Newton.....	3 00
D. Wilson.....	75	Mrs. M. A. Hale.....	3 00
Hollis H. Pinkham.....	3 00	Sophia B. Carter.....	3 00
Peter Newcomer.....	1 00	Dr. Alexander.....	50
L. C. P. Frer.....	3 00	E. G. Waters.....	7 00
D. C. Thayer.....	1 00	W. H. Chamberlain.....	7 00
R. M. Mellen.....	1 50	C. B. Powell.....	1 17
Harriet Dayton.....	1 50	Geo. H. Holtzman.....	13 00
W. J. Keen.....	1 50	Jno. G. Shortall.....	2 50
W. W. Laundon.....	3 00	Mrs. M. G. House.....	75
J. E. Hitchcock.....	6 00	Joseph Whitney.....	3 00
Chas. Long.....	1 50	Isaac Kolman.....	3 00
Thos. Nast.....	3 00	Bates (of Theo. Read-)	1 50
E. W. Knight.....	75	Ing Rooms.....	1 50
A. Vauclerk.....	1 00	F. Symmes.....	1 50
Jamen Rutledge.....	1 50	H. A. Mosher.....	75
Wm. F. Thornton.....	1 50	Mary J. Rogers.....	50
A. H. Wimbish.....	3 00	J. Mason Macomber.....	1 17
McKean & Forrest.....	3 00	C. G. Mason.....	1 50
J. B. Tenney.....	2 00	W. R. Pearson.....	3 00
L. T. C. Garvin.....	25	J. W. Sullot.....	6 00
L. F. Gardner.....	80	Wm. Morris.....	3 00
Henry M. Dexter.....	25	Wm. Sterns.....	3 00
Jay W. Sharp.....	10	L. B. Burr.....	2 00
T. W. Hugginson.....	20	J. W. Gilchell.....	75
P. H. Bateson & Co.....	20	A. J. Root & Co.....	10 00
Arthur Hildreth.....	10	Jno. Wetherbee.....	10 00
Dr. Margier.....	25	Jno. Winslow.....	2 50
L. E. Marquisee.....	20	Philip Chatterton.....	3 50
E. Ripley.....	10	H. A. Mills.....	3 50
S. Mason.....	35	O. Chris. A. Day.....	50
Wm. Tasker.....	35	C. K. Emerson.....	50
Mrs. C. L. Case.....	8 00	Dwight P. Wilcox.....	50
David Wright.....	4 00	L. W. Otis.....	50

The Index.

MARCH 8, 1878.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, with out seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussion on this subject which shall do no wrong place in other papers.

The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWERS, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor
ADAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
OCTAVIAN BARNES FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HODGKINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTS, RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, WILLIAM H. STREETER, MRS. E. D. CHERRY, REV. CHARLES VOTRY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONSIEUR D. CORWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Please send all matter intended for any particular issue of THE INDEX at least a fortnight in advance of date. We shall be very greatly obliged by attention to this request.

Attention is invited to the advertising rates of THE INDEX as adopted by the Directors of the Index Association at their last meeting. They supersede the unauthorized rates announced by mistake in THE INDEX of February 15.

The Independent says: "The Catholic World wittily suggests that Mr. Abbot, of THE INDEX, 'renounce his Popish name, in his zeal to abolish every vestige of Christianity.' Not so fast. Every Catholic has to renounce 'the world, the flesh, and the devil.' We shall be ready to renounce the 'Abbot' when our witty critic is ready to renounce the 'World.'"

Whether the following satirical characterization of an "out-and-out Christian," given by Dickens in Oliver Twist, will be accepted by the parties described as scientifically accurate, may be doubtful; but at any rate it may throw some light on the probable meaning of the Turks when they talk of "Christian dogs."

"He's a rum dog. Don't he look fierce at any strange cove that laughs or sings when he's in company!" pursued the Dodger. "Won't he growl at all, when he hears a fiddle playing! And don't he hate other dogs as ain't of his breed! Oh, no!"

"He's an out-and-out Christian," said Charley.

"This was merely intended as a tribute to the animal's abilities, but it was an appropriate remark in another sense, if Master Bates had only known it; for there are a great many ladies and gentlemen, claiming to be out-and-out Christians, between whom and Mr. Sikes' dog there exist very strong and singular points of resemblance."

The increasing audacity of the Catholics of this country is well illustrated in the attempt to exempt certain Catholic books from United States duties. It is inconceivable that the request should be granted. Yet stranger things of the kind have happened, especially in New York. Let the Committee on Ways and Means be watched closely.

"Mr. Roosevelt, of New York, has introduced in the House of Representatives at Washington a bill to relieve certain books from duties, which provides that the following books, to-wit: 'The Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland,' 'The Illustrated History of Ireland,' 'The New School History of Ireland,' 'Jesus and Jerusalem,' 'Visits to the Altar of Mary,' 'The Living Crib,' 'Student's Manual of Irish History,' and 'The Catechism of Irish History,' all by Sister Mary Frances Clare, of the Convent of Poor Clares, Kenmare county, Ireland, and which are published solely for the benefit of the poor, be admitted into the United States free from any duty which is now or may be hereafter laid upon foreign books or publications under any law. The bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means."

THE COUNTER-PETITION SENT TO CONGRESS.

The following additional lists of signatures to the remonstrance against the proposed Christian Amendment to the United States Constitution have been received since our last acknowledgment:—

Dr. C. G. Clark, Maumee City, Ohio, sends two hundred and forty-one names; Mr. S. W. Ayers, Delta, Ohio, thirty-five; Mr. D. W. Gilbert, Keene, New Hampshire, eleven; Mr. Geo. E. Bradford, Keene, New Hampshire, eleven; Mr. Ernest Prusslug, Chicago, Illinois, thirty-seven; Mr. James Robinson, Syracuse, New York, seven; Dr. J. S. Gijon, Oskaloosa, Iowa, seventy-six; Mr. George Stafford, Norwalk, Ohio, eighty-nine. In addition to these, three single signatures have been sent.

These lists raise the total number of names forwarded directly to this office, and acknowledged in THE INDEX, to Thirty-five Thousand, One Hundred and Seventy-nine (35,179). Pasted all together in a huge roll, the remonstrance measures nine hundred and fifty-three feet in length, and would have been more than a quarter of a mile long, if so many of the single petitions had not had double columns of names. It was forwarded by express to the Hon. Charles Sumner, at Washington, on February 26, the day when the National Convention of the Christianizers assembled in New York. Last year Mr. Sumner wrote us that he would present the remonstrance "with pleasure and sympathy," and it was therefore sent to his care, with a request that, if his feeble health should prevent his doing so, he would place the remonstrance in the hands of some fellow-senator in sympathy with its object. It is greatly to be hoped that Mr. Sumner himself may be able to present it. Before these words meet the eyes of our readers, however, it is probable that the telegraph will have already announced its presentation. Coming directly after the New York Convention referred to, the object of which is to secure the adoption of the very amendment now so numerously protested against, the remonstrance cannot fail to call public attention to the fact that a deep and widespread interest is taken in this attempted outrage on religious liberty. The list ought to have enrolled a million names; and the only reason it does not is to be found in the general scepticism still prevailing as to the vitality of the aggressive movement. But the protest is strong enough to be heard, even by politicians; and the time and labor spent in securing it could not have been better devoted. May the cause of freedom be indeed as safe as so many fancy it!

ENLISTING THE WOMEN.

The call for the National Convention just held in New York by the advocates of the Christian Amendment will be found on another page, with the list of names in full. At present writing, only the most meagre report of the proceedings has reached us; but the statement that "a resolution was adopted calling upon the women of the United States to aid the work of the Convention," is significant. Probably a great majority of the women of this country would be in favor of the movement; and, if their sympathies are once fairly and fully enlisted, their influence will be great. Nor is there any reason why their sympathies should not be enlisted. Women are usually less governed by considerations of expediency than men; they respond more directly to an appeal to their hearts or consciences. Since the great strength of Evangelicalism, in all the churches of the land, is to be found in the women, it is only necessary to convince them that their religion demands the recognition of God, Christ, and Bible by the government, in order to make them enthusiastic workers for the project. It will be easy to convince them of this. They will not, as their lukewarm husbands do, say A and refuse to say B. The fact that a powerful attempt to carry out the project would raise such a storm as this country has never yet seen, would not weigh much with them. They will be willing to sacrifice anything for their religion; and their own enthusiasm would soon quicken the sluggish blood of their Christian brethren. It is a shrewd policy in the Convention to appeal to the women. Whatever work they take up in good earnest, they are willing to spend time, labor, and money for; and, while they generally have to get the money from the men, they proved in the late war how much their own energy and zeal can accomplish. It is sad to think what splendid devotion is now all ready to be offered up on the altar of a terrible superstition. When the clergy and the women conspire together, he has brains more dense than lignum vite who can discern no peril to liberty.

PITY ME.

I knew of a lady who was breakfasting with Samuel Rogers, the hospitable English poet. Presently a servant looked in and made this mysterious remark: "Please, sir, the pity me's is all out!" The poet explained that, having always a great many more invitations than he could accept, it was his custom to keep on hand a supply of note-paper, on which he had written, "Pity me, I am engaged;" and these had merely to be forwarded by his servant to the proper address. On this occasion, the supply of "Pity me's" had given out.

From good Christians towards supposed heretics, the supply of pity never gives out. But it is curious to see how, in religious newspapers, the tone of "pity-me" is undying. In newspapers avowedly atheistic, like the Boston Investigator, there is sometimes observable a tinge of sadness which might be dispelled, it would seem, if its brave editor believed in personal immortality. But this shadow itself is sunshine, compared with that which constantly shows itself in religious newspapers. Probably it is because the worst sorrow of the atheist is after all secular, and will end with time; whereas that of the Evangelical believer is projected into eternity, and covers a supposed world of ruined souls.

Be this as it may, it would seem that all the modern improvements in Evangelical theology had not yet removed the Puritan gloom. What confessions those are in the old journals of "holy Mr. Cotton" and the wonderful Mathers! "I have sinned myself into utter darkness." "I was in the suburbs of hell all day." Surely, one would think that, in these times of bilious Beechers and horse-loving Murrays, all these shadows would disappear.

But it is not so. The horseman cannot ride away from his sorrow: post equitem sedet atra cura. One may open the Christian Union itself, and there, in the very table-talk of the Beecher family—jubilant, popular, healthy, wealthy, and wise as they are—appears this note of hereditary gloom.

Take, for instance, the number for February 5, which lies before me. Thomas K. Beecher, in a long article, defends the Pope for calling all modern civilization devilish, and urges the same view:—

"We may find many reasons for calling civilization devilish. . . . If Satan be archangel fallen, imperious, proud, and loving liberty, and longing for opportunity and spread, then it cannot be denied that modern civilization, in its love of liberty and reviling of dignities, strikingly resembles its author."

Turning to another column, we find Henry Ward Beecher making admissions, which seem to me enormous, as to the gloomy side of his own nature:—

"I suppose there is not a thoughtful or sensitive man on the earth who has not days when it seems to him as though everything on earth was vanity and vexation of spirit, and as though life was worthlessness."

Now I hope I am not wholly without thought or sensitiveness, but I can honestly say that I have not had such a day as this since I can remember; and I trust that there are many quite as fortunate. Five minutes at a time of such an unreasonable mood one might confess to having had; but even that seems a thing to be ashamed of, and it would be more charitable to attribute it to the neglect of the laws of digestion. But in Mr. Beecher's case, I think they came directly from that dreadful boyhood which he describes in the same column; that period when he found the thought of heaven itself "a sorrow and a sadness," because he thought that "Catharine and Mary and Edward and William" would go to heaven, but that he, because he had not been "converted," would not. And to think how many children are still living under that blighting shadow—poor little things!

Yet, in another column, we come upon still stronger confessions, which seem to me, I must say, very morbid:—

"When I was abroad, and could not speak a foreign language, and neither knew nor was known, I became profoundly lonesome. I was homeick; and not only that—I felt that I was worthless. To be annihilated, and to be conscious of it, is a condition of great suffering to a proud man; and to go round from town to town, and think that I was the most insignificant and worthless of all things, was a sore trial. I was nothing to anybody, and nobody was anything to me. I went round a wretched shadow—only it was a shadow that had a heart in it, and that could suffer pain. And I remember that this passage came to me—'Ye are no more strangers and foreigners.'"

Now when one thinks of the immense charm and delight of the first glimpse of foreign life to an American,—the novelty of the simplest things, the sights in the shop windows, the charm of the home life, the spectacle of this new world of human beings "loving and beloved, by Nature endeared to one another," as Epictetus says,—it seems to me simply incredible that any healthy-minded man should feel for ten minutes as Mr. Beecher felt. To be "insignificant!" Cannot even an American consent to be personally insignificant for a day or two, and lose his own momentous individuality in the presence of a new world—the old world of human beings? Why, Carlyle's looking up at the stars and groaning out, "It's a sad sight!" seems to me no remoter from a healthful and natural condition. I remember with joy the different sensations of Maria Mitchell, who told me that, when alone in Paris, waiting for her friends and her letters of invitation, unable to speak one word of the language, she wandered about in perfect happiness, full of exhilaration at the joyous world around. But then, Maria Mitchell was brought up a "Friend" of the most liberal school! Is that the difference?

I have purposely chosen the Christian Union and its kindly editor, as offering the most favorable side of what is called Evangelical religion. "If the righteous scarcely be saved, how shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" If these representatives of sunshine still carry the shadow about with them, what shall we expect of the author of "Finney on Revivals"?

At one of the last New England Yearly Meetings of Friends, there were present some of those cheerful exhorters who are laboring to reform all the ancient dignity and sweetness out of the Society, and, instead of "waiting on the Spirit," to substitute all the noisy ways of modern revivalists. One of these, meeting a sweet and brave young girl, a member of the Society of Friends by birth and of the Free Religious Association, said to her half doubtfully, "I suppose you ply us?" To which the frank maiden answered, with an equal plainness of speech, "Yes, I am sure I do." And there the discussion ended.

T. W. H.

TEACHINGS OF JESUS.

This is the title of a very small volume of forty-four duodecimo pages, which probably has not been sent to THE INDEX, or to any other paper. It does not belong to the class of books with similar names, designed to show the Orthodoxy of Jesus and the Jesuitism of Orthodoxy. Its intent is not doctrinal even after the most liberal fashion, but practical solely. The author collects only those sayings of Jesus that bear on human duty, omitting the precepts which have a religious significance, or which prescribe duties to God. Nor even in this respect is the selection comprehensive. The pages contain almost nothing from the Fourth Gospel,—not apparently for the reason that the Fourth Gospel is less authentic than the others, but because its language is more abstract than that of Matthew; and yet this is merely conjecture, for there is no critical or explanatory preface telling on what principle the compiler excluded what most Christians regard as the deepest practical sayings in the New Testament conveyed in the language of the "beloved disciple." Perhaps the practical teachings of the Fourth Gospel were considered to be addressed more particularly to Christian believers,—as indeed they are,—and therefore to be less general in their application. The author wishes to present none but universal aphorisms. His single sentence of preface declares that "the object in publishing this selection (chiefly from the text of Matthew) is to present, in one body, those sayings of Jesus which give rules of life applicable to all men and all time."

But here again we are met by a difficulty. On what principle, or by what rule, are these separated from the rest? Who is to judge what sayings are universal and what are not? If each individual must decide this for himself, no single compendium will answer the purpose. There are those who doubt, and with reason too, whether any of them are in the strict sense of the word "universal,"—whether all of them are not more or less incidental and local, formed to suit the exigency of an approaching end of the world. If the fundamental idea of Jesus was—as it appears clearly to have been—that the new state, the "kingdom of heaven," might be expected any day, before his disciples could carry the tidings of it to the cities of Israel, such a conception must have colored all his practical teaching and dictated most of it. Whoever reads the New Testament with this thought in his mind will have unexpected light break out on him from every sentence.

Now the teaching which was prompted by an anticipation like that of the approaching termination of the existing order of things is applicable only to such as cherish the anticipation. So far from meeting the wants of all men in all time, it meets the wants of a very few men at a peculiar juncture in time. It is teaching suited to an emergency, and to such an emergency as may never be thought of again. Nearly the whole of the "Sermon on the Mount" is composed of precepts of this character. The ethics of Matthew, more than any others in the Gospels, far more than those of John, bear the stamp of the millennial idea. They are unsuited to the requirements and impractical in the circumstances of a continuously progressing world.

But passing this consideration by, neither raising any question in regard to the authenticity of the language put into the mouth of Jesus, yet our doubts respecting the compiler's method are not at an end. Why, for example, does he omit some precepts and insert others of precisely the same complexion? Why does he strike out the injunction to turn the other cheek to the smiter, and allow to stand the command, "Give to him that asketh of thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away"? Why does he print as from Jesus the strong language respecting adultery in the fifth chapter of Matthew, and drop the equally strong language dissuading from marriage in the nineteenth? The one passage is as emphatic as the other, and no less authentic. If it be said that the one is applicable to all men equally, while the other is applicable to none but men singularly circumstanced, it might be asked again on what ground people are recommended in these times and places,—in New York and Boston, for instance, to say nothing of other cities,—to live like the fowls of the air and the lilies of the field, toiling not, neither gathering into barns? A word or two of explanation would not have been amiss here; the task of the interpreter comes in play. And yet nothing is so dangerous as interpretation; for no interpretation is final, and through the multitude of interpretations the meaning of the text is frittered away. The compiler showed his wisdom in printing the simple language, leaving each person to be his own expositor.

There is still another question,—that of authority,—which we need not discuss. The readers of THE INDEX are tolerably familiar with the thought, that moral teachings like all others must depend on their own merits for the weight they carry.

O. B. F.

THE MORAL DANGERS OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

I have spoken of the physical evils which anxious parents reasonably apprehend for their children in trusting them to the mixed society of a large public school. But there is a still greater danger in the contact with moral evil, which fills both teachers and parents with anxiety.

The children of depraved families who have been familiarized with coarseness, vulgarity, vice, and crime from their infancy must be educated, must be admitted to the public schools, and sit side by side with the children of respectable, orderly, and protected families. Will not the influence for evil thus exerted be too great a price to pay for education? Ought not we to separate the sheep from the goats, and to give these children of misery and vice instruction by themselves apart from those who are as yet uncontaminated by evil?

How many a teacher shudders at this problem, and asks herself how it is possible to guard her little flock so carefully as to save it even from this wolf within the fold!

On the dark theories of human nature and its proneness to evil, I can see no hope for humanity generally—only a possible salvation for a few; and with this faith I should feel like isolating a few precious specimens to preserve the ideal of humanity which might otherwise be lost. This seems to be the utmost which the old Church aspires or claims to do. It will save at least a portion. It counts by numbers, and does not esteem it failure if any be saved, however many are wholly lost.

But the larger faith of Free Religion treats this problem quite differently. It first asserts the eternal, omnipotent power of good, instead of dividing its reign with an equally potent prince of darkness. It also believes in a perpetual progress of good over evil, its negation and opposite. It esteems all humanity as one, and does not count its success in regenerating and saving it by numbers. It is still imperfect and failure, if any are left out. No soul is saved if any soul is lost.

On these principles, we accept the great problem of universal education by which the child ill-born and ill-nurtured shall have his chance with the more favored ones, believing that he will rather gain life and health from the good influences around him, than be able to overcome them by his evil.

But in order that this result may follow, it must not be a sluggish, negative goodness to which we trust. The children of more favored classes may only seem better because their moral disease takes less active and open forms, and they will be corrupted by contagion if they have not inward strength to resist it.

All experience shows the great difficulty in grouping together children with bad tendencies. They strengthen and harden each other. But let them come into a society of average boys and girls on equal terms, feeling that goodness is expected from them, and that their chance is as fair as all others, and there is a great stimulus given to the desire for excellence. One teacher who had much experience with pupils of this class used to seek to help them to some slight intellectual superiority over the other by showing them quick ways of performing examples in arithmetic, or by pointing out studies in which they could easily excel, that she might excite a sense of self-respect and a desire for excellence.

One thing we know, that, if our children are protected from evil when young, they cannot always remain so. Life will bring them into contact with many forms of danger. If the guard is an outward one, it will fall; if it is inward, it will protect them. The teacher must strive to create a public opinion in the school which will make every new-comer shrink from presenting his evil side, and aim to secure the good opinion of those around him. Such an influence in the school does not stop there; it goes out from the school and affects the family at home. In one of the worst districts in the neighborhood of Boston, a public school teacher produced such an influence that the Chief of Police in his report expressed his gratitude to her for the good she had done in the district, which was apparent in the diminution of vice and crime.

When we consider the dark and terrible side of our civilization, the poverty, disease, filth, vice, and crime of our dangerous classes, it seems as if these quiet influences of trust and faith and love and wisdom were very feeble weapons with which to fight them; and we long for some mighty engine with which to battle down these terrible evils. But it is all in vain; only the slow, steady, quiet forces of Nature will do the work.

"The world is wide, these things are small—
They may be nothing, but they are all."

A moral quarantine will not secure us against infection, and there is no infallible specific to cure moral disease. "The blood of Christ," that is claimed "to wash away all sin," has left us after nearly two thousand years with these dark stains still on our garments. It is only by purifying the atmosphere, and ordering the whole life according to the laws of right, that health can be secured. Education is to do this very work for us; and it can only do it wholly for one by doing it for all. The Crown Prince is not safe from the typhoid malaria, if it be suffered to exist in the country. It is only by destroying the cause of evil that we can escape from danger of its results. Education must be radical in its operations and meet the whole difficulties of the case, not accept a part of its work only and give up the rest to despair. E. D. C.

LONDON LETTER.

DECLINE OF THE OLD HISTORIC SCHOOLS: WINCHESTER, EATON, HARROW, RUGBY—THE "TUNDING SYSTEM"—TYRANNOUS CONDUCT OF HEAD MASTERS—"MUSCULAR CHRISTIANITY"—HOW A LONDON CLERGYMAN BROUGHT ABOUT A WEDDING—CANON KINGSLEY AND THE ATHANASIAN CREED.

LONDON, Feb. 1, 1878.

The friends of culture in this country are in serious agitation at the manifest decline of the old historic schools. They seem to have fallen into the hands of governing Boards quite out of relation to the wants and tendencies of the age. When the recent "tunding" case occurred at Winchester School, the public was a good deal shocked to think that it was a legitimate scholastic right at that place for a large boy to inflict thirty strokes with ashen faggots upon a small boy at all, much less because said small boy declined to be examined as to proficiency in the school-slang; but it was astounded to find the Head Master of the school—Rev. Dr. Ridding—not only defending the tunder bully as "a sweet, gentle boy," but defending him in letters to the newspapers whose grammar suggested that he ought rather to be studying in one of the lower forms than teaching. The unanimous protest against the whole brutal system on the part of the press was supposed to have settled the matter; but to the general amazement, the governing Board of the school having met and sat on the whole affair have formally resolved to retain the tunding system, to be mitigated only by a right of appeal, on the part of the boy sentenced to be tunded, to the said Dr. Ridding, who described the young brute of the late affair as "a sweet and gentle boy." No one who is acquainted with the esprit of this school can doubt that the tyrants occupying the higher "forms" will make it so unpopular for a boy to appeal that the privilege will rarely be used. The big boys will be able to worry appellant little ones in a hundred ways. The little boy who suffered in the late case has suffered so much more from the displeasure of his masters since his parents brought the matter before the public, that it is to be feared that many a poor little victim will remain silent under similar inflictions in the future. But the general result is that Winchester School has been shown to be under the management of stupidity and cruelty, and the collection of boys who will be sent there in future will hardly represent the refined and careful families of the country. Such families have long since hesitated to send their children to Eton, as the moral condition of that school has for some time been notoriously unsatisfactory.

A boy is continually snubbed at Eton, unless his parents can afford to let him spend money recklessly. Harrow has had the misfortune to lose its best teacher, Professor Farrar, who has been made Head Master of Marlborough School; and the revelations made by Professor Farrar concerning Harrow before he left it,—showing the hopeless reign there of snubbing and spite at the cost of gentlemanly feeling and education,—have rendered many parents unwilling to send their children there. Marlborough School is no doubt a good one, but it lacks the reputation which has hitherto been so attractive in the older schools, and is very much out of the way. As for Rugby, it is absolutely flickering in its socket. The Head Master—Dr. Hayman, whom the Puseyites managed to put into the place of Dr. Temple when he was made a bishop—has been shown guilty of conduct simply disgraceful. He got his place upon certificates found to be fraudulent, in so far that they had been given him many years before for a totally different and inferior position. Having entered upon his post, he was met with general contempt by the pupils and subordinate teachers,—the latter, however, treating him with decorum. One of these teachers he chose to suspect of writing letters containing severe comments upon him. On being questioned, the teacher denied having written any such letters. For a gentleman, that would have been sufficient; but for Dr. Hayman it was not enough. He disbelieved the teacher's denial, and demanded of the governing trustees of Rugby that teacher's dismissal. The trustees examined the whole affair thoroughly, and became satisfied that Hayman's suspicions were utterly unfounded. Yet the Head Master, unconvinced, pursued a system of petty vengeance against the teacher in question, prohibiting his usual tuition of private pupils by which the larger part of his salary was obtained. Again the matter came before the governing body, and everybody supposed that they would at once dismiss a Head Master who, after obtaining his position fraudulently, had by his ungentlemanly and contemptible persecution of an esteemed teacher kept the school in an uproar. But the trustees, having again declared to Dr. Hayman that he had acted wrongfully from first to last, stultified themselves by admonishing him that, unless he could hereafter get along in a friendly way with Mr. Scott (the teacher in question), they should be forced to take more serious measures. Get along in a friendly way with a man whom he had persistently, against all evidence, declared a liar, and deprived him of several hundreds of pounds on that score! The trustees brought down general ridicule upon themselves for leaving a man, whose character they had by implication branded, at the head of the school which was associated with the great name of Arnold; but there the matter rests. Rugby is perishing. And there is not one of the historic schools of England to which a parent, caring much for the moral or intellectual future of his or her son, can be advised to send him.

I heard, by the way, a curious instance of the survival of that faith in muscular Christianity which seems to have owed a good deal of its origin to Dr. Arnold's use of the sixth form for the discipline of the school,—a bad principle, but one which Arnold finding in existence at Rugby made the best of. The boys of the sixth form chastised others only as deputies of Arnold, and at his command. In Tom Brown at Oxford, there is a case related where a boy had acted very basely indeed to a smaller boy and Arnold deputed a certain youth to chastise him. The youth who did the flogging is now a clergyman over one of the largest parishes in London, and one which has in it a great many poor people. There was in his congregation an interesting young woman who seemed to have many fine traits, but was cohabiting illicitly, without disguise, and apparently without any remorse, with a youth of the parish. The clergyman remonstrated with the young woman, and finally succeeded in impressing upon her the novel notion that she was doing wrong. She then requested the youth in question to marry her; he consented, but continually postponed the matter. The clergyman then went to see him; found that he really loved the girl, and received from him a promise to marry her. Nevertheless, the matter was again postponed by the lover, until one day the clergyman went to the youth, and squaring his broad chest before him, concluded a pious appeal with these words: "And now, finally, my young friend, allow me to remark that—since that girl loves you and you her—if you are not man and wife in two weeks from this day, I will give you the soundest thrashing you ever got in all your life!" The youth was thunderstruck; gave a good long look at the shoulders and arms of the clergyman, and in three days came before him with the bride in a white veil leaning on his arm. I had this story from the chief actor in it.

I wish I could say that the famous "muscular" piety had no worse outcome than this; but even muscle does not give backbone, and the morning paper brings me to-day the most invertebrate production I have read this long time; namely, a letter from Charles Kingsley—no; Le is dead and buried—from Canon Kingsley to a great meeting met last night to defend the Athanasian creed. He wrote: "I have always held that the general use and understanding of the Athanasian creed would exercise hereafter, as it has exercised already, a most potent and salutary influence; not only on the theology, but on the ethics, on the science, physical and metaphysical, of all English-speaking nations. I believe that that influence was never more needed than now since the time of the great French Revolution of the last century, and I am, therefore, most jealous at this moment for the safety of the Athanasian creed." "I feel for, though I cannot feel with, the objections of many excellent persons to the so-called damnable clauses; but I believe that those objections would die out, if the true and ancient Catholic doctrine concerning the future state were better known among us."

M. D. C.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

SOME OF THE STATEMENTS of President Eliot at the Harvard dinner at New York will interest readers of THE INDEX, I think. He spoke in reference to certain revolutionary changes, as reported in newspapers, in the system of education at Harvard. One paragraph in particular I wish here to quote. President Eliot asks: "What can be more preposterous than the assumption that the ordinary curriculum of an American college, uniform for all students, is the acme of wisdom and the consummate flower of all experience in training youth to liberal callings? . . . Now in this discussion Harvard has enlisted once for all on the side of freedom and variety of opportunity. I wish I could say to every one of the thousands of young Americans who are now planning how and where they may go to college, Get first a thorough school training; but when you have got command of your faculties, trust yourself to freedom, follow your bent, seek a wide choice of rich and various opportunities to learn, and be not deceived with any advice to the effect that unlike grains grow equally well on one and the same soil, that all people thrive equally well on one and the same diet, and that all young men of eighteen to twenty-two need one and the same training." He further says that there has "undoubtedly been at Cambridge, for the last twenty years, a gradual relaxing of out-grown rules and a gradual incoming of liberty. Every such relaxation, every new liberty, has proved a clear gain to the college, whether as regards the manners, morals, and studiousness of the young men, the temper and attitude of the teachers, or the tone and spirit of the place." When this "gradual incoming of liberty" at Harvard has reached the point of welcoming young ladies to share the benefits of the institution, I doubt not the same "clear gain to the college" will still be observable, "whether as regards the manners, morals, and studiousness of the young men, the temper and attitude of the teachers, or the tone and spirit of the place." But the college, according to the President, will not "go one hair's breadth in advance of public opinion." There is much promise in this statement. Abreast, will do.

MR. MURRAY has delivered twelve evening sermons in Music Hall, this winter, to large congregations. His concluding discourse was an effort to answer the question, "Why the religion of New England has failed to convert the people." He regards it as a grave problem. Christianity fails to convert a people peculiarly given to religious impressions. "In any New England village, the majority of the professional and business men are non-professors, connected with no church; and this fact is equally true of the young. There are scores of men from twenty to sixty years of age, in any congregation in the city, who do not belong to the church, and are apparently unaffected by the preaching of the Gospel. From courtesy to the preacher, they listen week after week to his formal theological statements of what is necessary to salvation with patient indifference or good-natured incredulity, but they are no nearer being Christians, in the technical sense of the phrase, at the close of the year than at the beginning."

"The men who are not reached by the pulpits are men of influence, wealthy and energetic. They represent the influence associated with money, capacity, knowledge, and culture. They type and embody not only the grosser but the higher forces which to-day are operant for good and evil in American society. Among them are to be found the warmest hearts, the finest minds, the choicest spirits, and many of the most energetic and promising young men of the land. Without these, the church surrenders the hope and promise of future expansion and greatness. These people are not hardened and excessively wicked, they are not antagonistic to religion beyond the average disinclination to spiritual things common to all, they are not irreverently skeptical, they are not profane, they are not bitterly perverse. They are humane, generous, reverent, open to argument and spiritual persuasion. They lead moral lives, have religious sensibilities, and often set a worthy example to professors themselves; and they are not, as it is easy for the minister and deacons to call them, 'gospel-hardened.'"

Mr. Murray thought that religion had been badly associated with cant and formalism. "Formalism is the plety of form, such as formal and repetitious prayers by the laity and ministers, hackneyed exhortation, and the periodical anxiety for souls which distinguishes many churches. Cant may be either conscious or unconscious to the person using it. In the one case, it is hypocritical and thoroughly base; in the other, it may be innocent to the person using it, but none the less mischievous in its influence. In one form or the other, it exists to an alarming extent in New England, in pulpit and pew, in prayer meetings and conference rooms, and especially in Boards appointed by the churches to examine candidates for church-membership. Such assumed solemnity of face and voice; such studied efforts after the unnatural in tone and bearing; such overwhelming anxiety for souls, which, if real, would break the heart that feels it, but which is nevertheless carried without loss of appetite or sleep; such devotional stupidity and pious ignorance as are manifested by many professors of religion in our churches, is enough to sharpen the edge of satire against it and disgust the many. You can put the mantle of heaven upon the shoulders of bigotry and call it Orthodoxy if you please, but, if you do, the masses will denounce it. The humane and charitable element lives, but bigotry leads a wolf's life, and civilization, as it advances, is forever pushing it back into the recesses of barbaric existence. You may put men into office in the church who will go on for twenty years making the same prayer, but you do it at the risk of making your prayer-meeting an experience of pain and mortification, and religion in the person of your ignorant deacon a laughing stock to the village. No greater blunder can be made by the churches than to so conduct their administrations as to become the butt against which every wit in the village shall direct his arrow."

Mr. Murray thought also that there was needed in the Churches "less of Paul and more of Jesus—Jesus not as the centre of a theology, nor interpreted in the way of cant and sentimentalism, but in the way of charity, humanity, and compassion." He said, "the people are wearied with the proclamation of the Gospel in theological form." He described the New Englander as "inquisitive touching everything, including religion. He is not stupidly reverent. He can imitate, but no imitation can exhaust the forces of his nature. He is so capable that he must be original. In temperament, he is sanguine and impatient. He is more dangerous tied up than he is let loose. He needs a prairie for his play-ground and a Niagara for his water-power. Such a being will not be lashed and corded down to one position. He cannot endure dictation and cannot understand stagnation. With this radicalism, there is in every well-balanced New England mind a conservatism which acts as a brake upon the flying wheels of his thoughts and keeps them under control. The strength of this characteristic is seen in the slow acceptance of any idea of radical change. Owing to this, the great reforms have advanced slowly, and have had to beat their way against wind and tide. Instead of fearing creeds, such a people demand positiveness in religious matters. But in many Evangelical churches the creed is so inclusive in details, in doctrine, and Scriptural interpretation, and so exacting and arbitrary in its terminology, that no independent and partially informed mind can honestly, at that point of spiritual understanding and development at which people stand when coming before the Committee of Conference, give assent to it. As an additional obstacle, the ruling spirit of the committee is often an over earnest or bigoted man who has no doubt but that the whole science of truth is inclosed within the sweep of his own little pair of compasses, and who feels that he is placed at the gate of heaven—viz., his little church—to protect it from the entrance of unworthy applicants. Hence the examination is often conducted in an inquisitorial and offensive manner, which proves a stumbling block to the timid and to all who hold themselves superior in things of the soul to human dictation, and especially the dictation of narrow-minded men. In these respects, so far as the practice and facts sustain the statement, our Orthodox churches are, beyond doubt, in opposition to the spirit of the age, and out of harmony with the people."

I venture this long report of this discourse, because it shows how well the situation may be comprehended by an Orthodox Christian clergyman, and because the preacher fails to indicate any remedy but that which lies in the direction of liberality and good sense. "Less of Paul and more of Jesus." That is one step. Less of Jesus is another step which will undoubtedly have to be taken ere the people of New England, not to say of America, will be converted to their own religion.

AT OLDTOWN, MAINE, a great "revival of religion" has been going on among the surviving Penobscots. These Indians are supposed to be civilized already. That is sufficient for this world. But for the exigencies of the next, it is imperative that they become Christianized. But neither civilization nor Christianization seems to rob them of native gifts. Unerring marksmen are they still. Let the following story illustrate. One Peol Sokis, a convert, told his experience in a prayer-meeting. "Oh, glory!" he cried; "me feel plous like hell." Could the pith and marrow of Orthodox revivalism have been hit with a more piercing shot?

FROM WHAT CAUSE my reference to The Monthly Voice in one of my recent Notes was robbed of its pith and truth, I will not venture even to surmise. But "monthly" is a tame substitute for "moonly," as everybody can see. Had the title of the little paper been The Monthly I doubt if it had been suppressed. But Moonly was more than Uncle Sam could freight.

BOSTON, Feb. 24, 1873.

Literary Department.

NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS.—All books designed for review in these columns must be addressed to THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

La Cité Antique. Étude sur le Culte, le Droit, les Institutions de la Grèce et de Rome. Par FUSTEL DE COULANGES, Professeur d'Histoire à la Faculté des Lettres de Strasbourg. Ouvrage couronné par l'Académie française. Troisième édition. (The Ancient City. A Study of the Worship, the Laws, and the Institutions of Greece and Rome. By Fustel de Coulanges, Professor of History in the Faculty of Letters at Strasbourg. Crowned by the French Academy. Third edition.) Paris, 1870. 12mo pp. 496.

This is a work of very great importance to all who are engaged or interested in the study of the origin and development of religious worship, of society and government, of morals and of law. It is more especially worthy of the attention of all those who are earnestly seeking the regeneration of religious, social, and political life, and who wish to know where their work really begins. To know where the battle for reform properly begins is more than half the conquest. It is a poor method and a wasteful one to begin at the periphery and work towards the centre. He who works from the centre operates in all directions at once.

M. de Coulanges tells us that in the house of every Greek and Roman was an altar, and upon this altar fire always burning. This in primitive times was the common hearth-fire, and the hearth-stone was the altar. Every evening the fire was covered up with ashes to prevent it from going out, and every morning the householder's first care was to renew the flame. Upon the wife devolved, after due initiation, the honorable duty of keeping up the fire in the absence of the master. This fire did not cease to burn until the family had altogether perished. An extinguished hearth meant in those early days the same as an extinct family. But not only was it imperative that the fire should be kept perpetually burning; it was also a religious precept that it should be kept always pure, which meant literally, as our author tells us, that no filthy object should be cast into it, and figuratively, that no blameworthy action should ever occur in its presence.

Thus we see what a sacred place the fireside was in ancient Greece and Rome. The fire there was regarded as a kind of deity, a perpetual providence in the house; so that it was the custom to offer prayers and sacrifices to it. One beautiful prayer has been preserved to us in the Orphic hymns, which runs thus: "Render us always flourishing, always happy, O fire! Thou who art eternal, beautiful, ever young; thou who nourishest, thou who art rich, receive favorably these our offerings, and in return give us happiness and sweet health." No man ever left his house in those days without a prayer to the fire; and when he returned, he adored and invoked it, even before embracing his wife and children. Euripides represents Alkestis, who is about to give up her life for her husband, as thus invoking the household fire: "O Mistress, I go beneath the earth, and for the last time fall before thee and address thee. Protect my infant children; give to my boy a tender wife, and to my girl a noble husband. Let them not die, like their mother, before the time, but may they lead a long and happy life in their fatherland." If we go still further back we find that the Rig-Veda has many hymns addressed to the fire-god. One of them contains the following language: "O Agni, thou art the life, thou art the patron of man. In return for our prayers, bestow glory and riches on the father of a family who now addresses thee. Agni, thou art a wise protector and a father: to thee we owe life; we are of thy household." And with the Brahman, as in Greece, the fire-god was essentially pure—a guilty man might not approach his own hearth before purifying himself from the stain he had contracted.

The principal apartment in the ancient Roman house was, as we know, called an atrium. It took its name from the hearth (black from the smoke of the household fire) which was there situated. This fire was the centre of the domestic life of the Romans. All the other rooms of the house were in direct communication with the atrium. It was at once kitchen and reception room. Here the family assembled to partake of their daily meals and here, close beside the hearth, stood the marriage-bed. The good genii of the house had their places there. It was the spinning room where the housewife could superintend the cooking and the other work at the same time. It was, in other words, the family fireside, from which the whole life of the inmates of each house was ruled.

So if we come down to a later period, we find the same reverence for the hearth-fire among the ancient Saxons. Even at a very late date, long centuries after these people had been made Christians at the point of the sword, everything in the Saxon farmhouse centered in the great fire that burned on the hearth-stone. A German writer of the last century—Justus Möser, not much known outside of his own country, nor there as much as he ought to be—has left us a fine description of the old Saxon house and its interior arrangements. "The hearth," he says, "is the centre of the house; and there the farmer's wife has her throne. Without rising from her seat, she receives those who enter and bids them be seated, keeps watch over the children and servants, and also over her cows and horses in the barn hard by, and no one can enter cellar or garret without her seeing it. She spins and cooks at the same time. Her bed is close by the hearth, and from it she has the same command of all that goes on; she can see her servants go to bed at night and rise in the morning for work; not a door can be opened or shut without her knowledge. . . . The hearth-fire burns all day long, and is kept smouldering through the night in honor of ancient tradition." And such is the power of tradition and custom, that even the modern fire-police cannot succeed in making all the people put out their fires at night in this part of Germany. So in England, in former times, the house-fire was allowed to go out only on Easter Sunday, after which the chimney and fire-place were thoroughly cleaned; then the fire was re-kindled, and there was holy fire once more in the house for a whole year.

It may not, perhaps, at once appear what significance these household rites connected with the family fireside have for us who warm our houses with stoves and heat them with furnaces. But they are deeply significant, nevertheless. They will suggest to most persons capable of reflection the sacredness of the domestic circle, the all-powerful influence of home life. The ancient Pythagoreans believed in a great central hearth-fire, which warmed and vivified and sustained the whole material universe, and around which the whole universe was gathered. Ought not we moderns to know that every fireside is a reservoir of warmth and light, of ardor and inspiration, for all those who gather about it? Ought we not to know that it is in reality the focus of all our activity? Whatever happens in the great world of human effort, whatever great deeds are done in war or peace, whatever of noble thought, of artistic work, or of personal sacrifice for others' good,—all is but the reflection of the sacred flame that burns in the heart of the home. Is it not, therefore, clear that he who would purify human life must go first to its fountain-head? It is certainly time that men and women began to see that every true reform, whether in religion, in morals, in social or political life, begins, like all true works of love, at home. It is at the fire-side that we mould society, mould the future. Thence springs all that is glorious and all that is shameful. From out of every hearth-fire there glares a demon, or smiles a god, upon every member of the family; and from this spot the child is sure to take god or devil with it into the world.

To those who would learn something of the historical relation of the family to civilization in all its principal aspects, there is no book that will do greater service, as an introduction to such studies, than this of M. de Coulanges. A reprint of an English abridgement of it has been announced in Boston—why not a translation of the whole work? T. V.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1873, by F. E. ARNOT, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER X.

HARRY FRANKLIN.

"Well, Harry, how are you? I've just left a friend and relation of yours, who has bored me intensely with his preternaturally fraternal desire to keep you in England."

This remark was addressed to a young fellow, who had been amusing himself by looking over the contents of one of the many portfolios littering the rooms of Richard Sabin in Great James Street, Bedford Row—a semi-legal continuation of the latter thoroughfare, in which a good many young men of various professions have chambers—until the artist's arrival caused him to spring up, uttering an exclamation of pleasure.

"I'm glad you stayed," Sabin said, shaking hands, and clearing a seat for himself by the summary process of tilting the accumulated books, magazines, and papers on to the floor, and then kicking them under the table. The room was a front one, plainly-furnished and containing the plaster-casts, sketches, and miscellaneous paraphernalia proper to an artist's apartment; beyond lay a bed-chamber and studio, with the indispensable north-light. "And now let's have a look at you, Harry, my boy." So saying, Richard put his large hand on his cousin's shoulder and regarded him with much interest and kindness.

The object of this scrutiny and Mr. Pennethorne's disinterested solicitude was a tall, thin, long-visaged young man about twenty, of pale complexion and thoughtful, kindly countenance. He would not have been pronounced handsome by careless observers, for his features were neither regular nor particularly striking, but his face was full of character and highly prepossessing. He had curly, black hair, shading a good forehead, brown eyes, and a sensitive, if rather large mouth. Some how—perhaps in consequence of his earnest, intent look and a slight diffidence of manner, perceptible when he spoke—you obtained an impression that he was a very good fellow who hardly thought enough of himself, or was over-prone to defer to others. Sabin's salutation suggested this feeling, together with the heartiest appreciation of his relation's good qualities.

"Well, we seem in tolerable preservation," continued the artist. "And, now, stand and unfold yourself. What the deuce do you mean by travelling in company with that son of his mother, Dan Pennethorne? what does he mean by his blatherskite interference with your affairs? and what's this about Esther's going to America? Answer in one syllable!"

"You must borrow me Gargantua's mouth, first," replied Franklin; and then had to explain his quotation, for Sabin knew but little of Shakespeare and nothing of Rabelais. "But if you can be satisfied with separate answers, here goes. Imprimis, I met Pennethorne by accident, going to London like myself, and having no particular quarrel with the man—who has always been civil enough—couldn't well refuse to enter the same railway carriage. For much the same reason I took him to uncle's—he knows him and said he'd like to call. Secondly, he wants to marry Esther, and thinks that her emigration and mine will rather interfere with that project. Thirdly, she is going, but not till I have a home ready for her in Canada."

"Oh! that's all, is it? glad to hear it. I had begun to imagine some kind of exceptional kick-up had occurred, involving the hegira of both of you. Now I understand his concern about you. But d—n the fellow's impudence! You don't mean to say that Esther—the best girl in the world—has any notion of taking up with such a cad as that? It ought to be illegal. Isn't there anything against it in that highly interesting page of the prayer-book which begins by forbidding you to marry your grandmother?"

"I think not; but don't be alarmed—there's no danger. The inclination's all on one side, I assure you. Men will have to be uncommonly scarce before Esther Franklin becomes Esther Pennethorne. One alliance with that family is quite enough for both of us."

"I should hope so. Is she in favor of it?"

"Only tacitly so. She told Esther, once, if things didn't suit her at home, she wondered she didn't get married and have a house of her own—then she could do as she liked. That and a few remarks about a pack of stuck-up girls who thought nobody good enough for them, and going through the wood to take up with a crooked stick at last, is about all."

"And what does your father say?"

"Oh, grins and jokes about the happiness of married life—you know his way. It's all nonsense, I tell you, and will come to nothing. What did Pennethorne have to say about me? I thought he was up to something by his wanting to see uncle."

"Well, he tried to persuade me that the devil isn't so black as I have been in the habit of supposing, but rather of a neutral tint—capable of being warmed up or toned down, according to treatment. Could you stand it, if you tried very hard? and is it worth while?" And Richard related the particulars of his recent interview with Mr. Pennethorne, at which the young farmer laughed heartily, observing that it served the woolstapler right for his interference; though he meant well in the main, apart from his own private and particular object.

"He's not such a bad fellow," he said, "barring the family characteristics of looking out uncommonly sharp after himself, and fretting and worrying. And, like his mother, he has got an uneasy apprehension of what people will say, if I go to America. Unfortunately, I can't be expected to sympathize with such very one-sided objections."

"Hardly. You've quite made up your mind, then? Have a pipe—no? then I will, and do you tell us all about it."

"There's nothing to tell beyond what you know already. Things have been going on in just the same old, hopeless way, and I'm quite sick and tired of them—any change must be for the better. Dick! I know you'll laugh at me, but upon my word sometimes I'm sorry for that woman. It seems such a dreadful thing to be born with such a disposition. She is one of those unfortunate, detestably-constituted people who are, I believe, not very numerous, but yet a distinct class, and appear to exist for no other purpose than to demonstrate how little circumstances can avail to insure happiness, when the nature is against it. She has everything that heart can wish, and turns it all to gall and bitterness—is both miserable herself and the cause of misery to others. When my father married her—or rather when she married him, for he drifted into it, and she was ravenous to jump into the shoes of my poor mother—Esther and I talked the matter over and resolved to make the best of a bad bargain. We couldn't like her—that was out of the question; but it was our duty to give no occasion for offence or quarrelling. No use in the world, bless you! She found us out directly. I'm confident there are persons who have an instinctive idea of the dislike they excite and a wilful, devilish pleasure in provoking it. And, by George! she's intolerable! There's no living with her, short of the most absolute, unmitigated, slavish subjection, or perennial shindies. We can't get a servant-girl to stay in the house; and Heaven knows the poor wench will put up with a good deal. She screws and saves and scrapes so that it's downright sickening. If a hen goes astray she's wretched for a fortnight, and the butcher has had such rows with her that the man positively refuses to come for orders. Think of that, Dick, in our house; in the old house that was—well, you remember! And yet she pretends to be religious; is in fact the hardest and narrowest bigot that ever squinted introspectively into her own demoralized consciousness, and exaggerated its worst features into a sort of mumbo jumbo, whom she worships with as much self-seeking, if not superstition, as an African savage."

"I should call her a d—d hypocrite!" said Sabin, opening his eyes at his cousin's tropes and metaphors.

"She isn't that. Indeed, I think there's less hypocrisy in the world than we're in the habit of supposing. It must be difficult work, always wearing a mask; and next to impossible to deceive those whom you live with. They're sure to get something like a right estimate of you, in the long run. Now my precious stepmother is quite in earnest, consistent in her way, and always convinced that she is in the right, even when doing her dirtiest, meanest actions. She can lie, cheat, suppress the truth, fly into a perfectly uncalled for passion, domineer, tyrannize, and all the time believe that she is one of the best and most ill-used of women. I've watched and wondered at it, often. It's an infernal kind of perversity, of which, I think, her sex is more capable than ours; because they act mostly from impulse and feeling, and so find it easier to confuse themselves about questions of right and wrong than we do. A man will do wicked things, but he generally, at least, suspects himself to be a scoundrel. Now I doubt if Mrs. F. knows what justice is, or could practise it, if she tried ever so hard. And that's what makes her case so hopeless."

Sabin burst out laughing, which caused a mouthful of tobacco-smoke to go down his throat and set him coughing. "For a neat sum-up of anybody," he sputtered, "commend me to Harry Franklin! I wish she could hear your description of her. Why don't you have a shy at your own personal grievances?"

"Well, then, I hate her ways altogether. I know she grudges me the food I eat and the ale I drink, and that, when I help myself to anything, there's a miserable eye watching me, while its owner feels as if I were slicing away at her mean heart. It's disagreeable not to be able to open one's mouth to talk or joke on peril of misconstruction, feminine superlatives, or a row. (Such women always resent jokes, you know, with a spitefulness of which only dull, narrow-minded people are capable.) It's offensive to find everything put away and locked up, if I come home late and hungry—to have to ask for this or that, and to be served with an accompaniment of sour looks, snappish words, or the slamming of doors. I revolt at half-an-inch of rush-light specially shortened for me to go to bed with, for fear I should waste a farthing's worth of tallow. It riles me to know that she's prowling about afterwards, in the dark, to ascertain that the house isn't afire, or that thieves haven't got through the keyhole. I loathe cant, and injustice, and parsimony, and oppression, whether inflicted on myself or others. Lastly it's damnable to think that all these things, which one scarcely has patience to enumerate, are and will be persisted in because she CAN do them, and chooses to gratify her detestable nature at the expense of everybody else."

"Why, in Heaven's name, don't you hit back, hard and heavy, and make a fight of it?"

"What's the use? Think how it would be for father. He hates rows, and a man can't side against his wife. It's better that I should go for the sake of all parties."

"But will he consent? He used to be so fond of you and Esther, and—"

"And is still. Don't say a word against him, Richard. Some men can't strive against women, and—and, by George, I'm a coward myself in that respect. As far as a bit of sarcasm goes, I'm all there, but when it comes to daily scratching and snarling—a never-ending-sill-begging cut-and-dog-fight, in which victory and defeat are equally odious—I throw up the sponge. Nothing but downright brutality would do, and that's out of the question. I shall imitate dad—put on my hat and step out; and the sooner I do it the better. I thought once of trying Warwickshire; the Squire has a farm there, between Leamington and Birmingham, and was kind enough to offer it to me on pretty easy terms, but it was such poor land and so eaten up with rabbits that a man wouldn't have had a chance—take a score of acres to carry a couple of cows. So I shall go to America."

Dick looked at his cousin in a peculiar, knowing way, as if inclined to rally him on the suppression of something pertinent to the subject, conquered the temptation for the time being, and broached another objection.

"But, Harry, have you no apprehensions of the woman improving your absence and Esther's (supposing she follows) to your future disadvantage? Think of her greed, and your father's easy, yielding disposition. Why, she might do anything with him, with nobody to counter-check her rapacity."

"Well, I've thought of that, too; though there's no particular reason for the suspicion, at least at present. She doesn't seem to want me to go—perhaps from unwillingness to lose a victim. And I doubt if her selfishness is of the artful, plotting order; though God knows what opportunity may develop. Any way I must risk it; for my life here is too miserable to be endured."

"But what does uncle say?" demanded Richard, recurring to a former question.

"I have talked him into it with some difficulty. He consents chiefly because he supposes that I shall return in six months or so, disgusted with the experiment, and cured of such notions for the future. I think he will find himself mistaken." The young man spoke with a quiet confidence auguring well for his resolution.

"And how will Esther stand it during your absence?"

"She is willing to bear it in the hope of better times. It takes two to make a quarrel, you know; and Esther is more prudent than I am; can hold her tongue and speak, too, when there's occasion for it. Besides, to do the woman justice, she's not very hard on her—in the interest of Pennethorne, perhaps. We have arranged everything."

"Tell us of your plans in Canada."

"They are very simple. You remember my cousin Bill Hughes and his hearty brothers, who went there ever so long ago, from Warwickshire?—well, they are all doing capitally, with land of their own; and I've got a standing invitation to come and stay as long as I like, which I shall accept. That'll give me a chance to see the country and get used to its ways. I shall look out for a farm which, in Canada, my aunt's five hundred pounds, accruing when I'm one-and-twenty, will enable me to buy. Having secured a home I shall send for, or fetch, Esther. You'll come and see us, for the sake of old times, whenever you want a holiday from New York, and we'll endeavor to give you as hearty a welcome, if in rougher style, as ever you got in Northamptonshire, before the days of Mrs. Franklin the second."

"Well, you seem to have settled matters very completely. And now it's my turn. Whom do you think we are likely to have for a fellow-voyager?" And Richard communicated to his cousin all that he had heard that morning from Paul Gower, relative to the prospective departure of that young man for the United States of America. "It appears to be pretty well agreed upon that he's to go," he concluded; "and I suppose we can arrange it so as to travel in company. By Jove, won't we have a jolly time of it! And, by the way, it's just possible that we may be reinforced by a young lady. I didn't tell you that Paul's father had written to your old parson asking him if he can spare Miss Gower. Do you think he will?"

"Miss Gower!" said Harry Franklin, whose countenance—not unmarked of his cousin—was suddenly suffused with crimson—"why, you don't mean—a—a—that is, I shouldn't think it likely."

Sabin laughed, and rose to knock the ashes from his pipe on the mantel-piece. "Harry," he said, "you're an artful customer and can keep your own counsel with the best. You have given me plenty of reasons for emigrating—lots of excellent, indisputable reasons—but isn't there just another little one in the background which has more influence than all the rest put together, though we don't care to mention it? We are either a blighted flower, or we suppose that the nearest way to the altar of Thorpe Parva church is round by Canada."

"Oh, nonsense!" returned the other, coloring, if possible, more deeply than before. "What's the use of talking like that?"

"Well, I happen to remember two or three little confid—"

"If I did, then, I was a romantic fool for my pains. She's as much above me as—as a queen or an angel. I've no more chance than the poorest bumpkin in our village; and perhaps it's as well that I should go away, if only to get rid of such ridiculous fancies."

"I don't see such a tremendous discrepancy. Wasn't her mother a ballet-dancer or something of the kind? and isn't a British farmer as good as a Louisiana nigger-driver? There's nothing like having a good conceit of one's self, Harry. You should have cut in when that swell-parson disappointed her—before she came to town. There, old fellow, I don't want to offend you; only take my word for it, modesty in a man is all nonsense. It doesn't pay. One of the discoveries which a fellow makes when he gets within hail of thirty is, that he has lost no end of favors from women out of shame-facedness and his own blushing youth. It's ten years since I've seen anything like an angel or a goddess, Harry. This shocks you, of course, because you're a young un; well, wait and see for yourself. And, now, suppose we adjourn for a row on the river, or dinner?—it's too fine to stay in doors."

To this proposition Harry Franklin readily assented, and the cousins set off for the Thames, with the further intention of dining together at Richmond, after which they agreed to return to Newman Street, to spend the evening and ascertain what had become of Mr. Pennethorne.

[The following is the call issued for the Convention at New York, Feb. 26. It was accompanied by a copy of a circular issued in that city by Mr. E. F. Dinmore.—Ed.]

THE RELIGIOUS AMENDMENT

OF THE

Constitution of the United States.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL CONVENTION.

The question of the Bible in the Public Schools, of Sabbath Laws, and many similar questions, are now demanding attention and decisive settlement. Shall the Nation preserve the Christian features of its life? This is rapidly becoming the issue of our day.

Many thoughtful citizens view with deep concern the assaults now being made on everything of a Christian character in our civil institutions. Not only time-serving politicians and irreligious men, but eminent officers of government, and leaders among Christians, accepting the false theory that government has nothing to do with religion, co-operate in these assaults.

An appeal against the Bible in the common schools now lies before the Supreme Court of Ohio. It will come up for adjudication, in its regular order, sometime this winter, when a determined effort will be made to overturn the present noble school system of that State.

The Superintendent of Public Instruction of the State of New York has recently decided that the Bible, though assigned an honorable place in the State system of education when first established, and actually used for sixty years, can no longer be legally read during regular hours in any school of the State. Armed with authoritative decisions like this, the enemies of the Bible certainly will succeed unless the friends of our common schools awake to the dangers that threaten them, and take prompt and adequate action.

In order successfully to repel their assaults, the assailants must be met at their own point of attack. They assail the Bible in the schools, Sabbath Laws, laws against Polygamy, and every similar element of our Christian civilization, on the ground of their inconsistency with the Constitution of the United States, which acknowledges neither God nor the Bible, and with which everything in the actual administration of the government should harmonize.

What shall be done? This is the momentous question now forcing itself upon the American people. It will not down. It must soon be answered in one of two ways. Which shall it be? Shall we obliterate every Christian feature from existing institutions? Or, shall we make the Constitution explicitly Christian? Shall we thrust out the Bible from our schools to make them conform to the Constitution? Patriotism and true Statesmanship answer, No! But let the acknowledgment of God and the Bible be inserted in the Constitution to make it conform to the common schools.

The National Association has been formed for the purpose of securing such an amendment to the Constitution as will suitably acknowledge Almighty God as the author of the nation's existence and the ultimate source of its authority, Jesus Christ as its ruler, and the Bible as the fountain of its laws, and thus indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all Christian laws, institutions, and usages in our government on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land. This Association invites all citizens, who favor such an amendment, without distinction of party or creed, to meet in the HALL OF THE COOPER UNION, New York City, on Wednesday, February 26, 1873, at 2 o'clock p.m.

All such citizens, to whose notice this call may be brought, are requested to hold meetings and appoint Delegates to the Convention.

WM. STRONG, U. S. Supreme Court,
President of the National Association.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

- His Excellency, JAMES M. HARVEY,
Governor of Kansas.
His Excellency, BETH PADELFORD,
Governor of Rhode Island.
The Hon. J. W. McCLURE,
Ex-Governor of Missouri.
The Hon. W. H. CUMBACK,
Lieutenant Governor of Indiana.
The Hon. WM. MURRAY,
Supreme Court of New York.
The Hon. M. B. HAGANS,
Superior Court of Cincinnati.
The Hon. FELIX R. BRUNOT,
Ch'n of the Board of Indian Com'rs, Pittsburg, Pa.
JOHN ALEXANDER, Esq., Philadelphia, Pa.
CHARLES G. NAZRO, Esq., Boston, Mass.
THOMAS W. BICKNELL, Esq.,
Commissioner Public Schools, Rhode Island.
JAMES W. TAYLOR, Esq., Newburgh, New York.
Prof. TAYLER LEWIS, LL. D., Union College, N. Y.
EDWARD S. TORREY, Esq., Boston.
RUSSELL STURGIS, Jr., Esq., Boston.
The Right Rev. G. T. BEDELL, D.D.,
Assistant Bishop of the Diocese of Ohio.
The Right Rev. G. D. CUMMINS, D.D.,
Assistant Bishop of the Diocese of Kentucky.
The Rev. C. S. FINNEY, D.D.,
Formerly President of Oberlin College, Oberlin, O.
The Rev. F. MERRICK, D. D., LL. D.,
President of the Ohio University, Delaware, O.
The Rev. JOSEPH CUMMINGS, D.D. LL. D.,
Pres't of the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn.
The Rev. A. D. MAY, D.D., Cincinnati.
The Rev. T. A. MORRIS, D.D.,
Bishop of the M. E. Church, Springfield, O.
The Rev. J. H. McILVAINE, D.D., Newark, N. J.
Prof. O. N. STODDARD, LL. D., Wooster University, O.
The Rev. M. SIMPSON, D.D.,
Bishop of the M. E. Church.

- The Rev. J. BLANCHARD, D.D.,
President of Wheaton College, Ill.
JOHN S. HART, LL. D., Princeton College, N. J.
The Right Rev. JOHN B. KERFOOT, D.D.,
Bishop of the Diocese of Pittsburgh.
The Right Rev. F. D. HUNTINGTON, D.D.,
Bishop of the Diocese of Central New York.
The Rev. T. L. CUYLER, D.D., Brooklyn.
The Rev. LEVI SCOTT, D.D.,
Bishop of the M. E. Church, Delaware.
Prof. JULIUS E. SEELYE, D.D., Amherst College.
The Right Rev. C. P. McILVAINE, D. D., LL. D.,
B.C.L., Bishop of the Diocese of Ohio.
The Rev. A. A. MINER, D.D.,
President of Tufts College, Mass.
The Rev. JONATHAN EDWARDS, D.D.,
Peoria, Ill.

GENERAL SECRETARY:

The Rev. D. McALLISTER,
410 West Forty-Third Street, New York.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:

The Rev. T. P. STEVENSON,
88 North Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia.

RECORDING SECRETARY:

The Rev. W. W. BARR, Philadelphia.

TREASURER:

SAMUEL AGNEW, Esq.,
1120 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

THE FOLLOWING GENTLEMEN CONCUR IN THE FOREGOING CALL.

- The Hon. G. W. BROOKS,
U. S. District Court, North Carolina.
The Hon. MARK W. DELAHAY,
U. S. District Court, Kansas.
The Hon. JULIUS ROCKWELL,
Superior Court of Massachusetts.

- The Hon. ELLIS A. APGAR,
State Sup't of Public Instruction, N. J.
The Hon. DANIEL B. BRIGGS,
State Sup't of Public Instruction, Michigan.
The Hon. ALONZO ABERNETHY,
State Sup't of Public Instruction, Iowa.
The Hon. A. N. FISHER,
State Sup't of Public Instruction, Nevada.
The Hon. JOSIAH H. DRUMMOND, LL.D.,
Portland, Maine.
The Rev. CHARLES HODGE, D.D.,
Princeton Theological Seminary, N. J.
The Rev. JAMES MCCOSH, D.D., LL.D.,
President of Princeton College, N. J.
The Rev. JOHN S. STONE, D.D.,
Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass.
The Rev. H. DYER, D.D.,
Cov. Sec. of Evangelical Knowledge Society, N. Y.
The Rev. EDMUND G. JAMES,
Bishop of the M. E. Church, New York.
The Rev. HENRY J. FOX, D.D.,
Charleston, S. C.
The Rev. THOMAS DE WITT, D.D.,
Collegiate Reformed Church, New York.
Pres. JAMES W. STRONG, D.D.,
Carleton College, Minn.
Pres. THOMAS HOLMES, D.D.,
Union Christian College, Indiana.
Pres. GEORGE LOOMIS, D.D.,
Alleghany College, Pa.
Pres. W. F. KING, D.D., Cornell College, Iowa.
The Rev. WILLIAM M. PAXTON, D.D.,
First Presbyterian Church, New York.
The Rev. WM. R. NICHOLSON, D.D.,
Trinity Church, Newark, N. J.
The Rev. E. R. CRAVEN, D.D., Newark, N. J.
Pres. WM. CAREY CRANE, D.D.,
Baylor University, Texas.
Pres. REUBEN ANDRUS, D.D.,
Indiana Ashbury University.
Pres. JOHN WHEELER, D.D.,
Iowa Wesleyan University.
Prof. J. R. W. SLOANE, D.D.,
Ref. Presb. Theological Seminary, Alleghany, Pa.
Prof. LYMAN H. ATWATER, D.D.,
Ed. Presbyterian Quarterly, Princeton, N. J.
The Rev. WILLIAM NASH, D.D.,
M. Ger. Publications of M. E. Church, Cincinnati O.
Prof. R. BETHELL CLAXTON, D.D.,
P. E. Divinity School, Philadelphia.
Pres. GEORGE B. JOCELYN, D.D.,
Albion College, Mich.
Prof. J. FULLERTON, D.D., Bates College, Maine.
The Rev. STEPHEN H. TYNG, D.D.,
St. George's Church, New York.
The Hon. J. W. CURRY,
Member of Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention.
JOHN COLLINS, Esq.,
Member of Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention.
Prof. H. L. SMITH, LL. D., Robert College, N. Y.
Prof. THOMAS SPROULL, D.D.,
Ref. Presb. Theological Seminary, Alleghany, Pa.
Pres. J. N. RENDALL, D.D., Lincoln University, Pa.
Prof. S. T. WOODHULL, Lincoln University, Pa.
Prof. E. R. BROWN, Lincoln University, Pa.
Prof. T. W. CATTELL, Lincoln University, Pa.
Prof. J. B. RENDALL, Lincoln University, Pa.
Prof. J. R. JACQUES, Illinois Wesleyan University.
Pres. DAVID PAUL, D.D., Muskingum College, O.
T. H. BAIRD PATTERSON, Esq.,
Member of Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention,
And numerous others.

410 WEST FORTY-THIRD ST., NEW YORK,
February 5, 1873.

Dear Sir,—You will see by the Circular of the "Liberals," herewith enclosed, that a determined effort is being made, by organization and meetings and otherwise, to carry the "Demands of Liberalism." The organizers, calling themselves "Liberals," are the enemies of our Christian institutions; and their attempt is to sweep away everything of a Christian character from our national life.

You will also see by the call for a National Convention, that multitudes of our best citizens are moving in defence of what is best and dearest to us as a Christian people. And it is time to rouse to action. Our national welfare is endangered. If the "Liberals" go on unrestrained, making and obtaining their demands, what security can we have for the future?

Many delegates have already been appointed, from different parts of the country, and of all denominations of Christians, to attend the Convention. There will be, as there should be, a very large gathering at the Cooper Institute, New York, on Wednesday, February 26. Stirring tidings of large and enthusiastic meetings have been received from many States. Do not fail to have a meeting called and delegates appointed from your city, town, or neighborhood.

Each delegate should take with him a certificate of his appointment, signed by the officers of the meeting. The accompanying blank certificate may be used. Others, if needed, can be written out, or blanks will be furnished on application. All friends of the movement will be welcome, though not appointed as delegates, and will be enrolled as members of the Convention. But as there will be a special enrollment of certified delegates, appointments should be secured whenever practicable.

There will be no general reduction of railroad fares. The leading roads have agreed that "no reduction from regularly established rates will be made, nor round trip tickets issued, for religious, political, or other parties of any description whatever." Let no patriot be prevented by this action from coming.

Free entertainment will be furnished as far as practicable. But as the number of delegates will be very large, arrangements have been made for the accommodation of such delegates as cannot be privately entertained, at a reduced cost in comfortable hotels.

The Convention will hold five sessions, organizing at 2 o'clock Wednesday afternoon, and adjourning finally on Thursday night. Addresses by able and eminent citizens will be delivered at each session.

A few copies of the proceedings of the last Convention are yet on hand,—a pamphlet of over seventy pages,—containing the addresses of Judge Hagans, Prof. Tayler Lewis, Prof. Stoddard, Drs. J. Edwards and A. D. Mayo, Prof. J. R. W. Sloane, and others, together with an account of the origin and progress of the movement. This will be sent free, on application, as far as the supply will go.

For information concerning the movement, or the Convention, or for documents, apply to
D. McALLISTER,
Gen. Sec. of the National Association.

THE NATIONAL ORGANIZATION OF INFIDELITY.

BY THE REV. J. P. LYTLE.

[From the United Presbyterian, Pittsburg, Pa., Feb. 6.]

It may be information to the reader to state that a systematic effort is being made so to unite the infidel sentiment of the country that it may present a compact front to the friends of Christianity. A joint stock company, with a capital of $100,000, has been organized in Toledo, Ohio, for the purpose of publishing a weekly newspaper, called THE INDEX, in furtherance of this project. The principal editor is Francis E. Abbot, and he has associated with himself O. B. Frothingham, T. W. Higginson, Rev. Charles Voysey (England), Rev. M. D. Conway (England), and others of less note. The editors are men of ability and education, and the discussions contained in the paper are (in their own way) clear, forcible, often brilliant, and usually (though not always) courteous. We learn from the number of Jan. 4th, 1873, handed us by a friend, that THE INDEX is now in its fourth year. The general design of the publication may be gathered from the following standing announcement at the head of its columns:—

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussion on this subject which finds no fitting place in other papers.

The more specific purpose of THE INDEX is set forth in the following

DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempted from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Protestants would generally agree with these gentlemen in objecting to public appropriations to sectarian institutions.

A form for the organization of local "Liberal Leagues" is then submitted, and it is proposed, when five hundred of these have been formed, to meet in National Convention. Such is an outline of the programme of Mr. Abbot and Company.

We have a National Association to secure the religious amendment of the United States Constitution, a National Association opposed to secret societies, and each of these holding National Conventions. Like the forces of Joab and Abishai before "Rabbah of the Ammonites," these are only different divisions of the same army, and it is difficult to tell on which the brunt of war may fall, or to which will be allotted the honor of first entering the enemies' gates. It may be assumed, however, that the success of the one is the triumph of the other.

Opposed to these national organizations, and as the direct antipode of the former, stands this association of infidels, the object of which, as seen above, is to divest the nation of every shred and vestige of the Christianity now incorporated in its laws, or recognized in its usages. The antagonism of these organizations is thus clearly stated by THE INDEX itself:—

You cannot organize too soon or too effectively. Next February, the National Association to secure a Religious Amendment to the United States Constitution" will hold its annual Convention in the city of New York. That movement is a vital one, because it grows out of the logical and practical necessities of the Christian Church. Feeble as it seems to-day, it is strong with all the strength of ideas shared in common by all sects and denominations. Under the stress of events, those ideas must spread, till in some shape or other they are adopted by a great party. How shall we meet them? Simply by opposing the mischievous change contemplated? No! Let us meet them by a bold and resolute determination to strike out of the government so much recognition of Christianity as it now contains. Carry the war into Africa! Organize yourselves for the peaceful work of educating this nation in the first principles of religious liberty, and their more consistent application. See to it that the States conform their respective Constitutions to the grand Constitution of the United States.

There are many who would desire to maintain the status quo between the Government and Christianity, but it will be found an impossible task. Infidels, with the Federal Constitution on their side, and Christians with the State Constitutions and laws on theirs, will make neutrality impossible. Besides, questions of incalculable importance, and imperatively demanding settlement, urge on the strife. We must know whether the Bible shall be ostracized wherever governmental authority is found, and whether our Sabbath laws have a legal foundation or not; whether willing or unwilling, Americans must choose whom they will serve.

THE INDEX is particularly severe (as is usually the case) on its nearest neighbors, the Unitarians and Universalists, while it speaks lovingly of the Independent, for which there are, no doubt, sufficient reasons.

It has been said the discussions in THE INDEX are always courteous. This may be seen in the following extract from an article by the Rev. E. C. Towne:—

Dr. Chapin prayed at Mr. Greeley's funeral thus: "We thank thee to-day for that blessed revelation of Christ which has made God known, and which has lighted up the uncertainty of Nature with the assurance of a Divine Love. We thank thee, O God, that our Redeemer liveth." By "Redeemer" Dr. Chapin seems to mean the young Jew who mistakenly supposed that God Almighty wanted a hand to help him out with his care of the creation. But he must know better than this, pastor as he is of the "Church of the Divine Paternity." He must understand that all that we truly know of Divinity points to Infinite Paternity, such as needs no helping out whatever. And he is a very sorry believer if he really sees uncertainty in the suggestions of Nature, the rising life of which in spring, and the glories of which in summer and autumn, have ever been among the most powerful occasions to the human mind to have hopeful and worshipful thoughts of Deity. In fact, Nature has done infinitely more for man than the "Christ" of any of the sects has done. They may call it a revelation which has made God known, but in truth it has made known more devil than deity, and played an infernal part towards the heart and life of man far more than a heavenly. The anathema has been the headlight of the Christian engine, and Christianity has been more ready to curse and damn than to bless and comfort man.

It is not necessary to record all the blasphemy which the enemies of the Saviour utter against him, and it may not be for edification to give publicity to much of it; but to know somewhat of the "reproaches cast at him" may serve to establish the faith and quicken the prayers of his friends. When many were offended at Christ, and went back, and walked no more with him, the disciples were made to feel and say, "To whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." When some said, "Behold a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber," "He hath a devil and is mad, why hear ye him?" the evangelists sat down and quietly recorded the fact without either flurry or fury.

John Brown and his catechism find an honorable place (honorable to him) in the INDEX, which seems to think his doctrine of original sin and the depravity of nature too good a joke to be lost. So they are ranged in a column headed, "The Sanctuary of Superstition."

These men call themselves Liberals, Radicals, Free Religionists, and by other self-complacent titles; but in "our language" they would be named infidels, scoffers, blasphemers, "raging waves of the sea foaming out their own shame, wandering stars to whom (unless their moral relations are readjusted) is reserved the blackness of darkness forever."

Arise, O God, let not man prevail! The tumult of thine enemies increaseth continually. But wilt not thou, O God, judge them; for we have no might against this great company of our enemies that cometh against us, neither know we what to do, but our eyes are to Thee!

"I find this in the papers—at least in one of them which arranges barter of commodities. 'Wanted, good commentary on the Bible. Can give in exchange first-class game fowls.' Is this genuine, or a sly satire? One prefers to believe that the advertiser gives up keeping fighting-cocks and takes to serious matters; yet, if really in earnest, he would surely destroy such instruments of evil instead of handing them to somebody else. But if he means to hint that commentators are always ready to fly at one another, he might have conveyed that fact in a more becoming way. This levity does not speak well for his sincerity."—Illustrated London News, Dec. 14, 1872.

The Congregationalist says it would not be a bad idea to sit down at the feet of a horse and learn humility. Jussu. Sit down at the hind feet of a mule, and, if he don't humiliate you, pull his tail and tickle the inside of his legs with a stable-fork.—Nims-Letter.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errata.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

SOME REASONS FOR ORGANIZATION.

BOSTON, Feb. 9, 1873.

Through the politeness of Mr. Morse, I attended a meeting of the Second Radical Club, last Wednesday evening. The subject for conversation was the organization of the radicals for a definite purpose, which was opened by Mr. Abbot. It always has seemed to me that of all men, radicals should necessarily be the best able to stick to the point; but, I must say, there was a most signal failure in this regard. The direct subject of organization was scarcely touched upon except by Mr. Abbot and Prof. Clark, both being in favor of it; the rest of the conversation, while exceedingly interesting, was almost entirely devoted to minor interests, in fact. I went there with the desire of hearing the direct subject ably discussed, and was disappointed. Surely, nearly every one there had a prepossession one way or another; but they failed to start it.

There are, it seems to me, many things favorable to this project of organization; among them may be mentioned the strengthening of wavering minds, an increase of individual effort by the effects of sympathy, a something definite to work for, better acquaintance with the radical forces of the country, an increased circulation of printed matter pertaining to our cause, and (may I not add?) a growth of the mental and moral natures by contact with greater and more earnest minds than many of us are in a way of personal acquaintance with otherwise. I know there are many young people to whom a personal acquaintance with such men as Dr. Bartol, Mr. Frothingham, and other of the leaders of free thought in America, would be an immense stimulus to their better life, even though such an acquaintance were but casual. I speak from experience. A few sympathetic words from Mr. Frothingham have been as a bright light in my life ever since, and it seems to me these few things are the necessary antecedents of organization. Hence I am heartily an advocate of it.

FRANK S. BILLINGS.

"SPONTANEOUS GENERATION."

NEW HARMONY, Ind., Feb. 11, 1873.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—In the experiments on what Dr. Bastian calls Archebiosis, it is observed, as stated by you, that infusions boiled for four hours produce life, while like infusions boiled for five hours do not. The object of boiling is to destroy all life that may have been in the infusion before it was boiled, and thus to show that if, after boiling, living organisms appear, they come from lifeless matter. Now are we to believe that dead organic matter is so changed by five hours' boiling as to have lost properties which it had under only four hours' boiling? Is it not more reasonable to believe that living germs which could survive four hours' boiling could not survive five, than to believe that any difference in the amount of boiling of dead organic matter could change its properties, in relation to the evolution of forms of life from it?

From the theories on what is called "spontaneous generation," we must regard dead organic matter as simply equivalent to inorganic matter, containing the same elements; as, in accordance with these theories, the first living organisms must have been evolved from inorganic matter.

If organic matter be the only material out of which living organisms are produced, then we may suppose that, if no other germs are in the solution, there are in the so-called dead organic matter living germs, integrant parts of that matter, which are destroyed by five hours' boiling, and are uninjured by only four hours of the same operation.

Yours respectfully,
MARGARET CHAPPELL SMITH.

MEDITATIONS.—"The more I meditate, the more I am convinced that, to tread firmly in the path of virtue, it is necessary that we be supported by the staff of knowledge. Ignorance is the mother of many follies.

There is a period beyond which, if the human mind remains bound in the chains of ignorance, it loses the power of expansion, and considers the existence of it in others as the dream of illusive imagination.

As the beams of the moon kindle the flowers of the Oshadi, so doth education expand the blossoms of intelligence.

True knowledge cannot be gained when the mind is clouded by prejudice and controlled by superstition."—Correspondence of the Hindu Rajah Zaumilla: 1778.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by U. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—8 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, coarseness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—8 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by U. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christendom, by F. E. ABBOT. Third Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to all those who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Humanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

THE INDEX.

Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Back Numbers of The Index!
FOR 1870 AND 1871.

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete list of THE INDEX from the beginning, either bound or unbound. But we have on hand large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address.

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that one interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much can be done in this way at small cost.

F. Address

THE INDEX.

Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

NOW READY!

THE
BOUND INDEX FOR 1872
(VOLUME III).

In addition to many other attractions, it contains the full course of free religious lectures delivered at Horticultural Hall, Boston, last winter, which were published in full nowhere else. A limited number only for sale. Price $2.00, and 75 cents postage. If postage is not prepaid by the purchaser, the volume will be sent by express at his expense. Address

THE INDEX.

Drawer 38,
Toledo, Ohio.

Cultured Free Thought.

The Index Association,

With its Principal Office at No. 142, St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO, and Branch Office at No. 36, Dey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society. It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, London, England.
Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, Weston super Mare, England.
Rev. M. D. CONWAY, London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exponent of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Professor MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America,—that such a journal should have been started and powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany, though the number of recalled religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large."

Essays, lectures, and other papers of a thoughtful and liberal character; editorial articles; foreign and domestic correspondence; book reviews and notices; communications, selections, and other miscellaneous matter; in short, whatever can best promote the general cause to which THE INDEX is devoted will be found regularly in its columns.

Also, a highly interesting RATIONALISTIC STORY, entitled "PAUL GOWER," is now appearing serially in THE INDEX, and will run during the year.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial. All MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS must be addressed to

THE INDEX.

Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 13) will be sent postpaid on receipt of eighty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. U. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT; "The Vision of Heaven," by Prof. F. W. Newman. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete Index of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 75 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

A FINE RADICAL ROMANCE!

TO BE PUBLISHED

SERIALLY

IN

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

WE ARE HAPPY TO ANNOUNCE that we have secured for publication in THE INDEX a most excellent novel, entitled

PAUL GOWER:

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

For the present the author desires to withhold his name. But he is well known in literary circles as a writer for the best English and American magazines. Of another story written by him Mr. JAMES PARTON says: "I consider it a masterpiece of narrative." Mr. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, who was so kind as to read "PAUL GOWER" in manuscript with special reference to its publication in THE INDEX, permits us to publish the following:—

"I have looked over Mr. ———'s novel, and think it would be an attractive feature in THE INDEX. It is very strong, and I found it very interesting. The story is remarkably well told; the characters are firmly drawn; and the religious tone of it will suit the paper well. The style is nervous and simple; the incident is varied; the development is natural. The writer has put a vast deal of thought into it, and spent great labor on it with admirable effect. My judgment may be at fault, but I think it would adorn THE INDEX. It will divide well as a serial, which will be an advantage."

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAP.

- 1.—An Old Lady and Gentleman of the Old School.
- 2.—News from the United States.
- 3.—A Lovers' Quarrel.
- 4.—Family Antecedents.
- 5.—Poor Relations.
- 6.—Mr. Bligh receives three Morning Calls.
- 7.—Is spent in Mr. Bligh's Office.
- 8.—A Shabby-Genteel Family.
- 9.—Mr. Daniel Pennethorne.
- 10.—Harry Franklin.
- 11.—"Never Overtaking and always Pursuing."
- 12.—A Catastrophe.
- 13.—Locked-out for the Night.
- 14.—In which divers Persons call on each other without invitation or introduction.
- 15.—Sickness and Convalescence.
- 16.—Esther Franklin.
- 17.—Contains Explanations and Confidences.
- 18.—Concludes with a Street Row at the Door of Mr. James Maberley.
- 19.—Involves a Meeting and a Departure.
- 20.—In which Richard Sablin talks like a Heathen.
- 21.—"That nasty, deceitful Clergyman who behaved so badly to poor, dear Ruth."
- 22.—"My Native Land, Good Night!"
- 23.—Epistolary and Maritime.
- 24.—Is mainly in Prætor of New York City and Americans in General.
- 25.—Paul's Father.
- 26.—Transpires in or near Nassau Street.
- 27.—More New Faces.
- 28.—Is Conversational and Valedictory.
- 29.—The Christening of a Comic Paper.
- 30.—A New York Boarding-House.
- 31.—Paul's Letters.
- 32.—In which Dick Sablin returns to New York City and is seen by Somebody who has hereafter a Great Deal to do with Him.
- 33.—Wherein Richard Sablin lays down a Square of Hell's Pavement.
- 34.—"The Porcupine."
- 35.—In which Paul Gower and Richard Sablin amuse themselves.
- 36.—A short Chapter introducing a very long one.
- 37.—A Young Man's Theological Experiences.
- 38.—Consequences.
- 39.—A Descent into Bohemia.
- 40.—More of the same Subject.
- 41.—In which we talk about the Fourth Estate of New York City.
- 42.—"At Piff's."
- 43.—The Reverend Jim Scobell.
- 44.—"The Cornucopia."
- 45.—"One More Unfortunate."
- 46.—In which the Story progresses for about Six Months.
- 47.—A Little Adventure.
- 48.—Injured Innocence.
- 49.—"Lead us not into Temptation."
- 50.—Just what might have been Expected.
- 51.—What People said about it; and an Item of News concerning the Fugitives.

CHAP.

- 52.—In which Paul sets out for a larger amount of Travel than he intended, and visits some Old Friends.
- 53.—A Canadian Idyll.
- 54.—Wherein we journey from the North to nearly the most Southern of the United States.
- 55.—More Southern Experiences; a Look at New Orleans; and a sudden change of Programme.
- 56.—A Return and a Disappointment.
- 57.—The Contents of which ought to surprise nobody.
- 58.—In which Paul hears more News of Old Friends of an Unsatisfactory Character.
- 59.—Wherein Paul Gower and the Rev. George Bligh smoke a cigar together.
- 60.—Accompanies Paul to London and describes his Doings in that Metropolis.
- 61.—Is a Continuation of Chapter 60.
- 62.—Contains an Accident and some Conversation.
- 63.—Treats of the Vicarage and Farm-house; and of the Machinations of a Wicked Woman.
- 64.—Shows that a Plausible Disposition may be wrought upon to Good as well as Evil Purposes.
- 65.—Which only those Readers who have some knowledge of Human Nature will think at all Truthful or Probable.
- 66.—Wherein we get rid of Mrs. Franklin for Good and All.
- 67.—In which the Engagement between Ruth Gower and the Rev. George Bligh comes to a perfectly natural conclusion.
- 68.—Contains various matters, Reflective, Rural, and Metropolitan, and concludes at Southampton.
- 69.—New York again. And what Paul did and heard there.
- 70.—A "Cut Direct" and other Experiences, too various for particularization.
- 71.—Is as Desultory as the one preceding it, and therefore introduced without Specification.
- 72.—More Boarding-House and Bohemian Details; the latter involving their own Moral.
- 73.—A Loving Heart, self-portrayed; and News from England.
- 74.—A Character: the re-appearance of a Scoundrel, and still more of Journalism.
- 75.—Another Return and a new Enterprise. Charleston on an Historical Occasion.
- 76.—In which a former Acquaintance takes Paul into his confidence concerning his Domestic Infelicity.
- 77.—Might have had the same Title as Chapter 76.
- 78.—More talk of Secession, and the Sequel of Richard Sablin's Catastrophe.
- 79.—A Companion-Picture to what we have seen in Charleston, but on a larger Scale.
- 80.—Clears the way for the Next and Last.
- 81.—In which John Gower's Misfortunes and the Story come to an End together.

Whoever desires to possess all the numbers of THE INDEX containing this novel should subscribe at once, beginning his subscription with the year. Send $3.00 for the FOURTH VOLUME of THE INDEX.

Address

THE INDEX.

Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

WE DIRECT YOUR ATTENTION TO OUR CELEBRATED Combination Button-Hole and SEWING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLICITY, EASE, AND CERTAINTY with which it operates, as well as the uniform excellence of its work, throughout the entire range of Sewing including Stitching, Hemming, Felling, Tucking, Cording, Braiding, Quilting, Gathering and Sealing on, Oversewing, Embroidering on the Edge, and its Beautiful Button-Hole and Eyelet-Hole Work, places it unquestionably FAR IN ADVANCE OF ANY OTHER SIMILAR INVENTION.

It is also the CHEAPEST, intrinsically, as well as the BEST, since it is really a two machines combined in one (by a simple and beautiful mechanical arrangement never before accomplished by human ingenuity), making either the LOCK-STITCH or BUTTON-HOLE STITCH, as occasion may require. It is, at the same time, simple in construction, comparatively noiseless, and easily understood. The Feed is adjustable, the Tensions uniform.

The Company and its Agents WARRANT EVERY MACHINE they sell to give ENTIRE SATISFACTION. In the States of Ohio and Indiana, and in the Southern tier of counties of Michigan, we want live, energetic men to take agencies. Liberal terms will be given. Apply to Company's Office, 44 Madison street, Toledo, Ohio. P. A. Wells, Manager. Applications for agencies for the balance of Michigan will be received at 222 Jefferson Avenue, Detroit—J. W. Martin, Manager. We want agents everywhere.

ATLANTIC ESSAYS.

BY THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.
1 vol. 12mo. $3.00.

CONTENTS:—"A Plea for Culture," "Literature as an Art," "Americanism in Literature," "A Letter to a Young Contributor," "Ought Women to Learn the Alphabet?" "A Charge with Prince Rupert," "Mademoiselle's Campaigns," "The Puritan Minister," "Painful and the Portuguese," "The Greek Goddesses," "Sappho," "On an Old Latin Text-Book."

A late number of the Graphic speaks of the English edition of this book, as follows:—

"Atlantic Essays," by Thomas Wentworth Higginson (Sampson Low & Co.), claim attention over and above their intrinsic merit as illustrative of a drift, which may one day powerfully influence American intellectual life. Col. Higginson pleads ably on behalf of more thorough classical study, of culture which is not measured by the material gains of form in literature and art. Not that he doubts his countrymen. On the contrary, he looks forward to a day when the 'America of to-day' shall be as great as the 'America of to-morrow' when the language enriched by influx from many lands shall acquire a depth and amplitude unknown before, and when the enfranchised American woman shall surpass the noblest heroine Greek poets ever dreamed of, or the most brilliant grandees of Parisian salons. His criticisms rather strike back on ourselves, whom he regards as furnishing no more models for American writers, and who lost our last great master of style when Thackeray died. The essays, an occasional acerbity apart, are scholarly and graceful, and unusually even in merit; though we might, perhaps, single out for especial praise the fragment of French history, entitled 'Mademoiselle's Campaigns,' and the well-drawn sketch of the primitive New England pastors in the 'Puritan Minister.'"

For sale by all booksellers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers.
JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO., Boston.

"The Greatest Luxury in the World."

TURKISH BATHS.

& 81 COLUMBIA HEIGHTS, BROOKLYN,
NEW YORK.

Three minutes' walk from Fulton Ferry.

A series of these Baths will relieve, if not cure, nearly every form of disease. The beauty and simplicity of their action consists in the perfect adaptability, either mild or powerful, of this method of treatment to each and every case. It cleans the body, purifies the blood, and equalizes the circulation, thus arousing dormant functions, and restoring the highest measure of health possible to the individual.

Unnumbered references can be given to cases cured by the Bath, and the proprietor will freely advise with those who desire any information regarding its proper use.

First-class rooms and board at moderate prices.
CHARLES H. SHEPARD, M. D.

A Great Offer for March!

Hornee Waters & Son, 481 E. W. Y., N. Y., will dispose of 100 Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during THIS MONTH. New 7-octave Pianos, modern improvements, for $250 and $275, cash. The Waters' Concerto Parlor Organs are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Price at bargain, for cash. Monthly installments received, running from one to three years.
Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

ADAM ELDER,

164 Jefferson Avenue, Detroit, Mich.

PICTURE FRAMES,

and

LOOKING GLASSES.

THE COMMONWEALTH

LIFE GENTLEMEN of standing and ability (either in professional or mercantile pursuits) are desired in all parts of the country to represent this reliable company. Our plans of Insurance are simple, popular, and honest.
Address 178 Broadway, NEW YORK.

RAWSON, EVANS & Co.,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS,

AND

NEWS DEALERS,

229 SUPERIOR ST., CLEVELAND, O.

ALL

New Books, Papers, Magazines,

both Foreign and Domestic,

RECEIVED AS SOON AS ISSUED,

AND

Furnished by Mail or Otherwise,
at lowest rate.

HEALTH, EXERCISE, AND

LIFTING CURE. 229 FIFTH AVENUE. "As a means of retaining and, in certain chronic cases of disease, of regaining health, I regard it as of GREAT VALUE."—F. J. Barnstead, M. D., College of Physicians and Surgeons.

"Admirable in its results, and of the greatest benefit to those frames weakened and diseased by civic life and sedentary habits."—Edward Bayard, M. D.

Parents who have feeble children can have them placed under our care with the assurance that all we can do to make them robust will be done.

Send stamp for a circular.
M. L. BOLBROOK, M. D.,
229 Fifth Ave., New York.
Refer to Cyrus W. Field, Asa K. Butts, O. B. Frothingham, E. P. Dutton.

REAL ESTATE,

In all parts of the U. S.,

RAILROAD AND OTHER STOCKS,

Also

MERCHANDISE OF ALL KINDS,

Bought, sold, and exchanged.

All wishing to sell, or who desire to procure bargains, will find it to their interest to apply to

S. T. POMEROY,
No. 1, Park Place, New York City.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S NEW BOOK.

The Religion of Humanity,

By O. B. Frothingham. Contents.—I. Tendencies; II. God; III. Bible; IV. Christ; V. Atonement; VI. Power of Moral Inspiration; VII. Providence; VIII. Moral Ideal; IX. Immortality; X. Education of Conscience; XI. The Soul of Good in Evil; XII. The Soul of Truth in Error.

One vol., 12 mo. $1.50. Sent free on receipt of price.
DAVID G. FRANCIS, Publisher,
17 Astor Place, New York.

THEODORE SIGLER,

Manufacturer of

LOOKING GLASS AND PICTURE FRAMES,

Gilt, Rosewood, Walnut, and Ornamental Mouldings.

LOOKING GLASS PLATES, CHROMOS, LITHOGRAPHS, ENGRAVINGS, ETC.,

34 Atwater St., Detroit, Mich.

ASA K. BUTTS,

Manufacturer's Agent, Broker and Dealer in

Domestic Cotton Goods

CORDAGE, &C.,

111 Worth Street, New York.

RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD FOR THE PIANO!

UNEQUALLED—INCOMPARABLE! SO ADMITTED BY THE LEADING PIANOFORTE TEACHERS OF THE COUNTRY, AND ITS ANNUAL SALE OF 25,000 COPIES ABUNDANTLY TESTIFIES

TO THE FACT.

The TEACHER—Cannot use a more thorough or effective method.

The PUPIL—Cannot study from a more concise or attractive system.

The DEALER—Cannot keep in stock a book for which there is a sorer and greater demand.

Sold Everywhere. Price $2.50.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston,
CHAS. H. DITSON & CO.,
711 Broadway, New York.

THE BABCOCK FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against Fire."

SURE,

SIMPLE,

SELF-ACTING.

Used by the Fire Departments of the principal cities of the Union.

F. W. FARWELL,
Secretary,
407 Broadway, N. Y.
Over Twelve Hundred Actual Fires put out with it.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

NEW SHORT ROUTE

FROM

Toledo and Saginaw,

BAY CITY AND NORTHERN MICHIGAN,
via

Flint & Pere Marquette Railway.

Trains Leave Toledo—11:25 A. M. and 5:30 P. M.
Trains arrive at Toledo—5:00 P. M. and 10:40 A. M.

The A. M. train from Toledo connects direct for Bay City, and with trains from Saginaw, as far north as Reed City, at the crossing of Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad. The only route that avoids a transfer of passengers and baggage between Toledo and Saginaw. Low rates and quicker service given freight than by any other route.
JEROME MONROE, Gen'l Agent,
Toledo, Ohio.

NEW TRACTS!

INTENDED TO TEACH RELIGION WITHOUT SUPERSTITION.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 40.

SECOND SERIES.....No. 21 to No. 38.

Either Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
19 PINEKNY ST., BOSTON.

G. L. HENDERSON & CO., BANKERS,

LEROY, MINNESOTA.

Money loaned on short time, or for a term of years, on unincumbered improved farms, at 12 per cent. per annum, interest net. Interest payable annually. All expenses for abstract of title and recording mortgage paid by borrower. We collect and remit to any part of the U. S. free of charge.

REFERENCES.—First National Bank, McGregor, Iowa; Gilchrist & Co., McGregor, Iowa; First National Bank, Austin, Minnesota; City National Bank, Chicago, Illinois; Allen, Stevens, & Co., New York City.

C. A. MORSE,

American and Swiss Watches,

CLOCKS, JEWELRY, SOLID SILVER, &C.,

223 West Madison St., Chicago.

Fine Watches put in order. Repairing neatly done.
Burned out at cor. Clark and Lake streets.

Samuel Johnson's Work on India. Sent on receipt of price, —$5.00.

Address S. H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

Send to same address for Catalogue of other scientific and religious works.

THE SPIRIT OF REFORM

WILLIAM WHITE & CO.,

14 HANOVER STREET, BOSTON, MASS.,

Issue weekly the

BANNER OF LIGHT:

An exponent of the Spiritual Philosophy of the nineteenth century.

The above is a first-class, eight-page, family Newspaper, containing FORTY COLUMNS OF INTERESTING AND INSTRUCTIVE READING, classed as follows:—

LITERARY DEPARTMENT.—Original Novelties of reformatory tendencies, and occasionally translations from French and German authors.

REPORTS OF SPIRITUAL LECTURES.—By able Trance and Normal Speakers.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.—Upon Spiritual, Philosophical, and Scientific Subjects.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.—Subjects of General Interest, the Spiritual Philosophy, the Phenomena, etc., Current Events, Entertaining Miscellany, Notices of New Publications, etc.

MESSAGE DEPARTMENT.—Spirit Messages from the departed to their friends in earth-life, given through the mediumship of Mrs. J. H. Cowan, which demonstrate direct intercourse between the Mundane and Super-Mundane Worlds.

ORIGINAL CONTRIBUTIONS.—From the most talented writers in the world.

All which features render this Journal a popular Family Paper, and at the same time the Harbinger of a Glorious Scientific Religion.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, IN ADVANCE.

Per Year $3.00
Six Months 1.50
Three Months 75

Specimen copies sent free.

We confidently call the attention of the friends of progress and reform, whether in material or spiritual matters, to the self-respecting and dignified tone, and the liberal position assumed and maintained by the BANNER OF LIGHT in the past, the same being the guarantee of future usefulness.

WILLIAM WHITE & Company also publish and offer for sale, at the BANNER OF LIGHT Bookstore, many books and pamphlets of a spiritual and reformatory nature.

The complete works of ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS; also books by Judge J. W. Edwards, Mrs. Emma Hardinge, William Hewitt, Hon. Robert Dale Owen, D. D. Home, Prof. William Denton, Miss Lizzie Doren, J. M. Peckles, Mr. J. S. Adams, Prof. S. E. Britton, Hudson, Emma Tuttle, Henry C. Wright, Warren Chase, Charles S. Woodruff, Dr. A. B. Child, Mrs. Lois Walbrook, P. B. Randolph, Warren S. Barlow, George Stearns, and others, will here be found.

Read, and let unbiased reason decide as to what is true.

THE (ORIGINAL) CONTINENTAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.,

of Hartford Conn. Incorporated May, 1860.

SAM'L. E. ELMORE, President,
JOHN S. RICE, Vice President,
FRANCIS D. DOUGLASS, Secretary,
H. R. MORLEY, Actuary.

The CONTINENTAL especially commends itself by its past experience and present management, to those who desire to place their insurance in a conservative company, conducted on the principle of furnishing RELIABLE AND ABSOLUTE INSURANCE AT AS REASONABLE COST AS IS consistent with PERFECT SECURITY.

A few first-class Agents wanted for unoccupied fields.

GUNS FOR THE PEOPLE.

Breach-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $300.
Double-Barrel Shot-Guns, $5 to $150. Single Guns, $3 to $20. Breach-loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers, $6 to $25. Pistols, 75c. to $5. Gun material, fixtures, and ammunition of every kind very cheap. SEND STAMP for Large Illustrated and Descriptive PRICE-LIST to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The Science of a New Life.

By JOHN COWAN, M. D. A radical work on Sexual Physiology and the laws necessary to the elevation of the Human Race. Recommended and endorsed by O. B. Frothingham, Dr. Dio Lewis, Robert Dale Owen, The Index, and other prominent ministers, physicians, religious and secular papers. Every copy sold helps in the direction of the coming "millennium." Agents wanted everywhere. Send for circulars. Sold only by Subscription and by the Publishers, COWAN & CO., 139 Eighth St., New York.

F. J. SCOTT,

J. H. STOFFLET

ARCHITECTS,

75 MADISON STREET (Near Boody House),
TOLEDO, OHIO.

HARLAN P. HYDE

REAL ESTATE AGENT

AND

Negotiator of Mortgages.

95 1-2 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, MARCH 15, 1873.

WHOLE NO. 168.

ADVERTISING RATES

OF THE INDEX.

The following have been adopted by the Board of Directors as the REGULAR ADVERTISING RATES OF THE INDEX ASSOCIATION:

Single Insertions	15 cents per line.
Four	12 " " "
Thirteen	10 " " "
Twenty-six	8 " " "
Fifty-two	5 " " "
Special Notices	20 " " "

The above rates will hereafter be strictly adhered to, without discount. Advertisements are respectfully solicited.

Address
THE INDEX,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

The Index in New York:

BRANCH OFFICE OF

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, 36 DEY STREET.

Subscriptions and Advertisements received and Publications kept on sale.

BOUND VOLS. OF THE INDEX FOR 1872 NOW READY.

This Office is especially designed for the accommodation of City patrons: subscriptions outside of the City should be sent directly to the Toledo Office.

Sample Copies furnished gratuitously. Violators always welcome.

E. F. DINSMORE, AGENT,
36 Dey Street.

Liberal Young Ladies and Gentlemen OF NEW YORK CITY!

THE UNDERSIGNED is desirous of securing your services as canvassers for THE INDEX. Liberal inducements offered. The work is pleasant, remunerative, and beneficial. Call upon or write to

E. F. DINSMORE,
36 Dey Street.

NEW SERIES,

NEW SERIES,

NEW SERIES.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE,

On January 1st, 1873, began volume one of A New Series, thus affording the most favorable time that has occurred in a number of years for the beginning of New Subscriptions.
A Weekly Magazine, of sixty-four pages, Tax License Act gives more than Three and a Quarter Thousand double-column octavo pages of reading matter, yearly, forming four large volumes. It presents in its inexpensive form—considering its great amount of matter, with freshness, owing to its weekly issue, and with a satisfactory completeness attempted by no other publication—the best Essays, Reviews, Criticisms, Serial and Short Stories, Sketches, Poetry, Scientific, Biographical, Historical, and Political Information, from the entire body of Foreign Periodical Literature, and from the pens of the Ablest Living Writers.

It is pronounced by the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, The Nation, The New York Evening Post, and the leading men and journals of the country generally, to be "the best of all our existing publications;" and is indispensable to every one who desires a thorough compendium of all that is noteworthy and admirable in the literary world.

Now is the time to subscribe, beginning with the NEW SERIES, and with entire NEW SERIALS—one by M. M. ECKMANN, CATHARTIC, the distinguished French writer; one by F. L. REUTER, the popular German novelist; and others to be announced hereafter, together with those of the best English authors or novelists.

Published weekly at $3.00 a year, free of postage, or for $10, any one of the American 44 Magazines (or Harper's Weekly or Basar, or Appleton's Journal, weekly), is sent with The Living Age for a year; or for $2.50 The Living Age and Our Young Folks. Address

LITTELL & GAY, Boston.

LIBERAL TEACHERS.

WANTED, in a city of the West, two efficient lady teachers that are free from all religious prejudices. Applications will be received at the office of THE INDEX.

FOR SALE OR RENT.

The Bristol Boarding School.

Apply to SARAH H. PIERCE & SISTERS,
Bristol, Pa.

LADIES!

THE Eureka Machine Twist,
50 and 100 Yard Spools.

AND THE

Eureka Button-Hole Twist,
10 Yard Spools,
ARE THE BEST IN USE.

For Sale at all Trimming Stores.

G. L. HENDERSON & CO., BANKERS,
LEROY, MINNESOTA.

Money loaned on short time, or for a term of years, on unincumbered improved farms, at 12 per cent. per annum, interest net. Interest payable annually. All expenses for abstract of title and recording mortgage paid by borrower. We collect and remit to any part of the U. S. free of charge.

INTERESTORS—First National Bank, McGregor, Iowa; Gilchrist & Co., McGregor, Iowa; First National Bank, Austin, Minnesota; City National Bank, Chicago, Illinois; Allen, Stevens & Co., New York City.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL!!

THE IMPROVED (112) BECKWITH SEWING MACHINE, with new Braidfoot, and many other important improvements, all complete, with Hemmer, Guide, Four Needles, &c., warranted two years—with care it will do your family sewing for a life-time. Nearly ten thousand of these machines have been sold the past season, which witness the above improvements are giving universal satisfaction. We will show letters to any who may call, from disinterested purchasers, in which they state that they would not exchange ours for the best high-priced machine in the market. It makes the popular Elastic Loop Stitch, and closes its seam securely, which renders it the strongest and best; yet when desired it can be unlocked at pleasure. This is the machine which Messrs. Orange Judd & Co., of the American Agriculturist, &c., use so many thousands of for premiums. Full directions go with every machine. If after having the machine 30 days it does not give perfect satisfaction, we will refund the $12 on return of machine less the Express charges, and take the risk of its being injured. All orders promptly filled on receipt of Post Office Order for $12; or if $3 are sent with your order to us, the balance can be paid to the Express Co., when you receive the machine. Terms to Agents when received. If any doubt our honor or our responsibility, we will cheerfully give the best city reference. Bring or send sample of any goods with which to test the machine.

BECKWITH SEWING MACHINE CO.,
36 West Broadway, N. Y.

O. DITSON & CO. offer these new, fresh, genial Juvenile Song Books to the public, believing they will bear comparison with any others.

"Cheerful Voices," by that most successful and popular Composer, Mr. L. O. EMERSON, is for Common Schools, and as 300,000 teachers and pupils are already familiar with his previous School Song Books, they will need no urging to try this.

And as for our Sabbath School Song Book whose glittering title aptly describes the brightness of its contents, read

SPARKLING the following extracts from commendatory letters. Superintendents say:

"The more we use it the better we like it." "The music has a freshness and beauty unsurpassed by any book I have seen." "A work of sterling merit." "Far exceeding Sabbath School Music of the many books I have had the pleasure to use." &c.

Price of Cheerful Voices..... 50 cts.
Price of Sparkling Rubies..... 35 cts.

Specimen copies mailed, post-paid, for the above prices.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston,

CHAS. H. DITSON & CO.,
711 Broadway, New York.

BABCOCK FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

"Absolutely the best protection against fire."

USED BY

RAILROADS,
STEAMBOATS,
HOTELS,
FACTORIES,
ASYLUMS,
FIRE DEPARTMENTS, ETC.

F. W. FARWELL, Sec'y,
Broadway, New York.

SEND FOR "ITS RECORD."

Are You Going to Paint?

THEN USE

The Averill Chemical Paint.

THE HANDSOMEST AND MOST DURABLE EXTERIOR PAINT.

Costs Less, and will Outwear any other.

Gen. G. R. Smith, Sedalia, Mo., writes:—"Two coats of 'Averill' covered better, and looked snar, than three coats of Lead and Oil, with a coat of varnish thereon. I would not again use Lead and Oil were it given to me."

Levi Shaw, Trustee of the Society of Quakers, Mt. Lebanon, writes:—"The buildings painted with the Averill White Paint some three and a half years since, I have examined, and found it retains the gloss nearly if not quite as well as when first put on. It is the best paint we have ever used."

Sample card of beautiful colors, and recommendations from owners of the finest residences in the country, furnished free, by the

EVERILL CHEMICAL PAINT CO.,

33 Burling Slip, New York,
and 118 Superior St., Cleveland, O.

Geo. B. BROWN. WM. A. FAUNCE.

BROWN & FAUNCE,

BOOKSELLERS,

STATIONERS,

AND DEALERS IN

Window and Wall Papers,

115 SUMMIT STREET, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Particular attention called to the following choice books which will be sent post-paid at publishers' prices as follows:—

Human Race— Figures	$ 6.00
Descent of Man— Darwin , 2 vols.....	4.00
Expressions of Emotion— Darwin , 2 vols.....	3.50
Origin of Species— Darwin , 2 vols.....	2.00
Herbert Spencer's Complete Works, 7 vols.....	16.25
Radical Problems.....	2.00
Our Seven Churches.....	1.00
Ten Great Religions.....	3.00
Chapters from Bible of the Ages.....	1.75
Comprehensive History of Religion.....	1.50
Four Phases of Morals.....	5.00
Lubbock's Pre-Historic Times.....	5.00
Beginnings of Life— Baileyn , 2 vols.....	2.00
Sketches of Creation— Winchell	2.00
Ancient America— Baldwin	2.00
Taine's Notes on England.....	6.00
History of European Morals— Lecy , 2 vols.....	1.50
Physiology and Politics— Bagehot	1.50
Forms of Water— Tyndall	3.00
Desert of the Exodus.....	3.00
Froude's Ireland, vol. 1st.....	1.50
Myths and Myth Makers.....	5.00
Murphy on Genesis.....	4.00
Emerson's Prose, 3 vols.....	2.00
Forster's Life of Dickens.....	6.00
McKenzie's Life of Scott.....	9.00
Curtis' Life of Webster, 2 vols.....	6.00
Half-Hours with Best Authors, 6 vols.....	5.00
Art Education.....	5.00
Cyclopaedia of Best Thoughts of Charles Dickens.....	1.50
Gates Ajar.....	1.75
Barriers Burned Away.....	1.50
Little Hodge, by the Author of Ginx Baby.....	1.50
Skaggs Husband— Brad Harris	1.50
Wandering Heir— Chas. Reade	1.50
Back Log Studies— Warner	2.50
Kentucky's Love.....	3.50
Roughing It— Mark Twain	1.50
Hoosier Schoolmaster.....	1.50
End of the World.....	1.50

Full line of Standard and Juvenile Books kept in stock.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents Wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than in anything else. Particulars Free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Me.

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address
SYDNEY H. MORSE,
25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

VICK'S

FLORAL GUIDE

FOR 1873.

The GUIDE is published QUARTERLY. 25 cents pays for the year, which is not half the cost. Those who afterwards send money to the amount of One Dollar or more for Seeds may also order 25 cents worth extra—the price paid for the GUIDE.

The First Number is beautiful, giving plans for making Rural Homes, Dining Table Decorations, Window Gardena, &c., and a mass of information to the lover of flowers—130 pages, on fine tinted paper, some 300 Engravings, and a superb Colored Plate and Chromo Cover. The First Edition of 300,000 just printed in English and German.

JAMES VICK,

Rochester N. Y.

MODERN THINKER, NO. 2.

The second number of this unique publication is now ready. The first number ran through three editions, and the repeated calls for a second number would long ere this have been gratified but for the pressing business pre-occupations of the Editor.

The second number will be found of even greater interest than the first. There is, as all booksellers know, a large and growing demand for scientific works of a popular character. But publishers so far have not dared to print all that science taught on religious and social topics. They feared to offend the Orthodox religious sentiment. The MODERN THINKER, however, was started to meet the public want and to give utterance to advanced thought without fear of consequences.

The following are among the articles in the present number:—

	PAGE.
The Old God and the New Humanity.....	1
A Danger to Civilization.....	19
Stewart-Astor—Vanderbilt—Letters addressed to three Millionaires on the Social Function of Wealth.....	20
The Persons and Propagation.....	26
Comte, Spencer, and Huxley.....	27
A Talk with Tyndall.....	28
Stipiculture—Regulated Human Procreation.....	27
Something about Froude.....	79
Creation, God, Soul, Hereafter—The Four Fruitless Problems.....	80
Atheistic and Infidel Science.....	91
Partly and the Human Body.....	92
What the Matter is.....	99
The Future of Reform—A Letter to Charles O'Connor.....	108
If This Life is All, What Then?.....	115
Marriage Morals.....	122
Why Colored Men and Paper.....	129
The Future of Money and Prices.....	145
Can Human Life be Prolonged?.....	151
A Modern Prophet.....	158
About the Modern Thinker.....	157
Book Notices.....	159
Festival of Humanity.....	159

PRICE, ONE DOLLAR.

DAVID WESLEY & CO.,
Publishers,
7 & 9 WARREN STREET, N. Y.

The usual Discount to the Trade.
A few copies of the Third Edition of the MODERN THINKER, No. 1, on hand, and will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of price—One Dollar per copy.

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

Published by the Index Association at No. 143,
St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio, with Branch
Office at No. 86, Day Street, New York City.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.
M. D. CONWAY, England.

THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A new LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MONAGHAN, late editor of the RADICAL, whose EVENING NOTES will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 86, Day Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. F. DINSMORE, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order.

Address

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 86, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A UNIQUE PREMIUM.

Photographs and Autographs

OF

LEADING WRITERS

OF

THE INDEX.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

W. J. POTTER.

W. H. SPENCER.

F. W. NEWMAN.

CHAS. VOYSEY.

A. W. STEVENS.

F. E. ABBOT.

☞ The PHOTOGRAPH of any ONE of the above-named persons will be mailed post-paid to any NEW subscriber who shall remit $3.00 for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

☞ To any one who shall send a list of names of from one to eight NEW subscribers and $3.00 for each, a corresponding number of Photographs shall be mailed post-paid, to be given to these subscribers; and the same number of Photographs shall also be mailed, post-paid, as premium to the sender himself.

☞ To any one who shall send $9.00 for three years' subscription to THE INDEX in advance, a full set of the Photographs shall be mailed post-paid.

☞ None of the above Photographs will be sent, unless specially requested and unless a choice is made from the list.

☞ The Autograph of each of the above American writers will in all cases accompany the corresponding Photograph; but no Autograph can be sent with the Photograph of the English writers.

☞ These Photographs are well executed, are not on sale anywhere, and can be obtained in no other way. In offering them as premiums, the INDEX ASSOCIATION rely on the good will and active co-operation of all friends of THE INDEX.

☞ All orders for Photographs and remittances of money should be addressed to

THE INDEX,

DRAWER 86, TOLEDO, OHIO.

A SYNOPSIS

OF

PAUL GOWER,

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a Story of English and American Life; the localization being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York Journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not incursions.

It is, also, in the very warp and weft of it, an heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potential with the uninquiring and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfilment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, didactically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is emphatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A FENESIBLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Eight Cents.

VOLUME 4.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, MARCH 15, 1873.

WHOLE No. 168.

ORGANIZE!

LIBERALS OF AMERICA!

The hour for action has arrived. The cause of freedom calls upon us to combine our strength, our zeal, our efforts. These are

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Let us boldly and with high purpose meet the duty of the hour. I submit to you the following

FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———.

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

Liberals! I pledge to you my undivided sympathies and most vigorous co-operation, both in THE INDEX and out of it, in this work of local and national organization. Let us begin at once to lay the foundations of a great national party of freedom, which shall demand the entire secularization of our municipal, state, and national government. Send to me promptly the list of officers of every Liberal League that may be formed, and a standing list of all such Leagues shall be kept in THE INDEX. Rouse, then, to the great work of freeing America from the usurpations of the Church! Make this continent from ocean to ocean sacred to human liberty! Prove that you are worthy descendants of those whose wisdom and patriotism gave us a Constitution unstained with superstition! Shake off your slumbers, and break the chains to which you have too long lamely submitted!

Toledo, O., Jan. 1, 1873.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

LIST OF LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ST. LOUIS, MO.—M. A. McCord, President; J. Gallion, Vice President; P. A. Lofgreen, L. La Grille, Secretaries; E. K. Thomas, Treasurer.

BOSTON, MASS.—J. S. Rogers, President; A. Davis, J. W. Smith, Vice Presidents; J. F. Titcomb, G. A. Bacon, Secretaries; J. A. J. Wilcox, Treasurer; R. H. Ranney, F. W. Clarke, H. B. Storer, Executive Committee.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES

FOR 1873.

THE IDEA OF A HEREAFTER.

BY JOHN WEISS.

SIXTH LECTURE IN THE COURSE OF SIX "SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES," GIVEN IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FEBRUARY 9, 1873.

[Report of the New York World.]

If I begin drily in attempting to feel my way into the subject, trust me by the way; for my object is to touch at length the personal pith of the matter. When the earth was without form and void, a mere gaseous whiff stretching out into infinite space, there could have been no present and no future. Our notions of time and space are derived from observation and experience, but the infinite mind knows no succession of events or of objects. Man could not, then, have derived these ideas from the infinite intelligences. They are merely human, and began far back with the animals. Man labors until the evening: in eternity there is no until, but always a now. So the idea of place must be human, and arises from the instinct that the body is not so big as what is outside of it—that the body itself is a place where we learn slowly how many places there are. Time and place are connected ideas, and we surmise that in all time the man must have some place, and this place all peoples have pictured to themselves according to their knowledge. The Indians have their happy hunting-grounds, the Greeks their Elysium, and a more modern people a celestial tract swarming with souls with or without palm branches, all adoring a throne, or a landscape of spiritual forms corresponding to those of earth. As the idea of place could not, so none of these ideas could, be derived from the infinite intelligences. You and I provide places—niches in omnipresence—corresponding to the extent of our knowledge. The race began some thousands of years ago with a little piece of earth out in the East, flat as a plate and fitted with a dish-cover close to its edges. The cover is lifted now and we have set up places wide enough among them—a sky perfectly measureless in height and an abyss perfectly fathomless in depth. The places of the hereafter came to correspond to our moral state. There was no heaven or hell till man began to have a sense of justice; they must have been absolutely non-existent before. Now, where does it come from? We could not create the bad any more than the good, or motion or procreation. We make distinctions and invent names for elements which existed in the one Creator before he had formed us. God did not get up a heaven or extemporize a hell when men suddenly began to be good or bad. The ideas of heaven and the pre-existence of souls must be set aside. You cannot interpolate time into eternity. These are mere conditions of the moral state, for which the convenience of words has been invented. The ideas of heaven and hell are very distinct and universal, so that if we presume a hereafter it becomes a curious question whether they may embrace something not comprised in the original creation—ideas being always active organizers. So far as the idea of hell is involved, it is alarming to think how many millions of human beings have passed into the hereafter to set up there their favorite institution and make a present of it to a reluctant eternity. These ideas have been colonizing some thousand years, and scientists don't die fast enough to check the operation. They have become so automatic, so radically personal, that death itself can hardly expunge them. Their believers are in so considerable a majority that they have only to conspire to make a hell of heaven. Perhaps that is done already if the hereafter is really governed by universal suffrage. If all that is wanted to make a thing is an idea, the heretics of science and religion now under the ban of the majority may expect to be soon under its ban. Perhaps the tables will eventually be turned, and the disbelievers in hell become the majority; and what an exquisite revenge it will be for them to establish a heaven and put all the old believers in. If hell is only a word, if there can be neither time nor space nor place in the infinite existence, our ideas must go with us to the grave, and ought to create a hereafter at the very edge of it, if they do not discover one stretching out from it. The root of all these ideas is the human sense of justice. The long immunity of criminals is painful to the moral sense. Without considering causes or conditions, we long to have the results removed. But shall mortal man be more just than God? These sins demand some executioner. "Who art thou that judgest?" Then let God be judge. But he seems to decline. Is it skulking? We will wait and see in the hereafter. According to the latest and truest view, the sense of justice has been slowly constructed by the developing animal world, by experience of what is useful or hurtful. When this began to appear, it must have been content with the moment. A dog has no dread of a future dogdom in which he will be punished. How does it happen that man has learned to dread a future life? The present affords no materials for constructing such a dread. At what point of the development would physical observation of results display this fore-reaching sense? It was always noticed that the good often die unrecompensed. Something wrong there, and social inequalities are very keenly looked into. If this furnishes material for constructing a hereafter it could be conceived of only as another social system like the first, with the same social injustice. But an abstract sense of over-ruling justice could not have been developed and inherited at epochs, demanding a place where such justice could be had. So with the doctrine of metempsychosis, nothing evolved from animism could conceive the duration essential for a return to it. We want a conscience, but not this craven check—this dread of being eventually overhauled. Dread inspires no virtue, and can be no constituent of a conscience; that came to us by some other route than animism. If God be righteous on a system of bribery and threats, conscience is a mere constable, dreading each bush an officer. If it can conceive a hereafter, it is merely as a place where its claims for damages shall be added and paid in bliss. What is the consequence of our moral state but the condition of it? Perhaps a large portion of the moral sense has come from experience, and so is valid only in the absence of opportunity. The conscience of the materialist is then a mere state of being repressed. What is the outbreak of pillage after a great fire or an eruption of Vesuvius? We say it is a return to the animal—that is an insult to the animal. No animal is intelligent enough to contrive and conceive a marauding system in times of distress—it takes a man to be a beast! I have a dilemma for modern theologians. Suppose fears of hell should repress such people, and that they should live unsuspected during a lifetime, die decent as the average, and quite as capable of engendering an epitaph. By dying they discover that there is no hell. The fear is removed and the decency vanishes—of what value then the fear? The other life must reorganize the repressive system by appealing to some still more prospective hell, for the modern conscience is equal parts of bully and brimstone. Or, what if by dying he should find that there is a hell. The theological hell is nothing but a systematic detection and punishment of crime unreached in this life. But justice demands repairs as well as punishment. The criminal or sinner has a right to our own ideal, and must be aided to its attainment. No place is provided for this in any of the hells, and if that be perfect justice no man need dread a hereafter. But beneath all these schemes is an instinct of fore-reaching which cannot be explained away. It is easier to explain the weakness of noble minds in the anticipation and the disgust which has led acute minds to deny it. Moral greatness can't depend on this for a motive. It has the stimulus of its own superiority—self-dependent and self-contained. I throw all these overboard, and begin afresh on my instinct. Do not try to organize a future life for pain or bliss—to fresco eternity with scenery in gaudy colors on the great flat background. When you bring me reports from a hereafter I begin to lose my faith in it. I dread to know it too intimately. At one end of the solar spectrum the vibrations of light deepen, and rise at the other into shades which baffle the present capacity of our vision. Deeper than the bass and higher than the treble are the notes our mortal ears cannot catch. Why should I care to hear and see when I know they exist? But when the orchestra fills, the pith of it to me is that it prophesies depths beyond the bass of its most solemn strings, and heights beyond my soul's present firmament. Delight edges over the penumbra of my dissatisfaction that I cannot reach the unknown continent, though the pang is so sharp that I am admonished to subside and wait. But do not poltice me with pretences of ready relief to my ear. I much prefer to have it ache for the sound that cannot yet enter. The crowning moments of intelligence and emotion impart a taste of permanence. Earth itself may as soon vanish as this sense of our solidarity. These moments subside, but deposit something which is indestructible; were they not the freshets from some table-land and undiscovered afar? I dread to have a doctrine about this, but am I victim to a delusion when nothing but a life-share in the universe will satisfy my deliberate contemplation? How can you explain to me that we are capable of pondering such a thing? Where have we acquired the surmise of a hereafter? The animal has no such fore-reaching which sharpens curiosity and baffles it—which does not explain death but makes us detest extinction. The earth rolls on without ambition in the path marked out for it, but from our bodies, kneaded out of its phosphates and juices, something escapes extinction; for its diameter is too great for a grave. Then the tender and overpowering moment when we cannot rest separate from the loved ones who tore at the grain of our heart when they left us: we must have them again. What are graves and burials? Not so cheaply are we to be taken in when the lost life lies quick in memory still. Dead? Then God is dead. There is no such profligacy in the housekeeping of God—a making of hallowed souls for worms. It is an intrusive puppyism of earth's routine which comes smirking in between our yearnings and those faces which we can almost see. How individual life does convince us of its permanence! How it restores the tone of the spirit which has caught an indigestion banqueting on the pomp of epochs! There is the tenderness credited to the human heart which did not exist before the pyramids, and the most splendid epoch devours most recklessly its offspring. God never sets a boarding-house table at which the fare is of the cheapest and the guests stay only while they are worth their keep. My instinct reassures me, so that my sense of individuality raises me again in the very epoch that has tumbled me and makes me say, "God has love, and I have faith." Yes, that faith must be all for me. Life and feeling may be banished, great impulses harden into crust; but my individuality is an element of that permanence that would leave God bankrupt if he lost it. Our horrible suspecting refutes its own terror, and owes itself to the ability to surmise the transcending fact that is going to contradict it. May the trust in an infinite God be the blessing you carry with you from this place, and may it abide with you forever! Amen.

"Now, gentlemen," said a peripatetic lecturer to a somewhat noisy crowd who had gathered to one of his seances in an Eastern village, "how would you like a good blackguard story? All in favor will raise their hands." Nine-tenths of the dexter paws present instantly went up, and there was a sudden hush of all noisy demonstrations. The lecturer went on with his original subject for a few minutes, when some incautious individual broke out with: "Say, where's that story?" "Bless you," was the reply, "I did not intend to tell any such story. I only wanted to know how many blackguards are present." You might have heard a pin drop any time during the lecture after that.

One of the English papers says there is something exquisitely painful in the sight of a Christian missionary compounding with all sorts of filthy obscenity on the part of his converts in order to bribe them into repeating the Church catechism. We have selected India because it is not peopled by savage races, but is, on the contrary, the home of a creed and a civilization beside which the faiths and societies of Europe are things of yesterday. To convert such a country would be the greatest work which Christianity could achieve. Its utter failure to do so has proportionate significance.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1873, by F. E. Asnor, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER XI.

"NEVER OVERTAKING AND ALWAYS PURSUING."

In a dull household, any incident, even a painful one, which breaks in upon its monotony, is often secretly welcomed by its members as a relief from the tiresome routine of their daily existence. Mr. Gower's family was in receipt of a double sensation—the arrival of the letter from America, and the equally unexpected accession of Mrs. Maberley. Either event would have sufficed to disturb the ordinary tranquility of the house near the Hampstead Road; the two, occurring almost simultaneously, produced an unwelcome degree of interest and excitement. There had been no such sensation within its four walls since the death of Paul's aunt, or the marriage of her sister.

As commonly happens, the incident which assumed a personal shape created the greatest bustle; the abused wife taking precedence over her cousin and former lover, in the attention if not regard of his parents. Everybody was sorry for the poor lady and glad to afford her an asylum from her husband's brutality. Apart from the natural sympathy awakened by her misfortunes, her presence was felt to be an acquisition; it originated a kind of moral holiday, by relaxing the rigidity of the relations of the members of the family one toward another. Paul (and possibly his grandmother, though from different motives) would have liked her stay to be permanent.

It was not so, of course. As Mr. Bligh had shrewdly predicted, she returned to her husband after rather more than the usual amount of negotiation; during which Mr. Maberley wrote letters, expressing the deepest sorrow and contrition; had interviews with the old gentleman (the old lady would not see him), and subsequently with his wife; when she burst out crying, forgave him for the fifth or sixth time and went back to Hanover Street in a cab. All this hardly needs the telling, for, unfortunately, instances of conjugal brutality are not so rare in Great Britain but that most of us know more or less of their dreary details—if only from reading the reports of the proceedings in Court of Probate and Divorce. I am not going to enlarge on them in the case of Mrs. Maberley; who, indeed, has but little to do in this story. She condoned her husband's offences and granted him a fresh lease of her favor on promise of amendment for the future. Very likely she felt the weakness of this reliance, but hid the unwelcome conviction in her innermost heart; as many a woman has done before, and will do after her. Her stay at the house near the Hampstead Road barely amounted to a fortnight.

The most bitter adversary to this matrimonial reconciliation was Mrs. Gower, whose husband approved of it on general and Biblical principles. The old lady hated James Maberley, and could not be won over to change or modify her opinion of him; which was singularly just and merciless. She had never forgiven him for certain offences pertinent to herself. Before the discovery of his profligacy had broken off all intercourse between the two families, except what the poor wife contrived to keep up, there had been enough intimacy on the part of the Misses Gower with their cousin to render them frequent visitors at the showy establishment described by Paul, with which they contrasted their own dull home, to the production of much repining and discontent; and sometimes an approach to open mutiny, secretly abetted by Maberley, who ridiculed the old folks while flattering the daughters, as Mrs. Gower very well knew. The flashy assumption of the man, his fashionable chatter and indomitable impudence, at first completely deceived these ladies, whose natural good sense was so little developed by any acquaintance with the world that they might have been pronounced unsophisticated. They thought him a dashing, handsome, brilliant fellow, and rather envied their cousin's supposed good fortune, wishing that Heaven had sent them such a man, until the discovery. Then Mrs. Gower had her say. The old lady had forgotten none of these things, though one of the daughters was married and had a home of her own, and the other lay buried in the family grave at New Bunhill Fields. She always alluded to James Maberley as "the hornet of the family."

When Mrs. Maberley returned to her husband, not even Mrs. Gower regretted it as much as did Paul. As the young man has admitted to Richard Sabin, his aunt, as he called her, had always treated him with great kindness and consideration; such, indeed, as the motherless boy had experienced nowhere else, unless, perhaps, in Northamptonshire. She was naturally kind-hearted, and the fact of his paternity probably induced a special regard for him. It might be that her unhappy condition made her unusually tender towards the son of the lover of her girlhood—the handsome, high-spirited young fellow whom she remembered so well, and whose life seemed to have been wrecked in consequence of his disappointment. There are few women who would like a man the less for this, and who would not cherish sentimental reminiscences of him. The letter, too, revived old associations. Mrs. Maberley, Paul, and his sister (during the few days which elapsed before her return to the country with Mr. Blencowe) were never tired of their long confidential talks about John Gower; until Ruth had half-divined her "aunt's" story, by sheer force of girlish instinct and feminine sympathy.

Paul was duly apprised by the old lady and gentleman (and also by his sister) of the particulars of Mr. Wheeler's visit, and as duly catechized as to his own supposed interview with the American; with respect to which Mrs. Gower was exceedingly inquisitive, regarding it as a liberty and a mystery. Being informed of what had not occurred, she exhibited a strong inclination to make her grandson responsible for her baffled curiosity—perhaps because she did not care to engage the original offender, Ruth. There was, besides, another and more cogent reason for her displeasure. She suspected that Paul would be only too eager to accept his father's invitation. For though it was immediately decided that he should go (his assent being assumed rather than asked), and though, half an hour before Mr. Wheeler's arrival, the old lady would undoubtedly have professed her desire to be relieved of him, it is equally certain that she was dissatisfied when the opportunity presented itself. She had some affection for him, and probably her plans and intentions in his favor; notwithstanding her declarations that he must expect no such assistance. And, finally, she didn't like surrendering her authority over him or anybody. It was, therefore, with a sort of effort that she resigned herself to the determination, which her husband accepted with perfect ease and complacency.

There was no real question about Ruth, whom we may as well dismiss to Northamptonshire, assured of staying there. After the first flutter of surprise at the very idea of crossing the Atlantic, to rejoin a father of whom she had no personal recollections, the girl shrank from the thought of leaving her guardian and the only home worthy of the name which she had ever known. (I will not assert that some faint, secret, personal reasons did not enter into her disinclination; but it would have been the same, independent of them.) She would rather stay, she said, unless Mr. Blencowe thought it her duty to go; she was sure she could never be so happy elsewhere as she had been at Thorpe Parva; she hoped that his decision would absolve her from all responsibility of choice on the subject. Mr. Blencowe was so gratified that he took great pains to explain to his ward that she was entirely a free agent, and to descend upon the possible advantages of living in Louisiana, of which locality he knew rather less than of the interior of China. This performance having been gone through, he wrote just such a letter to John Gower as had been prefigured by Mr. Bligh, only suppressing all allusion to his testamentary intentions; for, much as he loved Ruth, and worthy old soul as he was in the main, our country clergyman loved money also, and had no idea of committing himself to any promise on the subject. And thus, for the present, the matter ended.

But what were Paul's inclinations? In everyday phrase, he would have jumped at the opportunity, but for one drawback—Kate Sabin. He was in love and extremely distrustful of the constancy of the beloved object, should he quit England. I must describe his position, both with regard to his grandparents and mistress, before the reader can rightly understand the young man's feelings.

In such a home as his grandfather's it was impossible that he should be very happy, though he was not miserable, or at least no more so than was inevitable when the ideas of dependence and subjection were as much a portion of his daily existence as the food he ate, or the air he breathed. Not that the old folks were unkind, or that they repeated precisely the same mistake in the treatment of their grandson which had resulted so disastrously in the case of his father; still it was only a modified form of the same despotism. Their faith in authority had grown into a habit, though years had relaxed its application. They had no notion of liberty for young people; it was a heresy of altogether later date than any of their opinions.

This did no great mischief at first. Paul respected his grandparents, if he did not love them, and recognized the excellence of their intentions, while chafing at the strictness of their rule. Naturally a youth of quiet tastes and habits, he submitted with a good grace when at home, making himself what amends lay in his power abroad. In the dull, decorous, monotonous house, where every usage had, so to speak, petrified into routine, his condition had not much improved from that of his childhood. The same implicit obedience in all things was still expected of him, especially by his grandmother. A shrewder person than her husband, perhaps capable of deeper affections, Mrs. Gower's disposition induced errors of conduct which his placid temperament avoided. She was naturally something of a queller and a quencher of young people. He had grown mellow with age, she sharper. He disliked scolding and would sometimes allude to it as "the scourge of the tongue;" while, if his wife did not find a positive pleasure in wielding it, she certainly regarded the exercise as an indispensable duty, to be performed with all the energy of her nature, whenever occasion demanded. So long as Paul seemed to be going on satisfactorily, which his grandfather was quite ready to assume, in the absence of information to the contrary, Mr. Gower was content; but the old lady, suspicious, inquisitive, and inexorable, couldn't let her grandson alone. Many very excellent people show their love for others—particularly their own flesh and blood—by tyrannizing over them. There was, probably, a spice of selfishness, a regard for his own tranquillity, in the old gentleman's good-nature; as his wife's domineering may have originated in affection for her victim. That, however, did not make it any the more agreeable.

Up to the time of his enslavement by Kate Sabin, Paul had escaped with only venial transgressions against authority and his grandparents; though once there was a violent quarrel apropos of nothing worth mentioning; to be alluded to hereafter. Sometimes he stayed out of evenings instead of returning straight home after office-hours, to sit mutely reading or drawing, while Mrs. Gower plied the interminable needle and his grandfather dozed over Mr. Huntingdon or Bell's Weekly Messenger, until supper, prayers, and bed-time—sometimes, I say, he chewed all this; but he was then supposed to attend the Government School of Design at Somerset House, at least thrice a week nocturnally, and how were his aged relatives to know if he occasionally absented himself in favor of Drury Lane or Covent Garden theatres, in company with one or more of his fellow-pupils? As already stated, Mr. Bligh had built theatres, both in town and country, besides writing plays and farces for them; he sometimes gave his young gentlemen tickets of admission to such places of entertainment; hence they had contracted a decided taste for such pleasures, which risks, I suppose, had been overlooked by Paul's guardians when they article him. But as he invariably left the theatre before the performance of the after-pieces, and, when questioned, answered with just as much veracity as might have been expected, he avoided getting into any serious scrapes. In fact, his grandparents had no suspicion of any such enormities, and at heart entertained rather a good opinion of their grandson, though the old lady never committed herself by acknowledging it, but always treated him with consistent severity, as if he were naturally disposed to rebellion against wholesome authority, and needed keeping up to the mark upon all occasions.

Beyond these excesses, however, and a few exceptional excursions into Bohemia under the convoy of Richard Sabin (whose company he greatly affected), he sinned very little. He had few acquaintances, except his fellow pupils, who were not encouraged to invite him to their father's houses, and still less to visit him. Indeed, an evening under the spectacles of Mrs. Gower was rather a formidable undertaking which, after a single experiment, none of Mr. Bligh's young gentlemen thought of attempting; though young Grayling, who called during one of Ruth's visits, fell violently in love with her, which fact transpiring in the office, he was furiously "chaffed" thereon.

